About 20 first-grade boys filled the scorched remains of the storage room, studying arithmetic under a burned-out ceiling, sitting on the floor in front of a blackboard propped against a charred wall. Other boys had their lessons in the hallway or outside on the hard dirt in the shade of a rear wall.

"Even though the school was burned, our students and teachers are more enthusiastic and they are still coming," said Mohammed Hassan, 25, the girls' cheery English teacher. "We won't be afraid of a single incident. A small warning cannot prevent us from teaching."

Mushtaq runs a department staffed by men, many of whom don't like working under a woman.

On a recent morning, one of her male staff members leaned over her large wooden desk and tried to browbeat her into returning a clerk she had shifted temporarily to another department. An elderly man in a turban demanded tents for his students. Several others reported new threats from the Taliban to kill teachers or burn schools and wanted to know what Mushtaq was going to do to protect them.

"It's the people's duty to protect their schools," she answered repeatedly, urging them to volunteer to guard the schools against Taliban attacks. "People have tried to persuade me to quit. I tell them, 'I'm a lady, but I'm strong and I'm brave.' "

Mushtaq had spent the morning fielding school security alerts on her cellphone, or from officials who traveled from remote villages.

Syed Dilawar, a 60-year-old clerk, joined the scrum of men pressing in around her desk. He had come more than 40 miles from a village in the desert of Qarah Bagh, to plead for protection from insurgents who were threatening to destroy his school.

He had traveled in a car with a woman and two other elderly men. Four Taliban guerrillas stopped them, and when they searched the car, they spotted the belt of Dilawar's satchel poking out from under the seat where he had tried to hide it. They found reports addressed to Mushtaq inside.

Dilawar acknowledged that the bag was his, and as the Taliban led him toward a nearby mountain, the female passenger, a stranger to him, fell at their feet, begging them not to kill him. The two male passengers added their appeals for mercy.

"I told them that I am the servant of the children of this country, and I am the servant of Afghan Muslims and I am the servant of Islam. I am the clerk that brings the salaries to the poor teachers of Ghazni," Dilawar said.

"Then they replied, 'You are not serving Islam, you are serving America, you are serving the infidels. You are misleading our children and you want them to become infidels too.' "

But the woman continued to cry, and on a forsaken stretch that some of the world's most powerful armies could not make safe, her tears were enough to spare Dilawar's life.

"She was the one who saved me," he said.

Challenges ahead

ONE of the children who saw Aref die was Saifullah, a 13-year-old third-grader with a gold pillbox Kandahari cap covered with tiny round mirrors that glint in the midday sun. Aref was his Pashto-language teacher.

Standing in the dirt yard where the educator was killed, the boy stretched his right arm behind his back, nervously clutching the crook of his left, and paid his slain teacher a simple tribute. "I liked him because he did not beat us," he said, adding almost as an afterthought: "And he was teaching very well."

Saifullah wants to be a doctor. His friend, Samidullah, 12, hopes to become an engineer. But the futures of millions of children, and of Afghanistan itself, in some measure depend on whether their schools continue to function.

Without education, the two boys here are more likely to be sucked back down into Helmand's swamp of war and drug trafficking.

Aref's own son, 10-year-old Mohammed Asif, goes to a nearby school that was recently renovated by an Afghan subcontractor working for the U.S. military. But within weeks, the paint was peeling again, the windowpanes were broken, and the concrete was cracking. The rebuilt road outside was also crumbling.

Afghans accuse the Americans of failing to keep their promise to fix the schools. "And then people think of them as real infidels," said the principal, Mohammed Rahim. The U.S. military said it was assigning engineers to repair teams to make sure it didn't happen again.

But engineering can't protect a school from a determined arsonist or bomber.

A few months after killing Aref, the Taliban guerrillas returned and set his school on fire. The flames destroyed the roof, melted window screens and blackened the mud-and-wattle walls.

In a hallway, an attacker used a piece of charcoal to write a lesson in bold Pashto.

"This is the country of betrayers," it said. "What good will it do you? We will discuss this in the next life and on doomsday."

Nearby, someone scrawled an apparent reply in smaller script: "Do you have hope for the country?"

And, as if to remove any doubt about his defiance, the writer added: "My country."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Alleged Underboss Of New England Mafia Is Arrested (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Raja Mishra, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 3, 2006

Reputed Mafia underboss Carmen "The Big Cheese" DiNunzio was arrested on extortion and illegal gambling charges as he emerged from a North End social club yesterday, potentially ending the reign of an underworld leader credited with uniting the fractured Boston mob into a low-key, profit-focused machine.

After State Police removed $6,000 in cash from his pockets and led the portly mobster away in cuffs, officials predicted his arrest would further weaken an organized-crime syndicate already diminished from decades of investigations and infighting.

DiNunzio, 49, ascended to second in command of all New England mobsters around 2002, according to law enforcement officials, after winning the favor of New England godfather Luigi "Baby Shanks" Manocchio of Providence. Law-enforcement officials allege he set about refocusing the mob on money-making crimes, such as extortion and gambling.

"He's a low-key underboss who has been trying to keep the mob's activities under the radar of law enforcement and the media," said one law enforcement official.

According to a source briefed on the investigation, DiNunzio's extortion and gambling operation had been collecting "hundreds of thousands" of dollars per week and involved a "ton" of operatives.

Many of the crimes date to 2001, when the investigation began, and the statute of limitations was going to expire this month, triggering yesterday's arrest at the Gemini social club at the corner of Lynn and Cooper streets.

DiNunzio will be held on $250,000 bail at the Danvers State Police barracks pending arraignment in Salem Superior Court on Monday.

Thomas J. Foley, a longtime organized-crime investigator who retired as superintendent of the State Police in 2004, said the indictment of a Mafia underboss is always significant.

"It puts definite stress on their organization and their leadership," Foley said.

DiNunzio's arrest stems from a State Police investigation that led to the indictment last February of reputed mob soldier William Angelesco on gambling and conspiracy charges. State prosecutor s announced in court last February that the State Police had seized about $800,000 since the investigation began in September 2001. Angelesco's case is still pending.

A State Police officer testified in federal court last year that Arthur Gianelli, a Lynnfield bookmaker and brother-in-law of former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., was paying $2,000 a month to DiNunzio for permission to operate his gambling business. Gianelli is awaiting trial on federal racketeering charges.

An Essex County grand jury indicted DiNunzio yesterday on charges of extortion, maintaining or organizing a gaming operation, and conspiracy to maintain or organize gaming operations, according to the Essex district attorney's office.

DiNunzio faces up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Law enforcement officials said DiNunzio had been shaking down bookmakers, forcing them to pay his syndicate to stay in business, and running a gambling operation that focused on sports betting.

The State Police Special Service Section's organized crime unit launched the investigation in 2001 and secretly recorded local mobsters, using bugs and wiretaps . It was unclear whether DiNunzio was heard on surveillance.

Law enforcement officials predicted that DiNunzio's arrest would disrupt the activities of the New England family, which remains the dominant organized crime group in the region, despite two decades of prosecutions.

DiNunzio, whose nickname comes from his ownership of the Fresh Cheese shop on Endicott Street, owns an interest in Carmen's Kitchen restaurant in East Boston.

DiNunzio, an East Boston native, rose through the ranks to become the underboss and has helped quell infighting in a family splintered into two factions during the bloody reign of former New England Mafia boss Francis "Cadillac Frank" Salemme, according to law enforcement officials.

DiNunzio left Boston in the late 1980s and lived in California. In 1993, while he was there, he was sentenced to four years in federal prison on a charge of extortion for shaking down a Las Vegas gambler for $27,000. He later returned to Boston.

DiNunzio has modeled himself after the old guard of the Boston mob, the Angiulo brothers, who quietly operated the rackets like a business from the 1960s to the early 1980s, making gambling, loan - sharking, and extortion the bread and butter of the organization , officials said.

Whether DiNunzio retains his alleged leadership position while he is under indictment depends on the current structure of the family and whether anyone is willing to step forward to assume control, Foley said.

Citing the wave of federal and state prosecutions that have weakened the Mafia, Foley said, "There's been so much pressure on [La Cosa Nostra] and the people holding those positions that as soon as you take one of those positions, you have to know that you are going to be a target of law enforcement."

But despite the prosecutions, Foley said the local Mafia remains a sophisticated and violent organization that could easily regain the power it had on the region a decade ago if law enforcement doesn't keep up pressure on it.

"There's always that romantic -- unfortunately -- aspect to the mob, and people are still interested in that part of things," Foley said. "There are always certain people looking for the notoriety or the publicity or the power when they try to step into these positions."

FBI Has Establishes Bribe Tip Line (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

BOZEMAN (AP) — The FBI has established a tip line for people to report individuals working in public offices whom they believe are corrupt.

People can call in to report suspected shady public officials working for school districts, law-enforcement agencies, government offices or in any other public position funded by taxpayers.

The Public Corruption Tip Line, 1-866-50-BRIBE, was established for Montana, Idaho and Utah residents through the FBI's Salt Lake City field office.

In addition, tips regarding public corruption can be made at the FBI's Web site, www.fbi.gov by going to the Web site and clicking on the link to the Salt Lake City field office.

People reporting a tip are encouraged to provide contact information, although anonymous tips can be made.

The FBI announced the establishment of the tip line after charges were filed against three employees of a Utah school district. The employees were accused of misappropriating $4.5 million in public funds, according to an FBI press release.Butte businessmen host Chinese officials

FIGHT TO THE FINISH William Jefferson Takes Page Out Of Nagin's Playbook In Political Battle With Karen Carter (NOTP)

By Frank Donze, And Michelle Krupa%%par%%staff Writers

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 3, 2006

Accomplishing a feat widely considered impossible, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin managed to get re-elected in May by stitching together an unlikely coalition of working-class black voters and white conservatives.

Now, a few months later, it appears that U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is trying to replicate Nagin's feat, or at least compose a variation on the same theme.

In the fight of his political life, the embattled congressman is running to both the political left and the right of state Rep. Karen Carter.

The two New Orleans Democrats face off Saturday for the 2nd Congressional District seat in a runoff expected to turn on their ability to broaden their established bases along racial lines and to appeal to Jefferson Parish voters, whose influence in the district has expanded since last year's flood emptied New Orleans neighborhoods.

On one hand, Jefferson, for the first time in his long career in public office, is touting his conservative votes in Congress against same-sex marriage and late-term abortions. And he is attacking Carter for having "sold out our family values" through her avowedly abortion-rights stance in the Legislature and her opposition to scheduling a statewide vote on a constitutional amendment that sought to define marriage as the union of "one man and one woman."

At the same time, the eight-term congressman also has been trotting out his liberal credentials as an outspoken advocate of displaced public housing residents and out-of-work public school teachers and hammering away at the campaign contributions Carter has collected from Republicans.

For her part, Carter has focused on telling voters that she would be better respected in Congress and would land a committee assignment from the majority Democratic leadership. It was the Democrats who tossed Jefferson off the House Ways and Means Committee after an unsealed federal affidavit revealed FBI agents had found $90,000 in marked bills in the congressman's freezer during a bribery investigation. Jefferson's attacks on her character are simply an effort to deflect legitimate questions about his integrity raised by the investigation, she says.

Last week, the Carter campaign launched a series of television ads that feature children competing in a spelling bee. They spell words such as "corruption," "unscrupulous" and "deceitful" as a narrator ticks of details of the federal investigation and business deals involving Jefferson and his relatives.

The Carter campaign also claims that Jefferson's focus on conservative "family values" contradicts the perfect score he received for his support of equal rights for homosexuals in 2002 from the Human Rights Campaign, a prominent gay-rights organization.

Stepped-up attacks

Jefferson also is using every opportunity to sully Carter's image by raising questions about the money she has earned from professional service contracts, labeled by Jefferson as "no-bid public contracts." He has also assailed her tenure as chairwoman of the House Insurance Committee, which he describes as the "best-fed, best campaign-financed" panel in Baton Rouge. Carter has said her work as a lawyer on public bond deals and energy regulation, as well as her leadership of the insurance panel, were proper.

Jefferson's gambit appears to have a two-fold purpose: to deflect attention from a federal investigation that has made headlines for more than a year and to paint an unflattering picture of his rival.

The incumbent's likely goal, pollster Bernie Pinsonat said, is to "persuade Carter's voters that she is no better than he is. The idea is to turn off her voters so they won't vote. That's why he's attacking her on anything and everything.

"When you have high negatives, you trash your opponents in an effort to make them as unpopular as you are," Pinsonat said. "You learn that in Politics 101."

Carter, a two-term legislator, entered the contest at a distinct disadvantage in name recognition compared with Jefferson, who has been a fixture on the local political stage for three decades, including the past 16 years in Congress. But in light of Jefferson's legal problems, Carter's lack of recognition might not be all bad, said Ed Renwick, the longtime director of Loyola University's Institute of Politics.

"Not many people know her," Renwick said. "But that might be all she needs. Being 'anybody but Jefferson' could do it for her."

If financial support is any indication, Jefferson's strategy has not persuaded potential campaign contributors.

DOJ_NMG_0101311

According to the most recent campaign finance reports, Carter has raked in $320,000 during the past month, more than four times Jefferson's total in the same period. She is spending the money freely on radio and television ads that pound Jefferson on the criminal probe.

Jefferson responded with a commercial of his own in which he criticizes Carter for her "shameless exploitation" of the children featured in her spelling bee ad before unleashing yet another attack on her "values." He also takes his long-standing claim of innocence to a new level, peering squarely at the camera and telling voters: "I have never taken a bribe from anyone."

Carter, meanwhile, returned Jefferson's attacks on the issue of same-sex marriage. Carter spokeswoman Cheron Brylski charged last week that Jefferson is engaging in hypocrisy, noting that the incumbent has a long history of supporting gay rights.

Brylski said that in addition to his perfect score from the gay-rights group, Jefferson, in his failed 1999 bid for governor, offered this response to a question about job protection for gay workers: "I don't think anyone should be discriminated against because of any status they have. . . . You treat people differently for what they do and how they act, but not who they are. That would be wrong."

Jefferson spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said the incumbent's positions are not inconsistent.

"For him, banning same-sex marriage was a matter of religious conviction," Roussell said. "On the other hand, he does not support discrimination in housing, employment and other areas just because of a person's sexual orientation, which is why he has received high marks from human rights organizations."

The campaign's temperature undoubtedly has heated up in recent days. Though they lobbed a few bombs leading up to the Nov. 7 primary, the candidates mainly limited their attacks to scattershot references in campaign messages that primarily crowed about their own strengths.

Jefferson insisted that despite his ejection from Ways and Means, he alone has the Capitol Hill connections to make sure recovery money keeps flowing to the flood-ravaged district.

Carter, meanwhile, touted support from former U.S. Sens. John Breaux and J. Bennett Johnston, as well as strong ties to such rising Democratic stars as Jesse Jackson Jr., as allies who will bolster her effectiveness as a freshman lawmaker. She also did not miss opportunities to describe her record in public office as unblemished.

Nagin comparisons

If Jefferson's strategy is modeled on Nagin's successful campaign against Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu -- a campaign in which the mayor simultaneously portrayed himself as the black voter's friend but as the conservative alternative to Landrieu liberalism -- the congressman also has had to adjust the playbook.

For one thing, Jefferson lacks key assets on which Nagin was able to capitalize: Nagin's record as a fiscal conservative, for example, and his relatively scandal-free first term. Jefferson's attention to a conservative social agenda substitutes for Nagin's market-friendly approach to fiscal conservatism, a self-image that Jefferson could not honestly pull off.

If there was a cloud over Nagin, it was not the thunderhead that hangs over the Jefferson camp. Critics accused Nagin of being a feckless leader at a time of catastrophe and invoked unflattering comparisons with New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani after the Sept. 11 attacks. But Jefferson aides and associates have pleaded guilty to bribery charges, and the cash found in his freezer is a powerful issue with voters.

"It's hard to outdo an FBI investigation and money in your freezer," University of New Orleans political science professor Susan Howell said.

Further, Nagin faced a white opponent whom many black voters viewed as an opportunist seeking to exploit the displacement of tens of thousands of African-Americans after the flood. Though Jefferson has highlighted Carter's backing by two of the city's most potent white Republicans -- developer Joe Canizaro and shipbuilder Boysie Bollinger -- the fact remains that both candidates are black.

And whereas Landrieu soft-shoed around his assertion that Nagin had flubbed the city's near-term recovery, Carter has taken direct aim at Jefferson's legal problems, accusing him of focusing on his legal defense at a time when the district should be the top priority.

Slim turnout predicted

In light of the primary-election results, Jefferson faces yet another challenge that he has not encountered since entering Congress in 1990. Though he ran first in a 13-candidate field, Jefferson mustered only 30 percent of the vote, a dismal showing for an incumbent who two years ago won with support from more than eight in 10 voters.

Results from the Nov. 7 election show that Jefferson won nearly 50 percent of the vote in precincts where black voter registration is 75 percent or more, according to an analysis by University of New Orleans political scientist Ed Chervenak. But in precincts where white registration is 75 percent and higher, he picked up less than 6 percent.

Carter, meanwhile, carried precincts where voters are predominantly white with more than 30 percent of the vote. In predominantly black precincts, Carter won 14 percent.

Nagin, in his re-election bid, made huge strides because of a coast-to-coast effort featuring the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial, now president of the National Urban League, to make sure displaced voters -- a majority of them African-Americans -- were not disenfranchised in the first post-Katrina election.

In that race, about 113,600 people cast a ballot for mayor, or about 38 percent of the city's 298,500 eligible voters. Nearly 25,000 of those -- almost one-quarter of voters -- mailed or faxed in an absentee ballot or voted in person at one of 10 balloting centers set up around the state for early voting.

Even so, Nagin's margin of victory was a mere 5,000 votes.

Interest in the November congressional primary, which did not feature satellite centers, was only a fraction of that total, with about 3,600 Orleans Parish voters voting early. By late Friday, the runoff numbers were even lower, with about 1,800 voters casting ballots early or by mail. Early voting ended Saturday afternoon.

Given Katrina's virtual emptying of the Central City and 9th Ward neighborhoods that have been Jefferson's traditional base, the lack of substantial out-of-town voting last month could bode poorly for his re-election. So could Saturday turnout, which political handicappers expect will not climb beyond the 24 percent of voters who went to the polls in the primary.

"With each passing day, Christmas gets closer and the calendars get filled up," Renwick said. "It's a terrible time to have an election."

Jefferson Parish key

Given lackluster voter interest, the key to victory lies in which candidate can get his or her base -- black voters in Jefferson's case, white voters for Carter -- to go to the polls.

The real battleground on Saturday will take place on Jefferson Parish's West Bank and a sliver of south Kenner, home to about a third of the district' registered voters. Historically, the Jefferson Parish electorate has had little impact on the outcome of 2nd District races. But Katrina appears to have altered that dynamic.

About 270,000 of the district's voters are registered in Orleans Parish, though many remain displaced by the storm. Jefferson Parish, which houses 12,000 of the district's registered voters, saw about 28 percent turnout in the race, 5 percent more than in New Orleans.

The incumbent enjoyed a significant edge in Jefferson Parish in the primary. More than 31,000 parish residents cast ballots in the race, with the congressman getting 23 percent of those votes, compared with Carter's 8 percent.

But both trailed the only well-known Jefferson Parish entry, state Sen. Derrick Shepherd, a Marrero Democrat who received nearly 11,000, or 34 percent, of the votes on his home turf.

Shepherd, who placed third in the primary with 18 percent, was backed by much of the Jefferson Parish political establishment.

While he has endorsed Jefferson, speculation is rampant in political circles that there might be more to his support than meets the eye: If the incumbent is re-elected and then indicted and forced to resign, Shepherd could make another run at the seat.

While Carter has attracted the endorsement of some of the elected officials who got behind Shepherd -- notably his close political allies, Jefferson Parish Councilman Byron Lee and state Rep. Terrell Harris -- most of the big names are still neutral, including Assessor Lawrence Chehardy and Gretna Mayor Ronnie Harris. A spokeswoman for Parish President Aaron Broussard said Friday that he is staying out of the endorsement game.

Meanwhile, heavyweights such as District Attorney Paul Connick and Parish Council Chairman John Young, who took no position in the primary, have remained on the sidelines. Councilman-at-large Tom Capella has backed Carter, a former House colleague of his.

Carter's efforts to gain a foothold in Jefferson Parish have been hampered by comments she made to Spike Lee in the filmmaker's Katrina documentary. Carter labeled as unjust, inhumane and un-American the decision by Jefferson Parish law enforcement officials to block New Orleans evacuees from walking across the Crescent City Connection in an effort to flee the flooded city.

Sheriff Harry Lee, who has said the comments were a personal vilification, is expected to send a direct-mail piece Monday to homes across Jefferson Parish encouraging voters to oppose Carter. Though Lee would not discuss the ad, sources close to the sheriff said it asserts that Carter's criticism of law enforcement officials is an insult to all Jefferson Parish residents.

"For some reason, she's ducking the bridge incident," the sheriff said. "If she's not going to say something about it, I'm going to say something about it."

Lee has not endorsed Jefferson, and he said Friday that that he did not coordinate with the Jefferson campaign on the ad.

La. Rep. Tries To Save Political Career (AP)

By Cain Burdeau, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, December 3, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Embattled U.S. Rep. William Jefferson hunted for votes among churchgoers Sunday as he headed into the final week of a campaign to hold onto his seat and salvage his political fortunes.

FBI raids on his homes and his congressional office, including allegations in an FBI affidavit that he hid $90,000 in bribe money in a freezer, have left Jefferson vulnerable for the first time since he won the seat in 1990.

In the Nov. 7 open multiparty primary, the Democratic congressman netted 30 percent of the vote, considered a poor showing for an incumbent.

In Saturday's runoff, Jefferson faces a stiff challenge from state Rep. Karen Carter, a Democrat and well-financed and energetic lawyer hoping to become the first black female from Louisiana to ever hold a seat in Congress. The runoff is one of the nation's last unresolved elections.

Carter, 37, who picked up 22 percent of the vote in the primary, has outpaced Jefferson handily in fundraising but she's had a harder time convincing the political establishment of her worthiness.

"It's going to be very competitive," said Gary Clark, a political science professor at Dillard University. "There are those who may wish he may lose, but it will take more than wishing. He's a veteran politician and there are those who benefit by his being in office."

Jefferson's legal troubles surfaced shortly before Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005. Though he has not been charged with a crime, the allegations led to his loss of a spot on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Two of Jefferson's associates pleaded guilty to bribery-related charges; one, a Kentucky businessman, admitted paying more than $400,000 in bribes to a phony company headed by Jefferson's wife and family to obtain favors from the congressman.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing, and said he would explain his side in due course. So far he has not done that.

Jefferson, 59, has tried to soften voters' opinions of his legal troubles, invoking stories about how he has turned to God in these "difficult times." He has also cast Carter in attack ads as a socially liberal Democrat who supports same-sex marriages and late-term abortions.

Carter's spokeswoman, Cheron Brylski, said he had distorted her record and his own record of support for same-sex marriages and some forms of abortion.

For her part, Carter has hammered away at Jefferson, calling him a "hypocrite" and "unscrupulous" in a series of ads depicting children at a spelling bee who correctly spell the words used to denigrate Jefferson.

The bitter tone will likely be on full display Thursday night when the two candidates take part in their first head-to-head televised debate.

Cold Cash Congressman Says He Has 'Never Taken A Bribe' In New Campaign Ad (ABC)

ABC News' The Blotter, December 3, 2006

Louisiana Congressman William Jefferson (D-La.) has taken to the airwaves to unequivocally deny the allegations that have plagued him for months. "I have never taken a bribe from anyone," he asserts in a new campaign ad.

Jefferson is running for re-election despite being at the center of a federal bribery investigation. He faces a run-off against fellow Democrat State Rep. Karen Carter on Dec. 9.

Carter has seized on the probe in her campaign against Jefferson, and recently ran an ad quoting a Washington Post article that said the FBI had caught Jefferson accepting a bribe on videotape. In this latest ad, Jefferson responds by saying that Carter's "newspaper source got the facts wrong."

A search warrant issued in May alleged that Jefferson had accepted $100,000 in cash from an FBI informant on behalf of a high-ranking foreign government official in exchange for help with securing a telecommunications contract in Africa. The affidavit states that Jefferson's handling of the briefcase containing the cash was "videotaped by the FBI from several vantage points." Most of the cash was later found in a freezer in Jefferson's house.

Jefferson has not yet been charged with a crime. Two of his associates pled guilty to bribery-related charges earlier in the year.

Is Race A Factor In Corruption Charges? (MCA)

By Michael Erskine

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 3, 2006

The FBI says absolutely not; others, given the history lately, aren't so sure

When Johnnie R. Turner first heard about the arrests of Memphis City Councilmen Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete last week, it stopped her cold in her tracks.

"Not again," she said to herself in disbelief. Turner's next thought turned to a question of fairness.

"Where are the others?"

Turner, executive director of the Memphis branch of the NAACP, said recent public corruption investigations have given citizens the impression that African-American politicians are "inherently more crooked, and that is not true."

"If you did it, and you're wrong, then you should be punished. But it should be done to other groups just as it's done to ours."

In a city where Old South racial wounds still fester, Ford and Peete joined the dubious ranks of black Memphis elected officials charged in the past two years with taking bribes.

The pair have been accused of pocketing thousands of dollars in cash from a government informant to influence their votes as part of a federal probe dubbed Main Street Sweeper.

Since the first indictments were handed down in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz sting in 2005, not one sitting white elected official from Memphis has been charged. Seven current or former black Memphis elected officials have been.

Out of 15 public officials and their associates charged statewide, three have been white: state Sen. Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga, former state Rep. Chris Newton of Cleveland and now Memphis businessman Joe Cooper.

Newton, a Republican, was the first elected official to plead guilty last year to Waltz charges and is serving a one-year prison term. Crutchfield, a Democrat, has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial set for July.

Cooper, a former Shelby County official, was charged last week with money laundering. Sources say Cooper is the informant who paid bribes to Ford and Peete.

The last time a high-profile white Memphis elected official was convicted for taking bribes was in 1982.

Edgar Gillock, then a state senator, was convicted of taking more than $130,000 in kickbacks for his influence in helping a company sell computers to the state and Shelby County.

His arrest came at a time when most elected officials from the area were white men, a factor that's changed over time.

A spokesman for U.S. Atty. David Kustoff's office declined comment for this story.

But George Bolds, spokesman for the local FBI office, said he understands the race of those charged in recent public corruption cases is an element some people examine.

"It is what it is. We don't attempt to explain it or attach any sociological significance to it. Other people do, and they are entitled to do that," he said.

But Bolds said race by no means is a factor in how the FBI investigates cases.

"We, the FBI, go where the investigation leads us. Race is not a consideration for us. Our job is to investigate credible allegations related to violations of federal statutes, and that's what we do," Bolds said.

The NAACP's Turner said white officials who are abusing the public's trust have escaped prosecution because they've made their money through more legitimate means, by getting lucrative government jobs or contracts.

"Their methods of dishonesty are more sophisticated," she said, adding that investigators need to look for more "viable" strategies to find elected crooks other than black people.

Turner is not the first to suggest the issue of race has been at play with recent corruption charges.

Former state senator Roscoe Dixon, who started his five-year prison term last week for his bribery conviction, sought a dismissal of his Waltz case earlier this year claiming race-based selective prosecution.

U.S. Dist. Judge Jon McCalla rejected Dixon's motion in May, saying it was not supported by evidence that there were non-black individuals who could have been prosecuted for similar offenses but were not.

"It is not enough for Defendant to simply point out that the majority or even all of the individuals prosecuted for a particular offense are of the same race," McCalla wrote.

Later, outside the courthouse, demonstrators marched and carried placards such as "Tennessee Waltz is a Government Conspiracy against Black Democrats."

State Sen. Paul Stanley, a white Republican from Germantown, said he knows all too well that undercover agents cast a wide net in the Waltz.

"They laid a trap with bait in it, and they said, 'Come one, come all.' "

Stanley, at the time a state representative, was approached by agents posing as officials of E-Cycle Management. The sham company, set up by federal investigators, promoted fake legislation to channel surplus state electronic equipment to the company for resale.

Although Stanley was one of seven House members who signed onto E-Cycle's "bill" as a co-sponsor, Stanley said he never received anything from its backers. He said he asked to see financial data from E-Cycle and never heard back.

Stanley said he thinks complaints about racial targeting are nothing more than an excuse.

"The head of the FBI here is an African-American woman," Stanley said, referring to FBI Special Agent in Charge My Harrison. "She's just saying, 'We're going to go and get you if you've done something wrong.' "

The Department of Justice allows agents to offer bribes to a public official only after first establishing predication, or evidence of a predisposition to corruption.

The federal complaint against Peete lists his prior conviction in 1989 for soliciting a bribe as a City Council member. It also alleges that in the new case, the informant, a lobbyist for clients with business before the council, "periodically made cash payments for Peete's influence."

The complaint against Ford says the informant told agents he had performed favors for Ford, including assisting him in acquiring a Cadillac with financing in the name of a third person. The informant said he also helped Ford get a loan to remodel his mortuary.

Sidney Chism, a longtime local black Democratic leader who now sits on the Shelby County Commission, said the recent string of allegations stemmed from black officials being too dependent on the system for their economic survival.

"I don't think you're going to find a majority of politicians, white or black, that are going to accept money from anybody for doing what they've been elected to do. ... The very few that tend to want to do that is because of their economic positions in life," Chism said.

As a result, Chism said he's long been an advocate that politicians should be financially independent of the system.

Meanwhile, Chism said he "wouldn't dare say" at this point that African-Americans are being targeted in federal stings.

"I'm not sympathetic to anybody that gets caught with his hand in the till," Chism said.

"My concern is that if you find it, be it black or white, it should be stamped out."

DA's Critics Ask Bar, Feds To Intervene (RN&O)

By Joseph Neff, Anne Blythe And Benjamin Niolet

Raleigh News & Observer, December 3, 2006

In the war that is the Duke lacrosse case, Mike Nifong's fierce fight will not end with the trial.

Durham's district attorney will face a barrage of attacks on the federal and state level from foes who are determined to have Nifong investigated, punished and disbarred for his actions in the rape case against three Duke University lacrosse players.

Dozens of people, some connected to the accused, have asked the governor and the state attorney general to intervene. Many have complained to the N.C. State Bar, the agency that licenses and disciplines lawyers. And a lawyer for one of the indicted players has urged members of Congress to have the U.S. Department of Justice open a civil rights investigation.

The request for federal intervention is aggressive and rare, said Richard Myers, a UNC-Chapel Hill law professor and former federal prosecutor.

"It's a fairly strong indication the defense has nothing to hide if they want more eyes on the ground," Myers said. "How effective it's going to be, who knows? You cast a wide net and hope someone gets interested."

The attacks are a sign of the long and vicious battle ahead in the Duke lacrosse controversy.

Three former players, Dave Evans, 23, of Bethesda, Md.; Collin Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y.; and Reade Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., are charged with rape, kidnapping and sexual offense. They are accused of gang-raping a woman hired though an escort service to dance at a team party in March.

Nifong has been criticized for statements he made in the week after the investigation became public, when he called the players "hooligans" and said he was certain a racially motivated rape had occurred.

After that first week, Nifong's torrent of comments slowed to a trickle. In his silence, the players and their attorneys have attacked Nifong, using his own documents and statements to accuse the veteran prosecutor of misconduct and to highlight weaknesses in the case.

Nifong declined to comment for this report. But in court, news releases and at news conferences, the prosecutor has responded to the criticisms against him, at times using language that sounds like an opening argument he might make to the State Bar in his defense.

At a July news conference, Nifong explained his early statements to the media by saying he was trying to inform the public that an investigation was in progress and to encourage cooperation from witnesses. Bar rules specifically allow prosecutors to make public statements for those reasons.

The request for a federal investigation came from Michael Cornacchia of New York, one of Finnerty's attorneys. He wrote to the U.S. attorney general, the FBI director, the congressional delegations of North Carolina and Long Island and others, saying Nifong had violated the civil rights of the three players. The case merits an immediate investigation by the U.S.

Department of Justice, wrote Cornacchia, a former prosecutor who recently served as chief investigative counsel for the probe of the United Nation's oil-for-food program.

N.C. Attorney General Roy Cooper and Gov. Mike Easley received scores of letters requesting that they take over the case, something North Carolina law does not allow. These letters ranged from well-researched, artfully composed missives to profane rants from phony e-mail addresses. They came from family friends and business colleagues of the accused. Some were from outside observers. Many were sent from out of state, and a good number came from Durham.

Although State Bar complaints are confidential, at least 17 became public records when they were copied to the governor or state attorney general.

"I would think of this as misconduct by a DA and that for some reason, maybe political, he has painted a fabricated picture," wrote Edwin G. Beusse, a New York developer who works with Finnerty's father, in a letter Aug. 9. "Isn't there a check or balance for situations like this that are so far out there, that they're obviously false?"

Molly M. Maguire of Darien, Conn., wrote June 13, "It is frightening to think of any American being victimized by our own legal system and devastating to know that three promising lives are held hostage to a not-so-hidden political agenda." Maguire is a friend of the Finnerty family.

The chances of a federal investigation are unknown; a State Bar investigation is more likely. The bar complaints accuse Nifong of violating the ethics rules governing pretrial publicity and bringing disrepute to the justice system. The complaints cite specific actions by Nifong throughout the investigation as violations of State Bar rules.

Bar officials have responded in writing to the complainants, saying they take the matter seriously. State law prohibits them from saying whether an investigation is under way.

Whatever happens at the State Bar, the organization will be under pressure. The bar has been smarting from its handling of two high-profile cases involving prosecutorial misconduct over the past two years.

In 2004, David Hoke and Debra Graves were reprimanded for withholding evidence during the trial of Alan Gell, who spent nine years behind bars, half of that on death row, for a murder he did not commit. The withheld evidence included statements showing that the murder occurred while Gell was in jail on a petty charge and a tape-recording of the star witness talking about "making up a story" for police.

Bar sharply criticized

The State Bar came under withering criticism for its prosecution of Hoke and Graves. During its investigation, the bar interviewed only Hoke and Graves and did not talk to key witnesses such as detectives or other lawyers. The uproar prompted the bar to conduct an unprecedented public self-examination, which found deficiencies and flawed practices in the case. One of the ensuing conclusions was that the bar should consider hiring outside prosecutors in high-profile cases.

In the second case, also involving a death penalty trial, the bar's prosecutor went after Kenneth Honeycutt and Scott Brewer aggressively, charging them with lying, cheating and withholding evidence. The bar alleged that the former Union County prosecutors had committed a string of felonies, including hiding evidence from the judge and jury, altering documents and lying to the trial judge.

The State Bar's Disciplinary Hearing Commission, a separate entity that acts as judge and jury in such cases, twice dismissed the case on technicalities. The bar has appealed; a special prosecutor is investigating the criminal case against the two lawyers.

The State Bar's charter is not to punish lawyers but to protect the public. The bar has intervened on an emergency basis in some situations, said general counsel Katherine Jean. For example, the State Bar can freeze a lawyer's trust account if it thinks the lawyer has been stealing money. And the bar can suspend the license of a lawyer in prison.

Mary Ann Tally, a defense lawyer who has followed the State Bar's misconduct cases, said that if a complaint against Nifong is later pursued by the grievance committee, there could be questions about why there was not immediate action.

"If they are complaints that have to do with what is going on right now and will continue to go on until this case is resolved, I guess the question I have is why isn't the bar doing anything about it right now?" Tally said. "It seems to me there's a tremendous amount of pressure on the bar and a lot of public expectation on, 'Can you do the right thing, and can you do it in a timely fashion?' "

CIVIL LAW:

If It Feels Like A Dollar... (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Anybody who has ever handed over a $10 bill thinking it was a dollar knows the problem. Unlike the currency in 180 other countries, the American greenback comes in one size, and one dominant color — green. That can be so confusing for the 3.3 million Americans who are either blind or have very poor sight that a United States District Court judge in the District of Columbia ruled last week that the government had unlawfully denied them access to the nation's paper money.

Changing United States legal tender would be expensive — the government says that redesigning its currency would cost hundreds of millions of dollars. It would also pose problems for those who make or use machines that take money for tickets or soft drinks, or change at the Laundromat. And the government's lawyers have argued that some changes could make it easier to counterfeit United States cash.

Judge James Robertson's opinion makes it clear that the American government simply has not tried very hard to help those Americans who cannot see their money. The Treasury Department has revamped United States currency design twice in the last 10 years without making any real adaptation for the blind — despite numerous pleas. None of the other objections seem convincing. The machines that take dollars could be adapted; in Europe, they work with currency that comes in a variety of sizes. And some of the additions to bills that help the blind, like embossed dots or raised numerals, are used elsewhere as extra safeguards against counterfeiting.

Judge Robertson wisely resisted telling the Bureau of Engraving and Printing exactly how to make its bills more accessible to the visually impaired. He merely wants officials to return soon to his court and offer a plan. United States currency might come in slightly different sizes or textures for each denomination. Perhaps the money-printing machines in Washington could start on the larger-denomination bills first, leaving the most numerous ones — the singles — the same as ever. However it happens, the change could also be a boon to Americans who are not blessed with 20-20 vision.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Supreme Court To Review Two School-Integration Plans (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Louisville Mayor Jerry E. Abramson is not sure whether it qualifies as irony or not.

For 25 years, his home town was under federal court order to integrate its public schools. Now that the painful and bitter chapter is closed, and the school board has come up with its own plan to make sure the schools remain racially diverse, Louisville could find itself under federal court order to stop.

"You just sort of scratch your head when you think about that," Abramson said.

More than 50 years after the Supreme Court decided in Brown v. Board of Education that separate schools are inherently unequal, the court will consider tomorrow whether race can still be a factor when school systems design programs to promote racial integration. A broadly written decision on Louisville's plan, and on a related one from Seattle, could have a profound impact on school systems across the country.

It is the first time in more than a decade that the Supreme Court will consider what is proper for school systems to do to promote desegregation, and it is the first test on the issue for two new justices who in the past have been skeptical about the use of racial classifications.

Both sides have circled Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.'s dissenting opinion in a voting rights case decided in the last term that "it is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race."

Because of the high stakes perceived by both sides of the argument, the cases have produced a blizzard of studies and conflicting legal briefs.

More than 50 groups and organizations have filed friend-of-the-court briefs on behalf of the Louisville and Seattle school systems, which use race as one factor in assigning students under their school-choice plans. The small harm done to a few students who do not get their first choice of schools, Louisville argued in its brief, is outweighed by the value of an integrated school system that "significantly advances the goal of teaching students how to participate in a democracy that has formed a single society out of many diverse people."

Among the school systems' eclectic band of supporters: The American Psychological Association, a coalition of historians, the NCAA and a group of former professional basketball players, and 10 former high-ranking Defense Department officials.

On the other side, the Bush administration and a number of conservative legal organizations have joined the white parents in the two cities who brought the suits. Children were denied entrance to the schools of their choice, at least initially, for no reason other than the color of their skin, they say.

"School districts have an unquestioned interest in reducing minority isolation through race-neutral means," Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said in his brief to the court. "But the solution to addressing racial imbalance in communities or student bodies is not to adopt race-conscious measures."

It is unclear how many school systems across the country use race as a determining factor, or a "tiebreaker," in school assignments or how many use racial and ethnic breakdowns to help fashion school boundaries that foster integrated schools. Some have already altered their plans because of lower-court decisions.

Montgomery County in Maryland, for instance, has not considered race in assigning students to schools since 2000, when the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit declared that the school system's race-based student transfer policy was unconstitutional, according to Judith Bresler, general counsel to the county school board. Arlington County school officials no longer give extra credit to minorities when deciding admission to the popular Arlington Traditional Elementary School.

Even Seattle, which used race as a tiebreaker in its "open choice" assignment plan for ninth-graders entering high school, ended the practice in 2001, despite an appeals court finding that its plan was constitutional.

Louisville's plan has also survived lower-court challenges. It requires elementary school parents to rank their preferences from among a group of schools in their geographic area. In more than 90 percent of the cases, officials say, parents and students get their first or second choice. If not, they can apply for a transfer. But the Jefferson County Public Schools in Louisville, where African Americans make up 34 percent of the student body, wants to limit the black student population of each school to no less than 15 percent and no more than 50 percent. So in 2002, Joshua McDonald's kindergarten transfer was denied because it would have reduced the number of white students at the school to which he was assigned.

Joshua's mother, Crystal Meredith, joined in a lawsuit with other parents, even though the boy's transfer to his preferred school was approved the following year. In an unusually compact nine-page brief, Teddy B. Gordon, her attorney, asserts that the system violates the child's right to equal protection and "denigrates a five-year-old's self-worth and self-esteem by comporting him to be color-coded throughout his educational career."

Abramson, who, along with the local chamber of commerce, has filed a brief supporting the schools, said he sees the region's integrated schools as a key component of future prosperity. Even with the case before the Supreme Court, he said, the school-choice plan was not an issue in the recent elections, either in his campaign or in the campaigns of those running for the school board.

"Parents feel positive about it; the business community feels positive about it," Abramson said.

But that does not make it constitutional, the Justice Department says. And Terence J. Pell, whose Center for Individual Rights has filed a brief supporting the parents, said local officials can be ham-handed in using race. In Seattle, for instance, students are classified as either "white" or "nonwhite," he said.

That means, he noted, that a school with equal numbers of white, black, Hispanic, Asian American and Native American students would not be considered racially balanced because of the goal that each school must have a white population of at least 25 percent.

What opponents of the plans are really objecting to, said Theodore M. Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, is using race at all. To him, that is not a natural outgrowth of the Brown decision but a perversion of it.

"The core question is whether efforts to integrate schools on a voluntary basis are going to be treated like [past] efforts to segregate public schools," he said.

Despite the obvious attention given Brown, the Supreme Court may be more likely to look to its decision three years ago in a case involving the admission policies of the University of Michigan. In that case, the court held that diversity in higher education is a compelling state interest but that remedies involving race must be "narrowly tailored."

There are obvious differences between an affirmative action policy at a selective law school and university and a public school system that guarantees a spot to every student. But the most important difference may be the makeup of the court.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was the deciding fifth vote that upheld the constitutionality of the law school's affirmative action plan. After her retirement, she was replaced by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who as a government lawyer was critical of race-based plans.

Last year, while O'Connor was still on the court, justices declined to hear a school-choice plan from Massachusetts that was nearly identical to Louisville's. But with Alito on board, the court in June decided that the issue was ripe for review.

Supreme Court To Rule On School Diversity (NSDY)

By Tom Brune

Newsday, December 3, 2006

SEATTLE -- Five years after the Seattle School District suspended the use of race as a tie-breaker in assigning students to high schools, the most dramatic result can be seen at Franklin High School.

DOJ_NMG_0101319

Located in a landmark 1911 building on a hill above Martin Luther King Jr. Way in Seattle's south-end where most Asians, blacks and Latinos live, Franklin lost 206 of its 339 white students, a drop from 21 percent to 9 percent of enrollment.

"You don't see many white students in the halls," Asian-American 10th grader Genevieve Saarenas said on a rainy day after school last month.

Whether Seattle or any district can voluntarily use race to assign students to create integrated schools -- and avoid that predictable decline in diversity -- will be argued before the Supreme Court Monday.

Based on lawsuits by white parents against the Seattle district and the Jefferson County School Board in Louisville, the case is the latest in a series of key school rulings going back to the historic Brown v. Topeka Board of Education in 1954.

The parents argue that when a child is denied assignment to a nearby school because of race to achieve a racial balance -- not to remedy past discrimination -- it violates the equal treatment guaranteed by the 14th Amendment.

The districts respond that the goal of school integration, and the educational and social benefits that come with it, justifies a careful, limited use of race in deciding where a student should go to school.

How the court rules could affect not only hundreds of public school systems with voluntary integration plans, but also those facing demographic change, including Long Island's 124 racially stratified districts.

"Striking down [integration] policies in public schools," Hofstra University's Jonathan Becker said, "would effectively end any possibility of desegregation efforts on Long Island."

Revisiting 2003 case

The lawsuits also require the court to revisit its 2003 Grutter v. Bollinger 5-4 decision, in which it upheld diversity and the use of race by the selective University of Michigan Law School in choosing students.

Since then, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whose swing vote saved diversity, has been replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, an affirmative action foe. That leaves the districts searching for a new fifth vote, possibly Justice Anthony Kennedy.

The case, one of the most significant this term, has stirred widespread interest.

Dozens of civil rights, education and other groups filed 98 legal briefs in support of diversity and the districts. Several lawyers and scholars opposed to affirmative action filed 17 briefs backing the parents.

The Bush administration also weighed in on the side of the parents, arguing race-based student assignments can be used only to "eliminate the vestiges of past discrimination," not to maintain integration.

If the court accepts that argument, said Theodore Shaw of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, which pioneered school desegregation by winning the Brown decision, "it will be a repudiation of Brown."

Nearly all court-ordered desegregation plans for school districts have been lifted -- Louisville's 25 years under court order ended in 2000 -- and many once-integrated schools, particularly in the South, have since resegregated, he said.

Some still seek diversity

But as many as 1,000 districts nationally still voluntarily pursue integration using race in some form, according to the Sacramento-based Pacific Legal Foundation, which seeks to end race-based diversity policies. Seattle and Louisville are among them.

In 2000, Seattle's plan kept the children of Jill Kurfirst and Winnie Bachwitz from getting into their first choice, nearby Ballard High School.

With a new building and biotech program, the mostly white and popular Ballard is flooded with applications by students who can go to any of the 10 high schools if there is room.

When too many apply, the district used four tiebreakers; the second is race. It aimed to meet the board's goal of each school falling within 10 percentage points of the system's 40 percent white enrollment.

Kurfirst's son and Bachwitz's daughter, who are white, lost the tiebreaker and were placed at a mostly non-white school.

On their behalf, the nonprofit Parents Involved In Community Schools sued.

Two years later, across the country in Louisville, Crystal Meredith's request for a transfer for her son, who is white, was also denied because of an integration plan.

It assigns students to schools in clusters, then permits requests for transfers within the areas, with a goal of making each school fall within 15 percentage points of the district's overall 34 percent black enrollment, or 15 percent to 50 percent black.

Meredith also sued.

The legal cases of both the parents and the school districts have vulnerabilities.

Cases could get tossed

The Supreme Court could throw out each suit because of lack of standing -- Meredith's son is at the school requested, the Seattle students left the district.

The court also could decide not to use strict scrutiny to analyze the plans, and defer to the expertise of elected school boards and educators, as counseled by conservative Ninth Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski.

But most observers believe the court will require strict scrutiny, which requires the schools to prove they have a compelling state interest in using race and that their programs are narrowly tailored to avoid unneccesary harm.

Louisville's plan could fall if the court decides the numerical goals are quotas. Seattle's use of non-white as a category, instead of more specific categories of Asians, blacks and Latinos, could be a problem.

It's all about neighborhood schools to Kathleen Brose, president of the PIICs which sued the Seattle school district.

Saying it's unfair and inconvenient to ship a student across town to a school he didn't choose because of race, she spread out a city map to show long routes and bad traffic.

Brose acknowledged white enrollment has dropped at Franklin because her neighborhood no longer has to send students there. "We have options now."

When the board suspended the race tie-breaker it had no idea the case would last six years, Seattle schools attorney Shannon McMinimee said. Or that it would create an experiment about what would happen without it.

The legal record, frozen in the 2000-01 school year, will not show that. If justices ask, Seattle's attorney will tell them that diversity remains but is slipping.

Three mostly white schools are whiter, and the two schools with the most black students have become more black, figures show. Then there is Franklin.

But McMinimee said the principle of Brown remains: "'Separate but not equal' remains true. When you have racially isolated schools, you have something missing."

High Court To Look Anew At Race In School Admissions (WT)

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

The Supreme Court tomorrow will confront the issue of whether race can be used in deciding where students go to school.

In a pair of cases that could affect millions of students nationwide, the high court will consider whether the Constitution's guarantee of equality allows public schools to use race as a factor in admissions.

The Supreme Court ruling might hinge on the court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who replaced Sandra Day O'Connor in January.

A year ago, Justice O'Connor and her colleagues refused to hear a similar school-diversity challenge from Massachusetts. After Justice Alito's arrival, however, the court surprised many observers by agreeing to hear the appeals from Louisville, Ky., and Seattle. Federal appeals courts had ruled in favor of both school systems.

The challenges could prove among the most significant K-12 desegregation cases since the landmark Brown v. Board of Education ruling in 1954 that banned racial segregation in public schools.

Civil rights advocates are not optimistic.

The new cases "put on the table, in a very clear way, the question of how far society, how far government, should go in terms of trying to promote diversity in education in America," said Ellis Cose, the author of a study on affirmative action.

"The core issue of whether the government should be in the business of helping to promote diversity in some way in education is at the heart of all these cases," he said.

The Bush administration is siding with parents against the school districts, arguing the policies are an unconstitutional, albeit well-meaning, "racial balancing" without a compelling justification.

"A well-intentioned quota is still a quota," the administration said in a brief submitted on the Kentucky case.

Civil rights advocates said a ruling that bars schools from taking race into account would deal a devastating blow to the promotion of diversity in schools.

If the court issues a sweeping ruling against using race, "we will be witnessing a reversal of historic proportions," said Ted Shaw, president of the Legal Defense and Educational Foundation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"Race-neutral" alternatives such as lotteries or socioeconomic sorting often end up segregating school populations again and hurting black students, according to Mr. Shaw's organization.

About 400 of the nation's 15,000 school districts are under court orders to desegregate. Hundreds more school districts may voluntarily take race into account, but there are no firm figures on how many do.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights said banning the voluntary consideration of race in school assignments could result in an "absurd" situation, in which districts are not allowed to promote the diversity they formerly were under order to achieve.

In one case before the high court, Seattle used race as a tie-breaking factor in deciding who can attend which of the city's public high schools when too many students seek admission to the same school.

School officials there aim for each school to have about 40 percent white students and 60 percent racial minorities, reflecting the city's overall racial composition.

In the other case, the Louisville-area school district used racial guidelines to keep black student enrollment at most elementary, middle and high schools at 15 percent to 50 percent to maintain diversity.

School Integration Back Before Supreme Court (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 3, 2006

More than 50 years after the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed racial segregation in public schools, the justices are about to consider whether a school district can voluntarily integrate by considering race in campus assignments.

In cases from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to be argued Monday, the justices will address the question left unanswered by the Brown vs. Board of Education ruling in 1954: What can the government do when the last vestiges of state-sponsored segregation are erased and schools nevertheless remain racially isolated because of housing patterns, parental choice and perhaps societal discrimination?

Facing that situation, officials in Seattle installed a system that allowed race to be considered as one of several factors in determining enrollment in popular high schools. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district was once under a court desegregation order, and officials tried to avoid resegregating by setting minimum minority and white populations at each school.

"Jefferson County housing is substantially segregated along racial lines," attorney Frances Mellen said in a brief to the court. "The assignment of all (district) students to 'neighborhood schools' would result in a substantial number of racially segregated schools."

After the court desegregation order was lifted in 2000, Mellen said, the 97,000-student district concluded the only way it could prevent resegregation was to seek African American enrollment of 15 to 50 percent at each school. The proportion of blacks in the district was 36 percent.

The student assignment process, she wrote, "is flexible and uses race in a limited and permissible manner."

But Teddy Gordon, the attorney for a white woman whose 5-year-old son was assigned to a more distant Louisville school rather than his neighborhood school, said the district's program was "nothing more than a hard-core, mechanized quota."

The Bush administration agrees. In papers filed with the court, Solicitor General Paul Clement outlined the administration's position: A district can assign students by race when necessary to make up for its own intentional discrimination, but not to integrate schools that were never deliberately segregated.

Allowing "the use of a racial classification to achieve a desired racial balance ... would remove the critical requirement that individuals be considered as individuals," Clement said. Such a program, he said, is just as unconstitutional as the segregated school systems that the Supreme Court struck down in 1954.

The administration is supporting white parents challenging both the Louisville and Seattle programs. The Seattle plan -- suspended since 2002, when it came under legal attack -- gave officials in the city's 46,000-student high school district a list of factors to consider when a school had more applicants than space. Second on the list, after the presence of a brother or sister at the school, was whether the student's race would move the school closer to the district population of 40 percent white and 60 percent nonwhite.

A UC Berkeley law professor who supports school districts' right to consider race in enrollment described the cases as the final chapter of Brown vs. Board of Education.

In the last few decades, "the court has basically ended the business of judicially enforced racial integration," said Goodwin Liu, who filed arguments in the case on behalf of 19 former University of California campus chancellors. "Now the only question is whether school districts on their own accord can integrate. If not, it's fair to say that from the constitutional law standpoint, we've given up on racial integration of public schools."

A report by the Civil Rights Project at Harvard University illustrated the persistence of racial separation in public schools, despite the long-standing ban on intentional segregation.

In 2003, the project said, whites made up 58 percent of the nation's public school enrollment, but the average white student attended a school that was nearly 80 percent white. African Americans accounted for 17 percent of all students, but the average black student attended a school that was 53 percent black. Latinos made up 19 percent of total enrollment, but attended schools that typically were 55 percent Latino.

But another report, by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, questioned whether integrated schools were better for students.

Social science studies provide "little evidence that racial and ethnic diversity in elementary and secondary schools results in significant improvements in academic performance," the commission, controlled by appointees of President Bush, said last week.

The case also arises at a time of uncertainty about the constitutional status of race in government programs.

Three years ago, after a series of decisions condemning preferential programs for minorities and women, the Supreme Court was widely expected to forbid the use of race as a factor in admission to public universities.

Instead, over the opposition of the Bush administration, the court left the door open a crack. In a 5-4 decision, the justices said an applicant's race was one of several criteria a public university could consider in the interest of promoting a diverse student body.

The outcome may be different this time. The author of the 2003 ruling, now-retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has been replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, a reliable member of the conservative bloc since his appointment by President Bush in January. In a 1985 application for a promotion in President Ronald Reagan's Justice Department, Alito said he was particularly proud of his work against "racial and ethnic quotas."

The Supreme Court's agreement to review the Seattle and Louisville cases, after lower courts upheld the districts' integration plans, was a likely signal that Chief Justice John Roberts and his colleagues are preparing to ban racial considerations in public school enrollment, said Pepperdine University law Professor Douglas Kmiec, a Justice Department official under Reagan and President George H.W. Bush.

"Racial balancing is patently unconstitutional, and the Roberts court should -- and will likely -- say so," Kmiec said.

He also said the court probably would leave intact its 2003 decision on college admissions. The Bush administration argues that the school district programs are closer to racial quotas than the university program the court upheld and lack the justification for racial diversity that the court found in higher education.

"In the second grade, you're learning the multiplication tables, not discussing the effects of slavery in the 20th century," said Pacific Legal Foundation attorney Paul Beard, who filed arguments opposing the Louisville program. "The court recognizes a special niche in the First Amendment for universities and colleges to determine their own educational mission."

Supporters of the school districts disagree. "The historic purpose of the public schools is to provide common ground for people in all walks of life," said Berkeley's Liu.

Some analysts say it is possible that Justice Anthony Kennedy, who voted with the dissenters in 2003 to strike down race-conscious admissions at the University of Michigan Law School, will switch sides and provide the decisive vote for the school district plans.

"I think Kennedy is an idealist about American society and the issue of race," said attorney Edward Lazarus, a former Supreme Court clerk and author of a book on the court. Lazarus, who supports racial considerations in enrollment but is not involved in the cases, noted that while Kennedy has been critical of affirmative action, he has never ruled it out altogether.

The ruling, due by the end of June, will have a broad impact, though the exact contours of the case are difficult to measure.

The government has no official figures for the number of school districts with voluntary integration programs. Sharon Browne, a Pacific Legal Foundation lawyer who filed arguments supporting a group of white parents in Seattle, said two conservative scholars estimated in a recent study that nearly 1,000 districts nationwide have some type of race-based enrollment policy.

It's also unclear whether the ruling will affect California. The prevailing view among attorneys and academics is that racial considerations in school admissions are prohibited by Proposition 209, the 1996 initiative that outlawed racial preferences in state and local government programs, regardless of what the Supreme Court finds constitutionally permissible nationwide.

"Even if the case goes the other way, it won't have any effect on California or Michigan," where voters adopted a measure identical to Prop. 209 last month, said Paul Beard, another Pacific Legal Foundation lawyer.

Although the state Supreme Court has not yet ruled on Prop. 209's application to education, he said, an appeals court made it clear that the measure banned "(student) assignments on the basis of race."

The foundation has sued to challenge race-based programs in Los Angeles and Berkeley and is poised to sue San Francisco if the school board tries to reintroduce race as a factor in admissions. Since a court-approved settlement in 2001 ended the use of race for desegregation in San Francisco, single-race enrollment at some schools has risen above 80 percent.

Liu said, however, that a Supreme Court ruling upholding school district integration programs might convince California courts that race-based student assignments are not "preferences" forbidden by Prop 209. He said enrollment at public schools, where attendance is mandatory, could be viewed differently than decisions on hiring, contracting or admission to selective universities, where there are clear winners and losers.

That was the view of Judge Alex Kozinski of the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco in an October 2005 opinion that has been widely cited by supporters of the school districts -- in part because Kozinski is a Reagan appointee who once clerked for Kennedy.

In an enrollment plan intended to preserve racial diversity, "there is no competition between the races, and no race is given a preference over another," Kozinski said in a ruling upholding the Seattle program. "That a student is denied the school of his choice may be disappointing, but it carries no racial stigma."

Not so, said Harry Korrell, lawyer for the white parents challenging the Seattle program.

"Racial balancing prefers one individual to another for no reason other than race," he said in a Supreme Court brief, "and thereby violates the heart of the equal protection clause -- the principle that our Constitution is color-blind."

Supreme Court To Consider Race-based School Assignments (SLPD)

By Adam Sichko, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court will hear arguments in two cases Monday that challenge the ability of public school systems to consider race when assigning students to schools.

The appeals, involving the school districts of Seattle and Louisville, Ky., are the most significant race-related cases the court has heard in several years. The court's ruling, expected in late spring or early summer, could restrict the ways schools pursue integration, said Gary Orfield, director of the Civil Rights Project at Harvard University.

"The stakes are rising," Orfield said. "We're now talking about if the Supreme Court will find plans that were rejected as not enough in 1968 to be too much in 2006." He said a ban on race-based school assignment aimed at integration would likely lead to "a significant increase in racial segregation across the country."

Critics of Louisville's plan disagree.

"Our communities have come (a) long way since the segregated days of the '40s and the '50s and on into the '70s," wrote attorneys for a Louisville parent whose white child was denied a transfer due to desegregation standards. "There is no going back. We will not turn back the clock,".

The court's ruling is unlikely to affect the St. Louis magnet-school program, attorneys and legal experts said, because it was part of a federal court settlement.

The Seattle and Louisville school systems voluntarily adopted desegregation programs that use race as a factor in admissions and cap how many white or black students can be enrolled at a school.

Parents sued the school districts, saying the programs were unconstitutional. Federal appeals courts ruled in favor of the districts, and the parents appealed.

St. Louis is watching

The Bush administration has weighed in on the side of parents, arguing that race-based school assignments violate the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment, ratified in 1868 in part to guarantee equal legal rights to blacks.

Such race-based systems "contravene the fundamental liberties guaranteed to each citizen by the Equal Protection Clause," wrote officials from the Justice Department and the Department of Education in a brief filed in the case. "The District's plan is not to assemble a genuinely diverse student body; to the contrary, the plan crudely lumps students into 'white' and 'nonwhite' categories and provides for no individualized, holistic consideration of students."

The other side includes 17 state attorney-generals' offices, including those in Missouri and Illinois. They defend the school districts' desegregation plans and say the districts, not the courts, should decide what's best for their constituents.

A ruling to the contrary "would severely limit their (school boards') ability to seek for children in their district the benefits of learning in an integrated environment," the attorneys general wrote. "The state's interest in integrating schools is consistent with the principles of equality that animate the Fourteenth Amendment."

St. Louis' 27 magnet schools use race as a variable in admissions; each must maintain an enrollment ratio of 60 percent black students and 40 percent others. Students who live in St. Louis or a St. Louis County school district that participates in the desegregation program can attend a magnet school.

The school district's attorney, Ken Brostron, said he hadn't read the Seattle and Louisville cases in-depth but that he doubted their outcome would have any affect on St. Louis' situation.

Christine Rossell, a professor at Boston University who testified as an expert during St. Louis' desegregation case, agreed.

"It's a whole separate ballgame," she said. "The court decision ... won't affect St. Louis at all. (It) was deliberately designed so they could use race forever."

But merely the fact that the high court agreed to hear the two cases makes William Taylor uneasy. A lawyer with the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, he led the legal effort in St. Louis that ultimately created the area's magnet school program.

He said the court's action "caused a certain degree of apprehension among civil rights advocates like myself, because they didn't take these cases when (former Associate Justice) Sandra Day O'Connor was on the court."

O'Connor is gone

O'Connor was the swing vote in a landmark 2003 decision maintaining that affirmative action was acceptable in state-funded higher education institutions, if the school was considering a potential student's race as part of an effort to strive for diversity. But her retirement, and the death last year of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, created two court openings that were filled by conservative justices who may have a different view.

In that 5-4 opinion, the court also said race quotas were unconstitutional. Yet that's precisely what the Seattle system amounts to, the Bush administration argued.

Seattle's plan is "indistinguishable from a quota," government officials wrote. "It is clear that this program is driven by the numbers."

Supporters argue that "race-neutral" programs have led to racial isolation, and that yanking away a school district's ability to establish race-conscious measures would quickly lead to re-segregation. That has happened in school districts in Nashville, Tenn., and Charlotte, N.C., said panelists at a discussion Friday sponsored by the American Education Research Association, which supports the Seattle and Louisville plans.

"It's not going to cure itself. It's not going to happen by accident," Orfield said. He argued that there would be "very little desegregation" if communities were left to their own devices.

Making their case

Attorneys for the Louisville parents argued that race-based assignments aren't the answer.

"No community can tolerate any longer the public education system that makes race the determining factor of educational outcomes," they wrote. "As long as race consciousness is enforced then our children will continue to be treated differently."

The court could agree with that stance and toss out the Seattle and Louisville desegregation programs as unconstitutional. Such a decision is more likely to have an impact on small school districts that have similar approaches, Orfield said.

Taylor said even if the court limits the weight that race can hold in such plans, so long as it still allows school districts to use it as a variable in admissions, "then we're OK in St. Louis."

"I think the court will understand that there are a number of places around the country trying to preserve desegregation plans, and that if they sweep widely, they could create a lot of havoc," he said.

Can Affirmative Action Survive The New Supreme Court? (LAT)

By Edward Lazarus, Edward Lazarus, A Lawyer In Private Practice, Is The Author Of "Closed Chambers: The Rise, Fall And

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

A case being argued this week over racial balance in public schools could determine the future of affirmative action programs.

AT THE START of his first full term on the Supreme Court, Justice Anthony Kennedy weighed a legal challenge to a policy in Richmond, Va., that reserved 10% of the city's contracts for minority-owned businesses (Richmond vs. Croson). At the time, Kennedy was thought to be a potential swing vote on a court deeply riven by its views on affirmative action.

The court's liberal wing believed that in light of the nation's racist past, the Constitution's promise of "equal protection of the laws" permitted — indeed, almost mandated — some degree of minority racial preferences. As Justice Harry Blackmun wrote in the Bakke case, in which the court cautiously ratified the concept of affirmative action in graduate school admissions, "To get beyond racism, we must first take account of race."

The most conservative justices rallied around the opposite view. To get beyond racism, they contended, it was essential not to perpetuate a 200-plus-year mistake of letting government classify individuals according to race. Under their reading of the equal protection clause, the Constitution morally demanded colorblindness.

Kennedy struggled to find a middle ground. Although uncomfortable with affirmative action (and disdainful of Richmond's program, which the court struck down), Kennedy, siding with the majority, rejected the argument that the Constitution categorically bars government from using race-conscious means to achieve such compelling policy objectives as remedying past discrimination. With respect to affirmative action, Kennedy suggested, the Constitution's answer was not "never" but "almost never."

Eighteen years later, on the eve of the court hearing its first set of affirmative action cases under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., the battle over racial preferences continues. On the federal level, former President Clinton's "mend it, don't end it" approach remains essentially in place, though in several states, California and Michigan most notably, anti-affirmative action forces have imposed their version of colorblindness.

Inside the court, although some of the players have changed, the justices remain deeply divided about the means for achieving racial equality. And Kennedy has become even more pivotal to the fate of affirmative action.

Since Croson, the Supreme Court has upheld only one race-based program. Three years ago, to the surprise of many court watchers, it upheld the University of Michigan Law School's program for using race as one non-predominant factor in admissions. Split 5 to 4, the court condemned racial quotas (as it had in Bakke) but ruled that the school's "holistic" one-factor-among-many approach was a barely permissible way to advance what school officials had identified as the compelling interest in maintaining diversity in their classrooms.

The Michigan case, however, preceded Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement. She had provided the fifth vote (together with Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer) to uphold the law school's use of race as a plus in admissions.

Few expect O'Connor's replacement, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., to follow her lead. From his days in the Justice Department of the Reagan administration, Alito has been a firm opponent of affirmative action. And much the same can be said of Roberts, who took over after William H. Rehnquist's death and is thought to share his predecessor's affinity for colorblindness.

As a consequence, all eyes are on Kennedy. In voting to strike down the Michigan Law School's admissions program, he again rejected the standard of pure colorblindness and endorsed the idea that schools could seek racial diversity through a narrow, only-as-a-last-resort program of racial preferences. In his view, however, Michigan had failed this stringent test — just as every other affirmative action program had since Croson.

The critical question is whether the programs challenged in the cases scheduled to be heard this week can somehow meet Kennedy's thus-far unmeetable standard.

These cases concern the efforts of two public school districts — one in Seattle and another in Louisville, Ky. — to achieve a reasonable level of racial diversity in their classrooms while also allowing students to attend either neighborhood schools or schools of their choice.

High school students in Seattle initially get to select which of the district's 10 schools they want to attend. Race comes into play when the school district evens out enrollment among oversubscribed and undersubscribed schools, with the goal of keeping the racial makeup of each school within 15% of the district's overall racial makeup. To achieve this, the district uses race as one of several "tie-breaking" factors in reassigning students.

The Louisville program covers elementary school as well as higher grades and starts from the premise that students will attend neighborhood schools. But its basic idea is the same as Seattle's: To ensure that education takes place in a racially diverse setting, the district uses race as one of several criteria for reassigning students.

For example, because the minority student population in the Louisville district is 35%, officials aim to keep black student enrollment in each school between 15% and 50%.

These cases raise a familiar problem. In Brown vs. Board of Education, the Supreme Court outlawed segregated schools but gave no definitive answers to many vexing questions. For example, is it enough for the government simply to stop imposing segregation, or does the Constitution require school districts (or at least formerly segregated districts) to achieve integration? And if the Constitution does not require integrated schools, does it at least permit school officials to create integrated ones because they think racial diversity in the classroom is a social good?

Our wars over affirmative action in school admissions arose from the last of these questions. Disappointed white applicants rebelled at the idea that public schools could award highly competitive slots in colleges and graduate schools to "less qualified" minority students by adopting racial quotas or by using race as a "plus" factor in evaluating applicants.

The critical question in the Seattle and Louisville cases is whether their school assignment programs are sufficiently different from typical affirmative action programs that Kennedy will find their use of race, while problematic, sufficiently benign to satisfy his "almost never" approach. There is some reason to believe that the answer may be yes.

As several prominent federal appellate judges have observed, the reason the Constitution is skeptical of racial classifications is that, historically, they have been used to oppress minorities (the Jim Crow laws), to stigmatize racial groups (laws enforcing racial separation) or to give members of one racial group a leg up over another (typical affirmative action programs).

The Seattle and Louisville pupil-assignment programs spread none of these poisons. They do not oppress, stigmatize or elevate. True, the plans require state officials to think about individuals in racial terms, and they use race as one factor in making an important choice about where students will go to school. Inevitably, some students will be disappointed by the results. But disappointment will visit white and minority students alike because every student runs a risk of reassignment, and it will not stem from school officials placing greater value on membership in one racial group as opposed to another.

The stakes in how Kennedy views these distinctions are high indeed. Hundreds of school districts, confronting largely segregated neighborhoods, use similar plans to ensure that their classrooms reflect their communities' racial balance and teach by example about a common humanity that can transcend racial or ethnic divides.

In terms of education, how the court decides this week's cases may well determine whether the resegregation of our public schools — a creeping process for years — will take permanent hold because school districts will be effectively barred from stopping it. More broadly still, if the Seattle and Louisville programs do not satisfy Kennedy and a court majority, we will have to wonder, whether the justices say so explicitly or not, whether any use of race to further diversity ever will.

Clueless In Seattle (WP)

By George F. Will

SEATTLE -- This city's school district decided in 2000 that because the son of Jill Kurfirst and the daughter of Winnie Bachwitz are white, they should be assigned to an inferior and distant high school. If they had not left the Seattle school system, this would have required them to rise at 5 a.m. in order to leave home by 5:30 a.m., alone and in the dark, to take the first of three buses, returning home between 8 p.m. and 9 p.m., with almost no time left for homework, family activities and adequate sleep.

The parents argue that the racial school assignments -- actually, assignments by pigmentation -- that so injured their children violate the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection of the laws. The reliably unreliable U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit -- often reversed but never in doubt -- predictably ruled, with interesting indifference to pertinent Supreme Court precedents, against the parents. Soon -- oral arguments are tomorrow -- the Supreme Court can remind the 9th Circuit of the Constitution's limits on what schools can do in the name of "diversity."

Students can seek admission to any of Seattle's high schools. But the Seattle School District decided to engineer a precise racial balance in its most popular -- because much better -- high schools, which are chosen by more students than they can accommodate. The district wanted each oversubscribed school to reflect the entire system's ratio of 40 percent whites and 60 percent nonwhites. So it adopted a race-based admission plan to shape the schools' "diversity."

The district gave preference to certain applicants, using considerations it called "tiebreakers." One, which benefited about 10 percent of applicants, was whether the student had a sibling at the desired school. Another was whether the student's race would produce or maintain a 40-60 balance.

When registering children for high school, parents were asked to specify each child's race. If parents did not specify, the district did so based on visual inspection of the parents' or child's pigmentation. The school board president has said that "skin tone matters."

The two children wanted to attend Ballard High School because of its biotech academy. In the 2000-01 school year, when 82 percent of the city's students sought admission to the five best schools, the children were among the 300 students denied admission to the school of their choice because their race interfered with racial balancing.

Although Seattle never had segregated schools, the district discusses its racial preferences with reference to "segregation" and "integration." But a statement by the district reveals that racial preferences are supposed to serve social engineering: "Diversity in the classroom increases the likelihood that children will discuss racial or ethnic issues and be more likely to socialize with people of different races." Or different skin tones.

Is that a "compelling government interest," sufficient to justify race-based school assignments? The 9th Circuit, siding with the district, argued two propositions, both of which conflict with Supreme Court precedents.

One was that racial preferences are benign if they do not " unduly harm any students" or " uniformly benefit any race or group of individuals to the detriment of another" (emphases added). But the Supreme Court has rejected this idea that the equal protection clause protects group rights rather than individual rights.

Second, the 9th Circuit said broad deference is owed to the judgments of local school districts. But no line of cases has established that high schools enjoy even the limited latitude that universities have in treating race as a factor when deciding who may be admitted. Rather, the Supreme Court has held that public secondary education "must be available to all on equal terms." And here are samples of the Seattle district's judgments which the 9th Circuit thinks deserve deference:

Until June, the school district's Web site declared that "cultural racism" includes "emphasizing individualism as opposed to a more collective ideology," "having a future time orientation" (planning ahead) and "defining one form of English as standard." The site also asserted that only whites can be racists, and disparaged assimilation as the "giving up" of one's culture. After this propaganda provoked outrage, the district, saying it needed to "provide more context to readers" about "institutional racism," put up a page saying that the district's intention is to avoid "unsuccessful concepts such as a melting pot or colorblind mentality."

The Supreme Court has said that all racial classifications by government are "presumptively invalid" unless narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest. The district's repellent Web site revealed the interest that the district considers so compelling that it justifies racial preferences. Supreme Court deference to such race-mongering would make a mockery of the equal protection guarantee.

Gay-rights Activists Hopeful About Agenda's New Prospects (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The gay-rights movement suffered a setback in last month's midterm election when seven states passed initiatives banning same-sex marriage or domestic partnerships. But with Democrats about to take control of Congress, some of its other legislative goals appear within reach — including making violence against gays a hate crime and outlawing workplace discrimination.

For the last 12 years of Republican control of Congress, gay-rights organizations set aside their push for legal protections in order to defend against conservative measures such as same-sex marriage bans.

With the realignment of the House and Senate next month, gay and lesbian groups say they are tantalizingly close to having enough votes to ensure passage of at least the hate crimes bill, and perhaps the discrimination measure, which once failed in the Senate by one vote.

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who is gay, said the hate crimes bill had a "very good chance of going to George Bush's desk … in the first half of the year."

He said the discrimination measure might be further off, noting that Democrats may not want to push for too much too soon.

Nevertheless, prospects for change are sufficiently improved that social conservatives are gearing up for battle.

"We're very concerned," said Tom McClusky, lobbyist for the Family Research Council, a prominent conservative group. "We see blocking those pieces of legislation as one of our top priorities."

The hate crimes bill would provide federal resources to local law enforcement officials; it has the backing of 175 organizations, including the National Sheriffs' Assn., the International Assn. of Chiefs of Police and the U.S. Conference of Mayors. The legislation — prompted by the 1998 killing of Matthew Shepard, a gay man who was beaten and left for dead outside Laramie, Wyo. — has passed the Republican Senate three times and the GOP House once but has never reached the president's desk.

Some gay-rights activists now are demanding that the bill include transgender individuals, which could complicate passage.

And social conservatives contend that hate crimes bills in Sweden and Canada have squelched religious expression. "Pastors have been prosecuted for saying these things [about homosexuality] from the Bible, in their own churches," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel for the conservative Concerned Women for America.

The bill to ban workplace discrimination because of sexual orientation failed by one vote in the Senate 10 years ago. Such discrimination is legal in 33 states; conservatives say businesses should be free to hire employees who reflect their values.

Gay-rights activists say they expect the Democratic leadership to allow just one of their issues to get attention soon after the party takes control, for fear of alienating conservative Democrats. The hate crimes bill has the best chance of early passage, advocates say, because it has support of law enforcement groups.

Rep. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), who is a lesbian, said one advantage of Democratic control was the power to hold hearings to educate the public — and the president — about the importance of the hate crimes bill.

"For 12 years, hearings were not held on these issues," she said. "If you use the hearing process well, it would be hard not to be moved and influenced by the stories from victims of hate crimes or from families of victims of hate crimes who have died.

"If we want to move the president to sign a hate crimes bill, we'll have to move the public."

With a Democratic majority in the House and Senate, social conservatives will be looking to the White House for help. "We'll likely be relying on the president to veto," McClusky said.

Gay-rights activists acknowledge that President Bush could be a problem, given his base of religious conservatives, but are not convinced he would use his veto power.

"Given the broad, broad public support, I'd be very surprised if President Bush would actually veto" the hate crimes bill, said Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, a civil rights group.

Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, said of Bush: "Until now he's been beholden to the radical right wing. I hope coming out of this election cycle, he will think more deeply about his legacy."

At the White House, Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino demurred when asked what Bush would do.

"A lot of ideas are being discussed for the new Congress," she said. "We'll take a look at the details of legislation when it's introduced and moving through the legislative process."

Some gay-rights activists want to press for the hate crimes and workplace discrimination bills simultaneously.

"This seems ultimately doable," Solmonese said. "The public overwhelmingly supports the fact that gay and lesbian people shouldn't be fired just because of who they are and supports more tools for law enforcement."

Still, the Human Rights Campaign has learned from past misfires — including President Clinton's effort to banish discrimination against gays in the military on his first day in office — not to be overly ambitious so early on.

And with Americans listing the war in Iraq and corruption in Congress as their main reasons for voting for Democrats, Solmonese is reminding members that lawmakers will have to focus on those issues first.

"The surest way for this new Congress to go away is if they ignore that tidal wave. It would be shortsighted for us to demand things," he said.

But gay-rights groups say they have already won an important victory: They can now play offense instead of defense.

"One of the most welcome changes with the new Congress is not being on defensive every single minute of the day, which we've been for 12 years," Foreman said. "We've spent so many scarce resources over the years just trying to not lose. It's thrilling to be able to move forward."

New Programs Help Mentally Ill Ex-Cons (AP)

By Angela Delli Santi, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

Trenton, N.J. (AP) -- Larry Lamb has lived a half-century of failures: three stints in New Jersey state prison, four psych ward confinements, drug and alcohol abuse dating back to adolescence, and more time in county lockups than he can count.

A year ago, he began racking up successes.

Lamb, 50, hasn't had a drug-tainted urine sample since he enrolled in an intensive program for mentally ill inmates as he was being released from jail. He's taking antidepressants, keeping appointments with his therapist, working when he can find a job and paying off court-imposed fines from his prior life of crime and homelessness.

"I knew I needed help," said Lamb, who traces his troubled and isolated life back to a day when he was 7 and he watched as his 9-year-old brother was run over and killed by a truck. "I never let anybody get close to me."

Advocates for the mentally ill say Lamb's situation is common among the nation's inmates, 55 percent of whom suffer from a mental health problem, according to a study released in September by the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs.

Yet, the availability and intensity of mental health services for people in the nation's criminal justice system varies greatly, said Karen Bower, a lawyer with the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington-based group advocating for the rights of the mentally ill.

A similar disparity in post-incarceration services exists nationally, with some people receiving comprehensive discharge planning before they leave prison or jail, others being offered limited mental health or social services, and some getting none.

"You are much more likely now than you were 10 years ago to get some sort of assistance at discharge," said Tammy Seltzer, director of state policy with the National Council for Community Behavioral Healthcare, a nonprofit association representing community mental health and addiction providers. "Nationally, we're still very far from where we need to be. There are some wonderful programs, but there are not enough programs to serve everybody who is in this situation."

Services are severely lacking for those with dual diagnoses, like mental illness and drug dependence, said Bower. In one class-action lawsuit filed by Bazelon in New York, mentally ill parolees are suing for access to chemical addiction programs. A prior suit brought by a mentally ill inmate in New Jersey forced the state to revamp its prison psychiatric programs to replace the practice of segregating inmates whose psychiatric disorders made them disruptive.

Without adequate support, or access to medication and counseling, those discharged or paroled with serious mental illness — defined as schizophrenia, bipolar or major depression — often wind up cycling back through the criminal justice system, Bower said.

Lamb is among a small group of ex-inmates in New Jersey participating in pilot programs for such parolees. The programs offer comprehensive services — housing and job assistance, medication management, counseling and education — aimed at reducing recidivism among this high-risk, high-maintenance population.

Until this year, New Jersey had no services for the mentally ill after they left state prison, and only nine of the 21 counties have any post-incarceration services for those leaving county jails.

"The dilemma was, 'Where do I put a person like this?'" said Kevin McHugh, director of community programs and grant management for the New Jersey Parole Board. "We don't want to keep them in jail, and the likelihood for them to fail on the outside was high."

In New Jersey, a mental health task force created by former Gov. Richard J. Codey last year brought the oft-forgotten mentally ill inmate population into focus and highlighted the need for new partnerships between state agencies such as mental health and parole, said John Monahan, a task force member and president of Greater Trenton Behavioral HealthCare, a mental health services provider.

Two pilot programs have started since the task force issued its report. PROMISE, or Program for Returning Offenders with Mental Illness Safely and Effectively, provides up to six months of post-incarceration services to paroled inmates who have a history of criminal behavior related to untreated mental illness.

The program began in the spring, now has 16 parolees and can accommodate a maximum of 30. So far, five people have completed the program, and two committed parole violations and returned to prison.

Monahan's company runs a second pilot project, called Coming Home, which relies on state, county and grant funding to provide outreach services to state and county inmates. Counselors begin working with inmates three months before discharge to develop a plan for living on the outside and continue to work with parolees until they are self-sufficient.

A three-year, $300,000 grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation funds the portion of the project dealing with state prisoners. The money will pay for services for 60 state prisoners and underwrites efforts to amend state policy so such services can become widespread and permanent.

"We have to see to it that people who have serious mental illness get the help that they need so they don't wind up incarcerated and they get help before problems happen for them," Monahan said.

Lamb, who is among the ex-Mercer County Jail inmates in Greater Trenton Behavioral HealthCare's Corrections Project, credits his counselor, Anthony Towns, with his success. But Towns says Lamb is modest.

"I haven't done anything more for Larry than I've done for any other client," Towns said. "In any therapeutic relationship, the client and the counselor should have some type of bond. Larry came to me with motivation to succeed. It just so happens that Larry connected with me."

Lamb just moved into his first apartment, is re-establishing a relationship with his teenage son and says he's hoping, one day, to find someone to share his new life.

Ban On Saucy Beer Labels Brings A Free-Speech Suit (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Santa Claus will not be coming to Maine this year, at least not on a beer label, if state officials have their way.

The state's Bureau of Liquor Enforcement in September rejected three beer labels proposed by Shelton Brothers, a Massachusetts beer importer, including one for "Santa's Butt Winter Porter" that depicts St. Nick from behind, checking a list and drinking a beer, his ample posterior on a wooden barrel.

The bureau said the labels violated a regulation stating that alcohol advertisements cannot contain "undignified or improper illustrations."

The Maine Civil Liberties Union sued the bureau on Thursday in Federal District Court in Portland on behalf of Shelton Brothers, claiming that its right to free speech was being violated.

One of the other rejected labels, for Rose de Gambrinus, a raspberry lambic beer, depicts a watercolor commissioned by its maker, Cantillon of Belgium, of a nude woman sitting on a person's lap. The third, for Les Sans Culottes French blonde ale, uses Delacroix's "Liberty Leading the People," which hangs in the Louvre.

"The illustrations on these labels are artistic, and art is entitled to the protection of the First Amendment," said Zachary Heiden, a staff lawyer with the Maine Civil Liberties Union.

The state told The Associated Press that it feared the Santa label would appeal to children. It said it rejected the others because they depicted bare breasts.

Shelton Brothers has sued at least four other states, including New York, after their labels were rejected, said an owner, Daniel Shelton. The states allowed the labels to be sold after the publicity surrounding the lawsuits, Mr. Shelton said.

Ho Ho Ho? State Says No No No! To Beer Label With Pint-wielding Santa Claus (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) — A beer distributor says Maine is being a Scrooge by barring it from selling a beer with a label depicting Santa Claus enjoying a pint of brew.

DOJ_NMG_0101330

In a complaint filed in federal court, Shelton Brothers accuses the Maine Bureau of Liquor Enforcement of censorship for denying applications for labels for Santa's Butt Winter Porter and two other beers it wants to sell in Maine.

The dispute recalls a similar squabble last year when Connecticut told Shelton Brothers it had problems with its Seriously Bad Elf ale.

"Last year it was elves. This year it's Santa. Maybe next year it'll be reindeer," said Daniel Shelton, owner of the company in Belchertown, Mass.

The lawsuit, filed Thursday, contends the state's action violates the First Amendment by censoring artistic expression.

But the state says it's within its rights. The label with Santa might appeal to children, said Maine State Police Lt. Patrick Fleming. The other two labels are considered inappropriate because they show bare-breasted women.

"We stand by our decision and at some point it'll go through the court system and somebody will make the decision on whether we are right or wrong," he said.

The lawsuit was brought by the Maine Civil Liberties Union, which says the beer labels are entitled to First Amendment protection.

"There is no good reason for the state to censor art, even art found on a beer label," said Zachary Heiden, staff attorney for the MCLU.

The label for the English-made Santa's Butt Winter Porter features a rear view of a beer-drinking Santa Claus sitting atop a barrel. The beer's name refers not only to Santa's ample backside, but also to the barrel. In England, brewers once used a large barrel called a "butt" to store beer.

Maine also denied label applications for Les Sans Culottes, a French ale, and Rose de Gambrinus, a Belgian fruit beer.

Les Sans Culottes' label is illustrated with detail from Eugene Delacroix's 1830 painting "Liberty Leading the People," which hangs in the Louvre and once appeared on the 100-franc bill. Rose de Gambrinus shows a bare-breasted woman in a watercolor painting commissioned by the brewery.

In a letter to Shelton Brothers, the state denied the applications for the labels because they contained "undignified or improper illustration."

The state reviews between 10,000 and 12,000 applications a year for beer and wine labels. It typically denies about a dozen a year because they contain inappropriate language or nudity, or might appeal to children, Fleming said.

"Basically, the standard we use is what are people going to see walking up and down a store aisle," he said.

Shelton said his company filed a lawsuit against the New York State Liquor Authority last month after it denied his applications for six holiday-themed beer labels, including Santa's Butt Winter Porter. The state changed its mind but the lawsuit is going forward, he said.

In years past, the company has had labels challenged in a few states, including Ohio, North Carolina and Missouri, he said.

States have the power to regulate alcohol through the 21st Amendment, which repealed Prohibition in 1933. "But I don't know where they get the idea they can ignore the rest of the Constitution," Shelton said.

European antitrust chief says large energy companies need to be broken up

BRUSSELS, BELGIUM — Europe needs to split control of the energy supply chain to stimulate investment and lower prices, European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said last week in a signal that regulators are determined to break up large companies that generate and distribute power.

"I see only one way forward if we are to restore credibility and faith in the market. Europe needs a structural solution that once and for all separates infrastructure from supply and generation," she said.

"A clear separation of interests between the network operators, energy producers and energy companies is imperative," she said at Les Mandarins, France's interconnector facility that feeds energy supplies across the English Channel. "Then we will finally see an end to discrimination, and we will also have laid the ground for a system of proper investment incentives."

Her Brussels office distributed her prepared remarks.

EU regulators say they have identified fundamental problems with the way Europe's gas and electricity sectors work that could best be tackled by "ownership unbundling" that would force large integrated energy companies such as Germany's E.On to focus on either power generation or supply, selling off other units.

"If we are not solving that one, one way or another, we are running away from our responsibility," Kroes said in Brussels.

Regulators are scheduled to publish their recommendations on Jan. 10.

Kroes said there are major problems connecting energy from one European country to another, mainly caused by the "slow pace of investment in infrastructure under the current vertically integrated regime."

These problems caused blackouts in Europe last month and a natural gas price spike in Britain last winter. Tackling supply bottlenecks would help prevent these issues by allowing suppliers to send power quickly to where it is needed.

But regulators, citing an Italian antitrust ruling against Eni, say that big companies that own infrastructure see no incentive to upgrade pipelines and create more supply when that could bring down prices and give an advantage to rivals in the retail business.

"Chinese walls" forcing a degree of separation between companies in the same group are not working, they said.

Europe's worries over its future energy supplies means it must act, Kroes said.

"We need an expansion of European transmission networks, because more capacity should give Europe more security of supply and more competition," she said. "Where there is vertical integration ... it often seems that investment in new infrastructure is low on the list of priorities for the group as a whole.

"Europe's energy consumers are paying a high price for this lack of initiative," she said.

The European Commission said in February that antitrust problems in the energy sector kept prices too high and let former state-owned energy monopolies keep control of the market.

Blowing The Whistle On Big Oil (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

DURING a 22-year career, Bobby L. Maxwell routinely won accolades and awards as one of the Interior Department's best auditors in the nation's oil patch, snaring promotions that eventually had him supervising a staff of 120 people.

He and his team scrutinized the books of major oil producers that collectively pumped billions of dollars worth of oil and gas every year from land and coastal waters owned by the public. Along the way, the auditors recovered hundreds of millions of dollars from companies that shortchanged the government on royalties.

"Mr. Maxwell's career has been characterized by exceptional performance and significant contributions," wrote Gale A. Norton, then the secretary of the interior, in a 2003 citation. Ms. Norton praised Mr. Maxwell's "perseverance and leadership" while cataloguing his "many outstanding achievements."

Less than two years later, the Interior Department eliminated his job in what it called a "reorganization." That came exactly one week after a federal judge in Denver unsealed a lawsuit in which Mr. Maxwell contended that a major oil company had spent years cheating on royalty payments.

"When I got this citation, they told me this would be very good for my career," said Mr. Maxwell, smiling during an interview here. "Next thing I knew, they fired me." Today, at 53, Mr. Maxwell lives on a $44,000 annual pension in a two-bedroom bungalow in the hills outside the Hawaiian capital.

But Mr. Maxwell has hardly disappeared. Instead, he is at the center of an escalating battle with both the oil industry and the Bush administration over how the federal government oversees about $60 billion worth of oil and gas produced every year on federal property. In the process, he has become one of the most nettlesome whistle-blowers Big Oil has ever encountered, a face-off that offers an inside look at how the industry and the government do business together.

Invoking a law that rewards private citizens who expose fraud against the government, Mr. Maxwell has filed a suit in federal court in Denver against the Kerr-McGee Corporation. The suit accuses the company, which was recently acquired by Anadarko Petroleum, of bilking the government out of royalty payments. It also contends that the Interior Department ignored audits indicating that Kerr-McGee was cheating. Three other federal auditors, who once worked for Mr. Maxwell and still work at the Interior Department, have since filed similar suits of their own against other energy companies.

Several of the nation's biggest oil producers, including Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips, failed in an effort to block Mr. Maxwell's suit, arguing before an appellate judge that his case would "open the floodgates" to suits by other federal auditors. But the court rejected their pleas, and a trial is set to start on Jan. 16.

Mr. Maxwell's self-interest is as much in play in the suit as is the public interest. If he wins, Kerr-McGee could be forced to pay more than $50 million in unpaid royalties and penalties, Mr. Maxwell said. Mr. Maxwell and his lawyers could be entitled to keep as much as 30 percent of any funds the government recovers — enough to make him a wealthy man.

Anadarko says that the government's rules were followed and that it owes no money because the Interior Department never asked it to pay more. But it is now trying to negotiate a settlement before the trial begins.

"We believe the case is without merit," said John Christiansen, an Anadarko spokesman. "However, as is a fairly common practice, both sides have agreed to meet with a mediator prior to trial."

THE actions of Mr. Maxwell and the other auditors have coincided with broader investigations by Congress and the Interior Department's own inspector general into whether the agency properly collects the money for oil and gas pumped from public land. Investigators say they have found evidence of myriad problems at the department: cronyism and cover-ups of management blunders; capitulation to oil companies in disputes about payments; plunging morale among auditors; and unreliable data-gathering that often makes it impossible to determine how much money companies actually owe.

In February, the Interior Department admitted that energy companies might escape more than $7 billion in royalty payments over the next five years because of errors in leases signed in the 1990s that officials are now scrambling to renegotiate. The errors were discovered in 2000, but were ignored for the next six years and have yet to be fixed.

Congressional investigators are worried about other problems, as well. The Interior Department's inspector general told a House subcommittee in September that senior officials at the agency had repeatedly glossed over ethical lapses and bungling. "Short of crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," declared Earl E. Devaney, the inspector general.

The Interior Department, which has described Mr. Maxwell as a renegade former employee motivated by the riches his lawsuit might bring, said its auditing efforts received a clean bill of health from an outside accounting firm in 2005. "The results are clear and irrefutable," the agency said in a statement, adding that it was "accomplishing its job on behalf of the American public."

But Republican leaders on the House Government Reform Committee, which has been reviewing the flawed leases, recently accused Interior officials of perpetuating a "culture of irresponsibility and lack of accountability" at the agency.

The committee ordered the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, to begin a broad examination of issues ranging from the agency's rules and enforcement practices to the accuracy of its most rudimentary data.

The Interior Department "clearly doesn't view their responsibility as maximizing revenue to the American people for resources that belong to the American people," said Representative Darrell E. Issa, a California Republican who oversaw hearings on the flawed leases. "We don't have a system that accurately tells us how much oil is being taken out of the ground."

No one, says Mr. Maxwell, knows that better than he does.

BORN "Bobby," not "Robert," Mr. Maxwell is bald, burly and speaks with a back-country drawl that is occasionally punctuated by a cackling laugh. He said he thrived in the world of wells, pipelines and offshore rigs and meshed comfortably with the oil cultures of Texas and Oklahoma. Genial and unflappable, he describes his politics as "very conservative" and cringes at being labeled a rebel.

"I like the oil and gas industry," he said, as he reminisced about his years as a federal auditor. "We are neither for nor against the profits they make. Our job is to make sure the American public gets a fair return on its assets."

Mr. Maxwell grew up in a poor family in rural Tennessee. After serving in the Army in Hawaii, he earned a bachelor's degree in business at Chaminade University here. He later became a certified public accountant and earned a master's degree in business from Texas A&M. In 1983, after stints as an auditor with the Air Force and the Department of Energy, he joined the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department.

The M.M.S. is responsible for collecting and overseeing the royalties for all the oil, gas, timber and coal that is produced on federal property. Last year, companies paid nearly $10 billion in royalties on oil and gas alone.

"I loved going to the oil companies," Mr. Maxwell recalled, saying he spent about half of his time on the road — some of it at offshore drilling rigs. "Sometimes, there would be nothing more than a room and a helicopter pad to land on. But it was an education, and it was highly practical."

Despite Mr. Maxwell's placid demeanor, friends and former colleagues say he was a dogged auditor who sometimes rankled his own bosses. In 1988, he visited a coal mine on federal land in Montana even though, he says, his supervisors scoffed at the trip because they thought that the mine was too small to scrutinize. When Mr. Maxwell arrived, he found that the mine only looked small because it had been underpaying royalties for years. Within months, the company agreed to pay $43 million in back royalties, and it eventually paid more than $100 million.

In 1993, during the Clinton administration, officials in Washington told him to drop a complex dispute with ARCO because they thought his reasoning was dubious. But just as he was about to back down, ARCO executives volunteered to pay $20 million.

The Interior Department gave Mr. Maxwell an award that year, noting that he had "vehemently pressed his position" even though "support seemed lacking." It attributed his success to both his "measured combatant style" and his personal rapport with ARCO executives.

"If he thought there was a case, he had a reason," said Barbara Rothway, a retired Interior Department auditor. But, she added, "I could see how he might sometimes bother the people he worked for."

Patient and stubborn, Mr. Maxwell spent years poring over the accounts of the Jicarilla Apache Tribe in New Mexico, which had long complained that companies were underpaying them for natural gas extracted on their tribal lands. Tribal officials said Interior Department officials had paid little heed until Mr. Maxwell came along. He collected and organized data going back 30 years and found pervasive errors by both oil companies and the government. The tribe eventually recovered more than $20 million in back royalties.

"Anyone knowledgeable about the way Interior processes payments knows there are all sorts of ways for companies to underpay," said Alan R. Taradash, a lawyer in Albuquerque who has represented the tribe for years. "Bobby was one of the few who stood up with us and demanded that the auditing be done properly."

MR. MAXWELL says his first serious doubts about the Interior Department originated in 1998, when the agency reluctantly began to investigate accusations of systematic cheating on royalties for oil.

Several of the nation's biggest oil companies eventually settled that investigation by paying nearly $440 million. The investigation occurred only after outside whistle-blowers argued for years that the government was losing billions.

The cases had been sparked in part by a former oil trader at ARCO named J. Benjamin Johnson Jr., known as Benji, who contended that oil companies had used elaborate swapping schemes to cheat on royalties owed to private and state landowners, as well as the federal government.

Mr. Johnson and another former ARCO trader quit their jobs and became expert witnesses for landowners and state governments who wanted to sue oil companies for back payments. The two traders soon realized that the biggest case by far belonged to the federal government. But no federal officials were interested.

"It was unbelievably difficult," Mr. Johnson recalled in a recent interview. "They brought me to Denver, to the M.M.S. office, in a room with about 30 auditors and managers from the solicitor's office. Their reaction was that I was crazy, that it was impossible, that there was no way they could have actually missed this."

But Mr. Johnson found a way to recover the federal royalties on his own. In 1995, he filed suit under the False Claims Act, a longstanding law intended to encourage whistle-blowers. Under the act, best known for its use against overbilling by military contractors, a private citizen can sue a company, contending that it defrauded the federal government. Companies found guilty have to pay as much as three times the amount of their fraudulent gains, and any person who files a suit is entitled to keep up to 30 percent of the money recovered.

The Justice Department initially refused to join Mr. Johnson's suit, but it eventually did so, in 1998 after concluding that he and other whistle-blowers — including a nonprofit group called the Project on Government Oversight — were on to something. That was when Mr. Maxwell became involved. Working for the Interior Department, he collected data on a number of oil companies, pooling his material with that of Mr. Johnson.

"Bobby was with us," Mr. Johnson recalled. "He was a straight-shooter, and he saw it." Mobil was the first to settle and paid more than $40 million in 1998. Chevron paid $95 million. Shell paid $110 million. By 2002, 15 oil companies had paid a total of almost $440 million.

The Johnson lawsuit taught Mr. Maxwell three lessons. One was that Mr. Johnson became a wealthy man. (The oil trader and his lawyers received more than $30 million, while two other groups of whistle-blowers received more than $40 million.) The second was that top Interior officials had been obstinately blind to the oil industry's practices. The third was about the power of the False Claims Act. Until Mr. Johnson came along, no one had used it to go after royalty underpayments.

Created in 1849 to manage the nation's publicly owned natural resources, from national forests to parks and waterways, the Interior Department oversees timber, grazing, mining and oil drilling operations over many tens of millions of acres. And while the agency has often tried to increase drilling and mining under Democrats and Republicans alike, current and former officials say the Bush administration elevated that goal above almost all of the department's other mandates.

Mr. Maxwell says his frustrations with the Interior Department escalated after the Bush administration took office in 2001. The Interior Department's top priorities became increasing domestic oil and gas production, offering more incentives to drillers in the Gulf of Mexico and pushing to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and other wilderness areas to drilling. The department trimmed spending on enforcement and cut back on auditors, and sped up approvals for drilling applications.

The agency's senior ranks also became more heavily populated with officials friendly to the energy industry. For example, its new deputy secretary, J. Steven Griles, worked as an oil industry lobbyist before joining the department, and Chevron and Shell had paid him as an expert witness on their behalf in the Benji Johnson case. Mr. Griles declined to comment.Auditors, according to Mr. Maxwell and many others, were told to devote less energy to time-consuming audits and rely more on a computerized monitoring system called "compliance review." Auditors complained that the new system was superficial and riddled with technical problems. Even when the new system flagged potential underpayments, Mr. Maxwell said, it often failed to supply conclusive information.

"We were getting shut down on all kinds of cases," he said. "We started to wish that someone would come along and file a False Claims suit, so we could jump onboard."

Auditing and compliance review had generated an average of about $176 million annually in the 1990s, with an extraordinary peak of $331 million in 2000, according to data from the Congressional Budget Office and the Interior Department. But from 2001 through 2005, a period when energy prices soared to new highs, enforcement revenue averaged about $46 million a year.

In 2004, the Interior Department's inspector general issued a blistering report about the auditing system, saying that many auditors were unqualified, that essential documents were being lost and that the internal review process was "ineffective."

BY 2002, Mr. Maxwell was fed up. He and a team of auditors had worked for months to dissect a complicated marketing deal by Kerr-McGee that they believed was cheating the government. He concluded that Kerr-McGee was selling all its oil at below-market prices to another company that compensated Kerr-McGee by assuming many of its marketing and administrative costs.

Simply put, Kerr-McGee seemed to be getting paid in both cash and services, but it was calculating its royalties only on the cash it received. Mr. Maxwell calculated that the company had underpaid the government by as much as $12 million between 1997 and 2002. State auditors in Louisiana had been investigating exactly the same issue in 2001, and ordered Kerr-McGee to pay an extra $2 million in royalties on oil from state lands.

According to Mr. Maxwell and Interior Department officials, when Mr. Maxwell presented his findings to his superiors, agency lawyers told him to drop the case. When he continued to argue, he recounts in his lawsuit, the agency's chief of enforcement warned him that the director of the M.M.S., Johnnie M. Burton, would be "very upset" if he persisted.

"The word came down from the top, not to issue this order," Mr. Maxwell said in an interview, speaking about the Interior Department. "There have always been people who don't want to pursue things. But now it's grown into a major illness. It's dysfunctional."

In a written response to questions from The New York Times, the Minerals Management Service said it was "rare" to overrule an auditor but that Mr. Maxwell's contentions involved a "questionable application of M.M.S. regulations."

The matter might have ended there, except that Mr. Maxwell decided to retire in June 2003. As soon as he left the agency, he began researching the possibility of emulating Benji Johnson and filing his own suit under the False Claims Act. As it happened, Mr. Maxwell's "retirement" was brief. In October, the Interior Department rehired him to fill a management gap in its Denver office, and it put him in charge of a 120-person auditing team monitoring the Gulf of Mexico.

Despite rejoining the government, Mr. Maxwell filed his suit against Kerr-McGee in June 2004. The case was unsealed on Jan. 20, 2005; a week later, Mr. Maxwell lost his job.

Arriving at his office shortly before 8 a.m. on Jan. 27, Mr. Maxwell said he was summoned to a meeting with a senior M.M.S. official, who had flown in from Washington. The official handed him a memo, explaining that his job responsibilities were being moved to Houston and that his position would be eliminated.

To this day, Interior officials say they never fired Mr. Maxwell. They say, according to court papers, that he was merely a "re-employed annuitant" who was no longer needed. "The position disappeared," said Ms. Burton, the M.M.S. director, in a meeting with energy reporters in September.

Mr. Maxwell protested. He said he would have relocated or taken a different job. He added that he was a certified public accountant and had a master's degree in business administration; his successor lacked those degrees. But the fight did not last long. When Interior officials offered Mr. Maxwell a confidential financial settlement to leave without a fight, he took the deal and moved to Hawaii.

And he continued to press his case against Kerr-McGee. The company tried and failed to have the suit dismissed, arguing that a federal auditor should not be allowed to take information from work and file a lawsuit under the False Claims Act. In October, eight major oil companies including Chevron and Exxon Mobil weighed in on Kerr-McGee's side.

"Government employees who uncover suspected fraud in the course of carrying out their jobs will receive a tacit invitation" to sue as private citizens, the companies argued in their brief. After the appellate court rejected the industry's plea, Mr. Maxwell's trial was rescheduled for January. Settlement talks are scheduled to begin in Denver this week.

Interior officials contend that Mr. Maxwell and other auditors have a conflict of interest when they stand to gain personally from their enforcement work. "These people could be entitled to collect 30 percent of the money that is owed to the government, for work they were already being paid to do," Ms. Burton told reporters in September.

If Mr. Maxwell had not acted, of course, the government would have had no chance of recovering any money at all. James W. Moorman, president of Taxpayers Against Fraud, a nonprofit organization that specializes in the False Claims Act, acknowledged that it was less than ideal for federal investigators to have a financial stake in rebelling against their bosses. But he said the alternatives might be worse.

"You're talking about a situation where there seems to be complete breakdown in the system," Mr. Moorman said. "If they've got evidence of fraud, why shouldn't a court hear it?"

STANDING in his garage recently, Mr. Maxwell pointed to six big cartons stacked along the wall. They contained 60,000 pages of documents that Kerr-McGee and the Interior Department had provided as part of the discovery process in his lawsuit. Mr. Maxwell, true to form, has gone through every page, and distilled his case into seven modestly sized binders he keeps in his living room. He says he is ready for trial, and even for the possibility of losing.

If he does lose, his lawyers will not charge for their work but he will have to pay about $125,000 to expert witnesses he has hired. "I can manage it," he said. He has saved money all his life, he said, and can live on his savings and his pension.

"He's thought about all the options, and none of them seem life-threatening to him," said his daughter, Angela Maxwell Horn. "What can they do him? They've already fired him."

States Hope To Skirt Forest Protections (LAT)

By Bettina Boxall

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

The future of some of the West's most unspoiled national forestlands remains in flux more than two months after a federal judge reinstated protections on nearly 50 million acres of backcountry.

Nowhere is that uncertainty more in evidence than in Idaho, which has the largest and wildest assemblage of roadless national forest in the Lower 48 states.

In October, shortly after a district court in California restored President Clinton's ban on most road-building and logging in the backcountry, Idaho petitioned the federal government to loosen the restrictions on its 9.3 million roadless acres.

Then, at a hearing in Washington last week, Idaho Gov. James E. Risch put a much greener spin on his state's intentions, saying he wanted to honor the Clinton prohibitions.

The testimony by Risch, a Republican, not only raised questions, but underscored the degree to which the roadless forest issue remains in play.

Clinton's 2001 road ban placed about a third of the country's national forestlands off-limits to most natural resource development, a move that was immediately divisive.

Environmentalists hailed the protections for guarding what they call "the last best places" — strongholds for wildlife and clean water. But the limits infuriated officials in many conservative Western states with strong timber and mining lobbies.

Lawsuits were filed. The Clinton rule was put on hold by a Wyoming federal court. Then last year the Bush administration dropped the Clinton ban in favor of new regulations giving states an unprecedented role in deciding whether to open their roadless U.S. forestlands to development.

The Bush rule was overturned in September. But that did not put an end to state involvement. States can still use the long-standing Administrative Procedures Act to ask the federal government to alter the Clinton restrictions. Idaho and Colorado have filed petitions, and Utah plans to.

"Our general concern for the overall process is that at the end of the day, we'll have something that praises the value of roadless areas but doesn't do a lot to actually limit the destructive activities that could take place," said Mat Jacobson, deputy director of the Heritage Forests Campaign.

The Idaho petition, for instance, would allow timber-cutting and road-building in the bulk of the state's roadless acreage to maintain "forest health."

Though Risch said roads would be temporary and only dead or dying trees would be cut, the petition language appears much more permissive.

"We have to reconcile the two," acknowledged Dale Harris, co-chairman of the Roadless Area Conservation National Advisory Committee, before which Risch appeared. "We have to take the governor at his word, and we were encouraged by what he said. It made our job easier," Harris said. But the petition is "a work in progress."

The roadless forest committee will forward its recommendations to the U.S. secretary of Agriculture, who will have the final say in whether to grant the states' requests.

Colorado's petition, affecting 4.4 million acres, would drop coal-mining lands and ski areas from the road ban and allow timber-cutting to reduce the wildfire threat around communities.

Utah has indicated it will ask the federal government to jettison the Clinton restrictions on all 4 million acres.

If the petitions are granted, it will take one to two years for them to take effect through the federal rule-making process.

In the meantime, Wyoming is seeking to reopen its lawsuit against the Clinton regulations. And the September ruling could be appealed.

More Farmers Seek Subsidies As U.S. Eats Imported Produce (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

FRESNO COUNTY, Calif. — For decades, the fiercely independent fruit and vegetable growers of California, Florida and other states have been the only farmers in America who shunned federal subsidies, delivering produce to the tables of millions of Americans on their own.

But now, in the face of tough new competition primarily from China, even these proud groups are buckling. Produce farmers, their hands newly outstretched, have joined forces for the first time, forming a lobby group intended to pressure politicians over the farm bill to be debated in Congress in January.

Nobody disputes that competitive pressures from abroad are squeezing fruit and vegetable growers, whose garlic, broccoli, lettuce, strawberries and other products are a mainstay of world kitchens. But the issue of whether the United States ought to broaden farm subsidies beyond the commodity crops like corn and cotton, which have historically been protected, is a big flashpoint.

"This is like the tectonic plates of farm policy shifting, because you have a completely new player coming in and demanding money," said Kenneth A. Cook, president of Environmental Working Group, a research group in Washington that has been critical of farm subsidies, which are mandated by federal laws that date to the Great Depression.

Although some farmers may be suffering, American consumers have been big beneficiaries of cheap food imports. On the United States wholesale market, for example, Chinese garlic costs almost half the price of garlic that is grown domestically.

Existing American farm subsidy policies have been the subject of violent protests outside some World Trade Organization meetings, with detractors calling them an antique way of subsidizing United States farmers at the expense of poorer ones. American fruit and vegetable growers, with their much smaller farms, have never been part of this debate, in part because their crops yielded higher returns, did not need much support, and were never organized around a single policy goal.

But times have changed.

Here in the fertile San Joaquin Valley, Mike Mantelli has seen firsthand the substantial changes forced by the rising tide of Chinese garlic into the United States. As the general manager of the largest American garlic company, Christopher Ranch, he remembers when there were 1,200 acres of garlic planted on a 6,000-acre farm here a decade ago.

Today the company plants less than 300 acres because of lower demand for California garlic, he said.

"The Chinese garlic totally caught us off-guard and knocked us down," Mr. Mantelli said recently as he checked on newly planted garlic bulbs. "I think our industry has hit rock bottom. Maybe now we can figure out how to make it a level playing field."

So Mr. Mantelli has joined the coalition of about 75 growers of specialty crops who have united to grab a much bigger slice of the federal subsidy pie.

The group, representing growers of everything from broccoli to strawberries to nuts and flowers and wine, submitted a bill in September asking for what most likely would amount to more than $1 billion for programs they say could help their crops compete better in a tougher global marketplace.

The farmers are not asking for the kind of direct subsidies that have been accused of distorting trade and hurting developing countries' agricultural industries. Hoping to avoid a nasty battle with powerful farm-state politicians in the Midwest and Southeast, they are asking instead for money to help market their products at home and overseas, as well as for research and conservation.

But whatever money the fruit and vegetable farmers might get would probably have to come out of the allocation that already goes to other sorts of farmers. As things stand, the federal farm subsidy program supplies more than $15 billion a year, primarily to growers of five crops: corn, cotton, rice, wheat and soybeans. Those crops are considered interchangeable commodities and are traded on world markets, unlike fruits and vegetables, which are called specialty crops because their taste and quality are viewed as being highly variable.

While some vegetable and fruit groups have previously requested more funds, they have never before mounted a united challenge. "This is the first time these groups have weighed in with a sense of organization and commitment," said Clayton Yeutter, a former agriculture secretary and United States trade representative.

The current agriculture secretary, Mike Johanns, looks favorably on the produce growers' bill. The legislation also has the advantage that the farmers come from states with sizable representation in Congress.

Still, the proposal is likely to face a tough road. There are many other federal budget priorities, and farm experts say there will probably be less money allocated to the farm bill next year than in 2002, when there was a huge increase.

Further, while commodity growers are making courteous noises about the fruit and vegetable farmers' requests, they have historically enjoyed a near monopoly on federal subsidies.

But fruit and vegetable farmers have been gaining influence. The group's combined cash receipts of $52.2 billion rival or exceed those of the five major commodity crops, which are expected to generate $52 billion this year.

The produce farmers can also point to the competitive situation. California growers once dominated the garlic industry in the United States, but imports from China and Hong Kong have increased from less than 1 million pounds in 2000 to 112 million pounds last year. This year, for the first time, more Chinese garlic will be sold in the United States than California produces, Commerce Department figures show.

China's farmers, who are broadly subsidized, have the advantage in that their nation's currency, the yuan, is tightly regulated to maximize trade opportunities. And the country has a glut of workers for the labor-intensive jobs of growing and harvesting fruits and vegetables.

"Of course consumers are benefiting now," said Peter Morici, an economist at the University of Maryland business school and a former chief economist at the United States International Trade Commission. "But competition should not be based on subsidies."

Other specialty crop groups are also struggling with foreign competition, in particular from China, which has geared its agriculture industry towards labor-intensive, higher-value fruits and vegetables. China has begun to dominate everything from apples to onions. Chinese exports have also eaten into American growers' share of markets in Japan and Hong Kong for items like broccoli and lettuce.

Fruit and vegetable growers have the political advantage of being in states like California, Florida and Arizona, which are likely to be critical in the 2008 presidential election. But it is unclear how important the farm vote will be to the Democrats in the next election.

Under the proposed bill, an overseas marketing program would rise 75 percent, to $350 million a year. An existing specialty crop block-grant program would leap tenfold to $500 million a year. And the government would buy at least $400 million worth of fruits and vegetables annually for school lunch programs.

While the total cost of the proposed bill has yet to be tallied, it will probably reach a few billion dollars, coalition officials said. Whether the fruit and vegetable farmers can win that much will depend in large part on just how much money Congress allocates to farm spending next year.

If the farmers get what they want, consumers could benefit from more information and choice at the grocery store, said Professor Morici of the University of Maryland. At the same time, American growers could become more efficient and competitive.

"Things that help farmers band together and compete are not inherently protectionist or harmful," Professor Morici said. "It is not an unreasonable thing for a fragmented industry to ask the government for assistance to make the virtues of their industry better known."

He added, "Whatever money they put for research would benefit the consumer. That would run down their price, and eventually that information would get around the world."

Mr. Johanns, the agriculture secretary, said in a speech last month that American farm policy needed to be "equitable, predictable and beyond challenge." Noting the fruit and vegetable farmers' proposal, he said that farm programs could no longer be decided among a few commodities in a few parts of the country. "That day has changed," Mr. Johanns said.

The vegetable and fruit growers stood by silently for decades in large part because they did not need government assistance to be successful. While generating close to half of farm receipts, the specialty crops are grown on just 11 million acres of farmland, versus 215 million for the major commodity crops.

In California, new financing could not come soon enough for garlic farms like the Christopher Ranch. The Christophers, fourth-generation farmers in the state, have struggled to hold their market share, and it is not hard to see why: On the wholesale market, Chinese garlic recently cost $15 to $16 for a 30-pound box, compared with $28 for a box of California garlic.

In the late 1990s the Christopher Ranch's garlic production peaked at about 100 million pounds. Since then sales and acreage have fallen by more than 40 percent. In 2001 China began flooding the market with garlic, after managing to find ways around an import tariff of 377 percent.

As the demand for their garlic has fallen, the Christophers have turned to growing crops like pearl onions and shallots. The family hired a trade lawyer in Washington to try to battle tariff violations. Now they hope that the proposed crop bill will give them a chance to educate consumers and pay for more research into crop diseases.

"We don't want handouts," Mr. Mantelli said. "You don't want to just give people subsidies, because nobody learns from subsidies. But you want to give them opportunities and resources and tools to make their industry better."

Grand Old Protectionists (WP)

By Daniel Gross

Since the midterm elections, concerned internationalists have fretted that the incoming Democratic Congress will curtail the nation's free-trade policies. In Slate, Jacob Weisberg identified the new breed of protectionist Lou Dobbs Democrats. "So is America headed for a bout of protectionist class warfare?" worried the Economist. "With the Democrats having won a majority in Congress, and disquiet over globalization growing, a party faction that has been powerless -- the economic populists -- is emerging," Louis Uchitelle wrote in the New York Times. Washington Post columnist Sebastian Mallaby, reflecting the consensus, concluded that "the two parties have opposing attitudes on the subject of trade: Republicans see it as a source of growth, Democrats as a source of inequality."

However, these arguments misunderstand the new politics of trade. It's not a left-right split. Since 2000, Bush Republicans have done as much as Democrats, if not more, to erect trade barriers and tariffs. President Bush has talked a good game about free trade, and his administration has negotiated bilateral free trade agreements with Australia, Colombia, Morocco and several other countries. But just as free trade was a bipartisan project in the 1990s, this decade's anti-trade backlash has been bipartisan as well. Sens. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) share little in common besides a desire to slap huge protective tariffs on Chinese goods. And all by themselves, Republicans have done great damage to the cause of free trade in the past several years.

In March 2002, for example, Bush proudly signed "temporary safeguards" that imposed tariffs of 8 percent to 30 percent on most steel imports for three years. This was a classic Karl Rove option play: Advance the Republican cause in formerly Democratic strongholds of Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia at the expense of the companies and workers in industries nationwide that consume steel. When the World Trade Organization ruled the tariffs illegal, and retaliatory tariffs were set to be imposed on goods produced in Florida and other politically sensitive states, Bush ended the so-called safeguards in December 2003.

In May 2002, Bush signed the Farm Security and Rural Investment Act, which Republicans passed without much help from Democrats. Just six years after President Bill Clinton signed the 1996 Farm Bill, which slashed agricultural subsidies, Bush jacked up federal payments by as much as 80 percent for cash crops such as soybeans and corn and offered new subsidies for crops such as peanuts and lentils. He even revived the subsidies on honey, wool and mohair that Clinton had killed. Bush's signing of this bill led the Economist to brand him just about the worst thing the magazine can call anybody: an anti-globalizer.

The bill inspired threats of retaliation from aggrieved trading partners and contributed to a perception that Washington wasn't serious about making the tough decisions required to further free trade. In fact, some analysts have blamed the failure of the Doha Round of global trade talks this year on the U.S. refusal to alter its expensive anti-consumer, anti-free trade farm policy.

There's more. Earlier this year, Bush proposed dropping the absurd 54 cent-per-gallon tariff on imported ethanol, first enacted in 1980 (although he didn't recommend cutting the 51 cent-per gallon tax credit for domestic ethanol producers). The Republican Congress, filled with members from big corn-producing states, said no.

Even as lame ducks, Republicans in Congress haven't been unanimous voices for free trade. In mid-November, more than 60 Republicans voted against a proposed free-trade deal with Vietnam, supplying the margin of defeat and embarrassing the president on the eve of a state visit. The Wall Street Journal noted that a vote had been delayed in part because Graham and fellow GOP Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.) had put the bill on hold, pending measures protecting U.S. textile companies.

With the GOP base now shrunk to the Old Confederacy (sugar, cotton, peanuts) and the Great Plains (corn, wheat, soy), look for more of the same protectionism. Senate Minority Whip-elect Trent Lott (Miss.) doesn't like free trade in agricultural products any more than he likes affirmative action.

There's one other critical Republican failure when it comes to free trade. Encouraging the spread of trade means more than receiving cheap goods from China. It's about creating the social and political conditions favorable to the continued expansion of trade. Free trade has exposed U.S. workers to global competition on an unprecedented scale. In recent years, wages have stagnated (despite massive increases in corporate profits and steady economic growth), jobs have become more insecure, and benefits such as pensions and health care are being wiped out. Is free trade the cause of all these woes? Not necessarily. Does free trade coincide with all these woes? Absolutely.

Rightly or wrongly, many Americans, even those who reap the gains of trade daily, identify free trade and globalization with their declining financial security. And the response of Bush and congressional Republicans has essentially been: tough.

Companies facing ferocious overseas competition won't provide health care benefits anymore? Open a health savings account. Companies won't provide pensions? Privatize Social Security and cut benefits.

This you're-on-your-own attitude has ultimately been more damaging to the cause of free trade than anything the Democrats could do. Yet, in coming months, we're sure to hear a great deal of talk tarring Sen. Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) as the present-day incarnations of Sen. Reed Smoot and Rep. Willis C. Hawley, the sponsors of the disastrous Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930. By slapping massive tariffs on a vast range of imported goods, Smoot-Hawley helped turn a recession into the Great Depression.

But Smoot and Hawley were Republicans. And so was President Herbert Hoover, who signed that disastrous legislation into law. Today, the protectionist gene may no longer be dominant among Republicans, but it's still an important part of the GOP's DNA.

Death Toll Rises As Winter Storm Sweeps Across The Northeast (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

CHICAGO, Dec. 2 (AP) — The death toll from the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season rose to 11 as the system blew through the Northeast late Friday and early Saturday.

Two women were killed in Pennsylvania, one by a falling tree and another by a 30-foot-wide section of roof carried by the wind, state and local officials said.

In Ellenville, N.Y., about 100 miles north of New York City, another falling tree landed on a house and killed one person, the authorities said.

Winds of more than 50 miles per hour were recorded in parts of western Pennsylvania, and they hit 67 m.p.h. in western New York, according to the National Weather Service.

At Mr. Z's Food Mart in Mountain Top, Pa., about a half-dozen people suffered minor injuries when windows were blown out and ceiling tiles ripped down, fire officials said.

"The windows were shaking, and they just exploded," said Breanne Ralston, 17, a cashier at the store. "Everybody was screaming."

Earlier, the shoveling of heavy snow was linked to the deaths of two people in Wisconsin. In Affton, Mo., a suburb of St. Louis, an 87-year-old woman died Friday in a house fire that started after an ice-laden tree limb fell on a power line, fire officials said.

Near Paducah, Tex., a vehicle carrying a high school girls' basketball team overturned on an icy highway, killing a 14-year-old player and injuring seven others. Also on the highways, two storm-related deaths were reported Thursday in Missouri, one on Wednesday in Kansas, and one on Thursday in Oklahoma.

Many areas of Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri got more than a foot of snow, including Racine, Wis., which saw 14.5 inches. As far south as Tulsa, Okla., accumulations measured more than 10 inches. Schools and businesses across the region were closed, and hundreds of airline passengers were stranded.

The combination of sleet, rain and snow made travel treacherous. The police in Oklahoma urged people not to drive Friday night and early Saturday because snow had melted and was refreezing overnight.

Crews Work To Restore Power After Storm (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) — Utility crews worked overtime Saturday to restore electrical service to thousands of customers still blacked out by the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season.

As temperatures plummeted below freezing in the storm's aftermath, officials said some people could be without power for days. Missouri National Guard teams went door-to-door in the St. Louis area to make sure residents were surviving the cold.

The storm was blamed for at least 13 deaths as it spread ice and deep snow from Texas to Michigan and then blew through the Northeast late Friday and early Saturday. Schools and businesses were shuttered and hundreds of airline passengers had been stranded by canceled flights.

Trees were blown onto homes and cars, and a big Christmas tree in front of the New Hampshire Statehouse was toppled.

Truck driver David Huwe just got his 18-wheeler and load of frozen food back on the road Saturday after being stuck for more than 12 hours at a rest stop near Princeton, Ill., on Interstate 80, which was blocked by scores of trucks and cars that slid off the icy highway.

"I was supposed to be (in California) Sunday night," Huwe said by cellphone Saturday morning. He had revised his arrival time and hoped he'd make it by Monday.

Red Cross volunteers at Decatur had helped out some of those stranded I-80 travelers by ordering 100 McDonald's hamburgers, which were then airlifted by the National Guard.

"We had 35 minutes from the time we got the call to the airlift," Deb Helm said. McDonald's "was what was available."

Many areas of Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri got more than a foot of snow, including 16 inches in parts of central Missouri and 17 at Manistee, Mich. Fifteen inches fell as far south as Bartlesville, Okla.

Airlines were recovering from the widespread cancellations caused by the storm; delays at Lambert Airport in St. Louis were generally 15 minutes or less Saturday, according to the Federal Aviation Administration. There were no measurable delays Saturday at Chicago's two major airports, said Wendy Abrams, a spokeswoman for the Chicago Department of Aviation.

Highways were mostly clear but still had icy spots. "Nobody really should travel unless you absolutely have to get out," Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt said.

Chicago sent out about 170 snow-removal trucks Saturday morning to clear the city's side streets, after clearing main roads Friday.

About 427,000 Ameren Corp. customers were without power in Missouri and Illinois on Saturday afternoon, along with about 150 customers of ComEd in the greater Chicago area.

"It could be days before it's fully restored because it's really treacherous out there," Ameren spokeswoman Susan Gallagher said.

Blunt dispatched 150 Missouri National Guardsmen to the St. Louis region, along with 30 Humvees and a number of trucks. "We want to make sure our citizens are safe, warm and well cared-for," said Ed Martin, the governor's chief of staff.

As the storm moved east, gusty wind blacked out more customers from Tennessee to New York. About 12,000 homes and businesses were still without power Saturday across upstate New York. About 1,500 waited for power in Michigan. In Pennsylvania, more than 19,000 homes, mostly in the western part of the state, had no electricity, state Emergency Management Agency spokesman Justin Fleming said.

Two tornadoes were reported in Pennsylvania, with one blowing out the windows of Mr. Z's Food Mart in Mountain Top. About a half-dozen people suffered minor injuries, fire officials said.

"The windows were shaking and they just exploded. Everybody was screaming," said Food Mart cashier Breanne Ralston, 17.

Two women were killed in Pennsylvania, one by a falling tree and another by a wind-blown section of roof, and another falling tree landed on a house and killed one person in New York, authorities said. Two men over the age of 60 died after shoveling snow in Wisconsin, and an 87-year-old woman died in the St. Louis areas in a house fire that started when an ice-laden tree limb fell on a power line, fire officials said.

Storm-related traffic deaths included two in Missouri, one in Kansas and one in Oklahoma. Near Paducah, Texas, a vehicle carrying high school girls' basketball players overturned on an icy highway, killing a 14-year-old player and injuring seven other people.

In Illinois, a woman died after being struck by a snow plow that was backing up, and a 67-year-old man collapsed died of complications from heart disease after trimming tree limbs with a hand saw.

A Dream Blown Away (WP)

By Joel Garreau

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

A place near the water has been an American dream for a very long time. Fifty-four percent of Americans live within 50 miles of a coast.

This is the year, however, in which the big boys in global finance got religion about climate change. As a result, this American dream -- as far north as the Washington area, and even New York and New England -- is under attack.

Follow the money. Insurance doesn't sound like a world-changer. It seems so banal and prosaic, like reliable electricity or clean water.

Yet without it -- you want a place to live? You cannot get a mortgage without insurance.

You want a job? A commercial enterprise cannot run without insurance.

Never want a drink of water / Til the well runs dry. / Never miss a real good thing / Til he says good-bye.

Turns out you don't have to wait for the waves to lap around your ankles. The climate is changing, Lord knows exactly how fast. But the money is moving pretty quickly.

Call 2006 the Batten Down the Hatches Moment.

When Peg and Ronald Buchanan left Silver Spring two years ago for retirement, they saw as their nest egg the house they'd built right on the ocean in the North Carolina Outer Banks.

It's a big place -- eight bedrooms, nine baths, three stories, 5,000 square feet, heated pool, kiddie pool, wild horses out back, dolphins out front. "It sits like a palace in the sky," Peg says. The front door is 12 feet above sea level. They figured on selling it for $2 million. The proceeds would pay for the rest of their lives.

Now they're wondering if they will ever be able to sell it. The map of their part of Carova Beach has been redrawn as a high-risk flood area by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. As a result, it may not be possible for any new buyer to get a mortgage.

Even on their existing loan, the Buchanans are having a hard time getting flood insurance. On a house that cost $700,000 to build and furnish, their lender has been able to get them only a $250,000 policy, with a $50,000 deductible.

The thought of losing their retirement reserve "really makes me mad," Peg says. "I feel like going over with a shotgun."

Emotion, however, does not drive insurance writers. By definition, they are the world's most serious futurists. When it comes to life insurance, for example, they pride themselves on their ability to routinely and accurately predict when a whole lot of people are going to die. If their models are wrong, and they have to pay out too much money too quickly, they go bankrupt.

As a result, these fiduciaries have a long and distinguished history of driving social change. Passion-laden causes move beyond the realm of hand-waving activists when large gray men in large gray suits decide they must.

Highway fatalities dropped when insurance companies started financially punishing unsafe drivers, as well as makers of unsafe cars. Cigarette smokers saw their life insurance premiums skyrocket.

The big buzz in the insurance industry today is climate change.

Lloyd's of London's June report is titled: "Climate Change: Adapt or Bust."

The 2005 hurricane season gave the United States supposedly once-in-a-century storms, one right after the other. Katrina, Rita and Wilma were among the seven most expensive hurricanes ever to hit the country. Companies that had to eat too much of the $51.5 billion in insured losses went under.

The big problem with climate change for the insurance companies is not the risk. Their whole business is getting paid to accept risks.

The trouble is that their traditional means of calculating what is an acceptable risk -- and how much to charge for it -- is based on history.

It assumes that tomorrow will pretty much behave like yesterday.

Now they think that when it comes to the weather, the world is moving.

Wind and flood seem to be playing by new rules.

Batten down the hatches.Fear of Buying

When insurance companies refuse your trade, it's nothing personal. It's just business.

You can tell by the marvelously emotion-free language the industry uses: "Cat coverage," for example, is about catastrophe. "Wind" means hurricane. "Insufficient capacity" and "the market won't clear" refer to climate risks so difficult to calculate that traditional commercial providers won't sell you new insurance or renew your old insurance at any price.

At any price.

This spring, "astonishingly, the capital markets were full up on Florida wind," says Peter Nakada, managing director of RMS Consulting -- short for Risk Management Solutions, one of the industry's foremost risk modeling firms. "That capacity shut down in the frenzy prior to this wind season. People were scrambling to get coverage. That was brand-new. We saw the market saturate.

"People couldn't renew."

Some of those people facing insurance crises have a hard time understanding why.

"I feel sorry for Katrina victims -- it was a terrible thing," Peg Buchanan says. "But I don't see why the rest of the world should be punished because we like oceanfront."

Bill Hogan, with Twiddy & Co. Realtors in the Outer Banks, explains: "What's happened is that there is a stretch of land north of Corolla with no federally subsidized flood insurance. It's called, locally, the Four Wheel Drive Area. No hard-surface roads. It includes Swan Beach, North Swan Beach and Carova Beach. There are houses up there -- 14-bedroom oceanfronts -- for about $2 million," Hogan says. "Buy a lot for about a million. Build a house for about a million."

But then FEMA redrew the flood map. "All of a sudden, the lenders are requiring flood insurance where they did not in the past." The only source "for the kind of insurance the lender requires is somebody like Lloyd's of London. It might have a $50,000 deductible, and still be prohibitively expensive."

Hogan says he's now seeing "$100,000 lots plummeting in value. I don't know what they're worth. Nothing is selling. Buyers are afraid to buy. All kinds of rumors are flying around -- insurance companies are pulling out. The net effect is you bought property and it was in a good zone, and all of a sudden you sit there and it's deemed to be bad. Right now people are scrambling. Getting letters from banks -- 'We have no record of your flood insurance.' Just the kiss of death for the owner of the lot," Hogan says.

In Delaware, Westfield Insurance has canceled all coastal policies, and "we've been told that there are others who are starting to restrict their coastal writings next year -- bigger players in the market," says Michael Vild, deputy state insurance commissioner. He adds, plaintively, "There have never been hurricane-force winds in the state of Delaware in recorded weather history. We think companies restricting coastal coverage are overreacting. Although if we have a couple more years like 2005, it's going to be extremely difficult to get coverage."

There are 438,000 people living in low-lying Virginia Beach. It is marked by high-rise hotels smack on the water, without even dunes between the boardwalk and the surf.

In October, State Farm stopped writing new insurance on businesses within 2,500 feet of the ocean there. In November, Traveler's Insurance refused to sell or renew residential insurance there without a 3 percent hurricane deductible. On a $500,000 house -- no longer uncommon -- that means if you get hit by a hurricane, the first $15,000 comes out of your pocket.

In Ocean City, new construction has become formidably fortified. Almost all of the island is expected to be underwater in a major blow. But on the ocean side, which will take the brunt of a storm surge -- a wind-driven wall of a water -- local government requires homes to be built on pilings driven perhaps 20 feet into the ground, sticking up some seven feet. Sixteen-inch bolts then attach the beams on which the house is built to the pilings, and each floor joist is attached to the beams with steel straps. The walls and roof are then held onto the beams and each other with more steel.

"I don't know of any other jurisdiction in the state of Maryland that runs the hurricane system we run," says Mike Richardson, Ocean City's chief building official. It is designed to withstand sustained winds of 90 miles per hour with three-second gusts to 110.

Will such fortifications become common around Washington? "Katrina showed us that inland areas are susceptible to flooding," Richardson says. "We're not just talking about the ocean -- we're talking about Chesapeake Bay, talking about Deep Creek Lake flooding. The Potomac has flooded before. So has the James."Dire Forecasts

So far, climate change has shaken the market most notably in high-value coastal areas. But if weather losses get worse, upheaval will become more common.

There is no question that the insurance industry is focused on how weather losses are getting worse.

In early September, when the leaders of the big European reinsurance companies had their annual gathering -- called the Rendez-Vous, in the posh principality of Monte Carlo -- one of the big discussion points was the gap between supply and demand for reinsurance in U.S. wind-affected areas, according to the industry journal, Reactions.

Reinsurers are the big boys who can throw around numbers with nine or 10 zeroes at the end and still sleep at night. They insure the insurers, buying risk beyond the appetite of ordinary companies. The most romanticized is Lloyd's of London. However, when Swiss Re and Munich Re talk, all conversation in the room ends until whatever is on their minds stops reverberating.

Today, what's on their mind is climate change.

"There are horror stories about the frequency and severity of hurricanes increasing," Reactions reported in September. That plus the skyrocketing number and value of properties on the U.S. coastline "has prompted many to question whether it is possible to write catastrophe business profitably."

At all.

"If you feel the price is not right, you pull out," matter-of-factly acknowledges Kurt Karl, head of economic research and consulting with Swiss Re in New York.

Since 1971, "Insured U.S. weather-related losses are growing 10 times faster than premiums and the overall economy," reports Ceres, a coalition whose observations get attention from the big boys in part because they've built a climate-risk network that includes 50 institutional investors managing more than $3 trillion.

Unacceptable Risk

Insurance companies approach climate change bracingly free of theory. They take only an academic interest in whether the wind blows because of increases in carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, or cyclical fluctuations in the Atlantic, or the huffing and puffing of the Big Bad Wolf.

They just want to calculate the odds. They want to know how many chips to put on the table.

And where.

"Two effects are going on," says Nakada, of the risk modeling firm RMS. "Hurricane activity rates have gone up." But also, "Hurricanes are perceived to be longer-lived. These longer-lived hurricanes have a better chance of sneaking up the coast. The view of vulnerability has changed."

The specter looms of the big hurricanes of 1938 and 1954. Those Category 3 hurricanes devastated New England. Storm surges of 13 and 12 feet, respectively, swept through Providence, R.I. Historic markers demonstrate how high the water rose downtown. They are over your head. Photos show seas crashing over the top of a harbor lighthouse. It is 70 feet tall. Beach homes were swept out to sea.

"Our view is that there are some events that have the potential to be so large as to exceed the capabilities of the insurance industry, as well as the funding and financing capability of individual states," says Michael Trevino, the spokesman for Allstate, one of the nation's largest home insurance companies. "Those are events that have the potential to be $100 billion. These events are so enormous, no entity has the ability to manage it."

Some require little imagination, such as a Category 4 hitting Miami or a Category 4 coming up the Houston Ship Channel aimed at the center of the U.S. oil industry, and America's fourth-largest city.

But the one Allstate is focused on is a Category 3 funneling straight north up New York Harbor. Pushing a wall of water perhaps 15 feet tall up Broadway toward the second-story windows of Wall Street.

This is why Allstate has decided not to write new homeowners insurance in the five boroughs of New York City -- Manhattan, Brooklyn, the Bronx, Queens and Staten Island -- plus Westchester County, just north of the city, and the counties that make up Long Island -- Nassau and Suffolk. In the most vulnerable parts of that market, they are also not renewing existing insurance.

"What we decided was that the total insured property values in New York State are about $1.9 trillion. We have a big share of the homes in that state" -- in the eight counties, Allstate's market share was 26 percent.

"Fundamentally, we've got enough exposure, thank you."

To Move or Not to Move

What does this mean for the future of beautiful areas around Washington near big bad bodies of water, from Duck to Rehoboth and from Alexandria to Annapolis?

"If you have a ton of money and don't mind paying three times the insurance as two years ago, you're probably happy," Nakada says. "There'll be all sorts of property available on the coast in warm weather places if the market gets more efficient."

But what about for the rest of us?

"In terms of affecting where people live and do business, three things have to happen: The risk has to go up a lot. And it just did. Number two, the market needs to allow that cost to be passed on to customers, or not. In which case, number three, either the price goes up, or the availability goes down in insurance.

"At that point you would think hard about whether you want to move."

Batten down the hatches.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

How The FBI Took Down A Deadly Jersey Gang (NSL)

By JOHN P. MARTIN, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), December 3, 2006

Details of 4-year effort reveal depth of problem still facing state

The depth of New Jersey's gang problem dawned on John Havens on a steamy Sunday four years ago as he parked along Ninth Street in Newark.

Havens, a 32-year-old FBI agent, had his eyes on a two-story corner house where nearly 50 young men had gathered for a barbecue. One wore a hidden microphone that piped the proceedings to the agent's vehicle.

Havens and a Newark detective had waited for five hours with the engine off and windows up. Finally, the man known as "Massacre" began to preach.

"I'm the same as you! We Blood," Tewhan Butler thundered to the backyard crowd. "Blood ain't got sh-- to do with how much money you got, how fresh your clothes is! ... It's dealing with Blood, what you gonna live for, what you gonna die for."

Havens had been in law enforcement for a decade and never heard anything like it. Butler, 22, was surprisingly charismatic; his audience was rapt.

"It's no room for ego!" Butler said, in a rant that lasted more than an hour. "Everybody put that big man sh-- to the side! Whether y'all like it or not, I'm running the motherf-- show. I'm gonna stay running this motherf-- show."

The FBI agent suddenly understood why youngsters idolized Butler and why older teens lined up to join his East Orange set. And he realized why New Jersey's gang problem was probably more dangerous than many knew.

The Double ii Bloods, as they were called, brought gangs to a new level. They met weekly to discuss business and Blood codes, and to break in members. Over the years, they absorbed a generation from the same neighborhood.

Their discipline was matched only by their numbing penchant for violence. Double ii members were responsible for at least 27 murders, countless shootings, assaults and drug deals. Crimes were like merit badges -- earned and worn proudly.

Their victims included an East Orange father gunned down in front of his family because he warned gang members to stay away from his 8-year-old son, and a Newark teen killed by a Blood who wanted to try out his new guns.

The meeting recorded that afternoon on Ninth Street marked a turning point in the FBI investigation. Dismantling the set would take four more years, testing agents' ability to follow the trail of violence, entangling informants who risked death, and allowing prosecutors for the first time to pursue gangs as organized enterprises with a single purpose: crime.

It ended last month with the 42nd federal conviction, a guilty verdict against Preston "Death" Jones. Butler and four others took plea deals that will send them to jail for at least 25 years.

A look at the case -- from court documents, transcripts, and interviews with agents, prosecutors, attorneys, a Bloods member -- presents a window into the state's still ripe gang problem.

The crime rate in East Orange plunged after the demise of the Double ii Bloods, with 500 fewer violent offenses last year than in 2002. An ongoing crackdown by local police is pushing that rate even lower.

But investigators aren't fooling themselves. The Double ii's weren't the only gang; drugs are still available in East Orange. And in a recent trip through the set's turf, Havens noticed a boy, probably not more than 12, throwing up hand signals that meant just one thing:

Bloods.

OPERATION CRIMSON TIDE

Like many East Orange residents, LaQuan Brooks had watched as the gangs took control of pockets of his city.

On July 25, 2002, he heard news that sent him over the edge: The corner dealers had taken an interest in his 8-year-old son and namesake, letting little LaQuan handle their cash and jewelry.

Brooks, 29, stormed to 15th Street, where the boy lived with his mother. Witnesses said he began screaming at the crimson-clad young men, warning them to leave his son alone.

One ran off to Amir Winn, a 19-year-old Blood known as "Young Gangster," and reported that the irate father was "disrespecting" the set.

Winn had stashed a weapon in a nearby house. "Take me to get my gun," he told the underling, who later recounted the conversation for agents. "I'm going to show you how to murder someone."

Armed with a .380-caliber weapon, Winn arrived at 15th Street and asked aloud who was looking for him. Brooks stepped forward. As a crowd of children watched, Winn fired a single shot into his chest.

The 8-year-old rushed to his fallen father, witnesses reported. Then he turned to Winn. "Y.G., why you kill my daddy?" the boy asked.

Winn pointed the gun toward the child, paused and strolled away.

He was captured a week later. In the apartment where he had been hiding, police found the murder weapon and photos of Winn posing with it.

Brooks' death was one of 18 killings in East Orange in 2002, the city's highest murder toll in a dozen years. Aggravated assaults and robberies hit eight-year peaks. No one disputed gangs were behind the surge.

What was happening in East Orange had been unfolding across the nation. A 1996 Justice Department study warned gang-related crime had doubled in the previous two decades and was rising in cities of all sizes. Gangs were blamed for more than 580,000 serious crimes a year.

New Jersey was no different. In the early 1990s, under the FBI's new Safe Streets Violent Crime Initiative, the Newark division was among the first nationwide to team agents with local officers to battle street crime and find fugitives. As the problem worsened, the task force was split so one unit, the Violent Crime Criminal Enterprise Task Force, could focus on gangs.

Much of the crime was blamed on pockets of aimless young men who sold drugs and banded together simply because they grew up on the same blocks.

Toward the end of the decade, task-force members began noticing the widening presence of what some call super-gangs, structured groups that demand discipline from their members but promise strength in numbers. They had officers, codes and a network for guns, drugs and support.

Once confined to California and the Southwest, the Bloods and their rivals, the Crips, had arrived on the East Coast.

Authorities say local prisons did as much to feed the problem as to cure it. Criminals discovered that joining a gang became necessary for survival behind bars. And after being freed, ex-cons brought the gang mentality back to the neighborhoods.

Urban settings like East Orange, where more than a third of the households earn less than $25,000 a year, were fertile ground.

"If you're a poor kid growing up in East Orange, what do you really have?" said Marc Agnifilo, the assistant U.S. attorney who headed the office's gang unit. "You have the neighborhood you're from."

For years, police and prosecutors used a narrow approach when it came to gang members, charging individual criminals with individual crimes. The result meant shorter jail sentences and no real effect on the organizations that groomed gangsters.

But the gang's military-like hierarchy presented a new opportunity.

Racketeering, a charge previously reserved for Mafia cases, allowed the government to pursue gangs as criminal enterprises. By bundling together crimes committed over years, prosecutors would dim the chances for gangsters to return quickly to the streets. If gang members chose to act like mobsters, the thinking went, they should be prosecuted like mobsters.

"What we try to do is dismantle the business of a gang," said Leslie Wiser, special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark division.

Such a strategy had been tried by federal prosecutors in other parts of the country, but never in New Jersey.

In 2001, Agnifilo met with FBI Special Agent Ronald Lyman, a veteran agent supervising the gang task force. Gangs were among the state's most pressing threats, Lyman told the prosecutor. He had first started looking at the local Bloods sets two years earlier; they were ripe for a racketeering prosecution.

Late that year, Lyman assigned the investigation to Havens, a rookie agent who had joined the FBI's Newark division a year earlier after a decade as a cop in Phoenix and Syracuse, N.Y. Serina Vash, another assistant U.S. attorney, also joined the case.

Lyman had already given the investigation a code name, Operation Crimson Tide.

Now they needed to get inside the Double ii's.

THE MONEY, THE BLING

By 1993, East Orange had its share of street gangs, groups with names like the Gutter Ratz, the Drama Lords, the Steel Click crew. But an unlikely pair of visitors consolidated them all.

At the time, Naughty By Nature, the East Orange-based rap group, had climbed the music charts. Fans swarmed as their tour bus pulled into the old neighborhood one day that summer.

Within the tour entourage were two California men, decked out in red Bloods garb. The visitors were aspiring rappers who went by the names True G and Love Child. They were also Bloods members.

At a cookout that week, the two men began preaching Bloods platitudes to the local teens. They promised solidarity, security, an identity. They weren't prominent Bloods back in California, agents later learned, but they had money, they had bling. The East Orange kids were awed.

"We was in love with the thing, ya know what I mean?" said one gang member, who was there at the time, and spoke on the condition of anonymity because he later cooperated with the FBI. "It was just the fact that we was young, we had nothing to grab onto in the neighborhood. We were so accustomed to the same ol' thing every day. And these dudes were really gang-banging. That was something was gonna bring us all together."

They came up with a set name -- the Double ii -- to tie together Inglewood, birthplace of the Bloods, and Illtown, the street nickname for East Orange.

Over the next few years, 15th and William streets transformed into ground zero for the Double ii. Bloods symbols and red spray paint sprouted on sidewalks and walls. Red shirts and bandannas were everywhere. Tired of the endless graffiti, one merchant gave in and painted his entire storefront red.

Teens studied Blood histories, codes and the 31 rules. Members learned that "031" represents love for Bloods, "235" is shorthand for the Double ii set and that a "550" is a civilian. A gang member marked for punishment became "food." Killing a rival was "puttin' in work."

They identified allies -- sets like the nearby Gangsta Killa Bloods, and Brick City Brims -- and agreed not to cross each others' turfs. They found their enemies -- the North Side Killer Gangstas, a Crips set blocks away.

The most disciplined Double ii's changed their everyday speech, replacing the letter c with b. Words like "cause" and "comfortable" became "bause" and "bomfortable." Crips are Brips; cars are bars.

The Double ii's sold heroin from the street 24 hours a day, splitting it up into four six-hour shifts, the former member said, stashing guns and drugs in an abandoned house dubbed the Rathole. He earned up to $2,500 a shift, but it quickly melted away, spent on clothes, jewelry, concerts, even a new car.

"As quick as you make it, you blow it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0101346

The operation got a boost, he said, when one gang member, Quadree "Trouble" Smith, established a connection with a New York trafficker. Smith was among the older and more experienced gangsters; besides a criminal record, he had scars from nearly a half-dozen bullet wounds.

But if Smith emerged as the set's business brains, Butler, the man they called Massacre, was its soul.

A LEADER EMERGES

Slight, about 5-foot-7 and barely 140 pounds, Butler lived with his mother. Agents learned that he had once been a target for school bullies. Now he was deadly passionate.

Tattoos covered almost every visible patch of Butler's arms and neck. Two teardrops were stenciled under one eye; a single drop under the other. He dyed his dreadlocks red.

"Mass is the only people I can honestly say really, really, really believed in his heart," said his one-time associate. "His tongue was like a sword."

Butler cemented his reputation in October 2000. About 4 a.m. one day, he drove to an East Orange gas station where a rival, Robin Dwayne "Jabb" Thompson, was selling drugs. Butler covered his face, walked up behind Thompson and fired two shots into the back of his head.

The next summer, True G returned to East Orange and officially anointed Butler the set's leader, or 101, during a ceremony in Oval Park, the member said. Nine others were named to so-called "status" posts, with titles like ministers of defense and information.

"Once it became gang-affiliated, it was just like we had a chain of command -- orders was being given, orders had to be followed," the member said.

The gang grew steadily. At the May 26, 2002, barbecue -- the first recorded by agents -- seven more came to join. Butler gathered them together.

"Start from this man, go all the way around," he said, according to a recording and transcript of the meeting introduced at Jones' trial. "Let everybody know who y'all be, why y'all wanna bang."

What followed was something that sounded almost like a 12-step group.

"I be Bloody Mass, I be 101, I be that big homie," Butler told them. "I bang for you, you bang for me. That's how it's gonna go down."

After introductions, Butler asked every gang member to air grievances or share with the group. Holler at the world, he directed.

They did. They complained that some were breaking the rules, missing meetings, using drugs. One challenged how some acted in front of girls.

Then came the beatings.

Butler called on prospective inductees to come forward. To join, each knew, they had to withstand an attack for 31 seconds.

The agent and police detective listened as each young man stepped up to be battered. "Blood 31, Blood 30, Blood 29..." went the chant.

Not everyone passed the test. One crumbled to the ground under a torrent of punches and kicks.

"Whip his ass!" Butler commanded. "He ain't Blood! Make him never wanna walk back in here!"

As the wannabe lay bleeding and motionless, some began to question whether he was alive. The meeting began to break up. "Put that n-- in the bar, take him somewhere," an unidentified voice said.

Butler seemed less interested in the injured man than in the scattering crowd. He ordered an associate to get the "new breeds" their induction paperwork. And he reminded everyone about the next meeting.

"Hey, yo! Sunday, 2:35, Oval Park," he said. "Sunday, 2:35, Oval Park."

The recording, by a low-level gang member who has never been publicly identified, gave investigators the foundation for a racketeering charge. Membership, a leadership structure, discussion of criminal activity -- it was all there. Butler even admitted that he had "pushed" people, code for murder. Surveillance video helped them match names to faces and voices.

But they needed proof of specific crimes. They needed witnesses. And they needed some luck.

A DEADLY PIPELINE

Infiltrating a gang of young men who use brutal violence and tattoos to identify themselves was a high hurdle. Havens was typical of a newer agent -- a thirtysomething former cop, white, with light hair, a boyish face and a trace of his upstate New York roots in his voice. All of which meant he had no shot of getting inside the Double ii's.

Their first informant had been an unexpected gift, introduced months earlier to Lyman and Havens by an FBI agent in North Carolina. The young man, an East Orange native, had been convicted in a case down there and was coming home for a final visit before prison. The Carolina agent proposed that he help the FBI in New Jersey.

Lyman and Havens met with the prospective cooperator. Over the next few months, before he went to jail, he recorded more than 100 meetings, transactions and conversations with gang members.

A veteran East Orange police detective, Nick Martinez, joined Havens on the investigation. Martinez was one of a handful of local officers detailed to the FBI task force. He knew the neighborhoods and some of the suspects by name, having arrested them over the years.

At the same time, the prosecutors caught another break. Agnifilo and one of his office's investigators, Joe Greco, had been poring over Newark police reports on guns that had been recovered or confiscated in crimes. They were looking for names and patterns when Greco noticed three guns purchased from the same store in Xenia, Ohio, about 20 miles east of Dayton.

Agents traced the gun registrations to students at Wilberforce University in Ohio. Those students told agents that a classmate from Newark, Seon Peton, paid them to act as straw buyers. Confronted, Peton admitted selling the weapons to an Essex County man he knew only as Jay.

Shutting the gun pipeline became a priority. The Double ii's insisted that ranking members carry weapons, and few seemed reluctant to use them.

Jamal Coward, known as J-Rock, bought several of the Ohio guns. One was a Leinad semiautomatic, a favorite among gang members because it looked like an Uzi. The other was a .45-caliber handgun.

On a Monday morning in April 2002, Coward told Anthony Ward he wanted to play with his new toys. The pair climbed into a red Acura and drove to 22nd Street in Irvington -- a Crips neighborhood. With weapons in both hands, Coward began spraying the block with gunfire.

Erron Lewin, 19, lived on the street but wasn't a Crip. He was standing near his driveway when a bullet pierced his neck. Lewin collapsed and died. Three others were wounded.

Witnesses had little to offer police; one recalled the shooter yelling out something that sounded like "Bla-dat." What they probably heard was "Blatt," shorthand for "Blood Love All The Time," the Bloods' rallying cry. There were no suspects.

The next day, gang members later told agents, Coward found a reference to the shooting in The Star-Ledger and took the newspaper clip to the set leaders. He wanted credit for "putting in work."

He got it.

Two years would pass before Havens would be able to return to the neighborhood and tell Lewin's aunt they had finally solved the murder. The meeting turned out to be a low point for the agent.

The aunt explained that her nephew had been looking forward to an upcoming job interview when he was killed. She had even bought the teen a new suit for the occasion.

Instead, she buried him in it.

ENLISTING AN INSIDER

Cultivating confidential informants is among the most important -- and draining -- tasks for federal agents, something akin to adopting troubled children. Many have criminal records, addictions, no real jobs. They need attention, cash, reinforcement.

Approaching the wrong one at the wrong time can be fatal to a case.

For months, Havens and the task force had relied on outsiders to build their case. Some were paid, some cooperated to save themselves.

They bought drugs and guns from lower-level gang members in "controlled buys," transactions that were recorded and monitored by teams of agents and police officers. These were the building blocks for the case, crimes that could be charged at any time. But to flesh out the criminal enterprise, they needed to get closer.

Investigators learned Smith and one of his associates, Michael Harris, had a falling out over money and that Double ii members later robbed Harris. Agents and prosecutors believed that if they could turn Harris, they could get valuable insight into the Double ii's. If they failed, however, they might expose the investigation.

They sent an informant to buy guns and drugs from Harris. Then they waited. In early 2003, they picked up Harris on the minor charges. Quickly, he began cooperating. He laid out the history of the Double ii's, explained to them where Smith bought heroin in New York and how the drugs were distributed and stashed.

Prosecutors now had pieces of both a gun and a drug network.

They had evidence against many of their targets, but decided against a flashy roundup. They wanted to protect informants and keep their wide-ranging case a secret. They also still hoped to flip a ranking gang member and penetrate the Double ii's leadership.

So they began picking up suspects one at a time, waiting until they were alone and quietly hustling them into a minivan driven by Martinez. Most were charged with drug distribution or gun charges, enough to isolate and jail them.

Other agencies also got involved. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives had already been investigating the Ohio gun store. And federal prosecutors met regularly with their Essex County counterparts to identify unsolved murders and help build a case.

As the lead agent, Havens increasingly spent most of his days -- and many of his nights -- on the Double ii's. His laptop held thousands of photos, documents and files about gang member and their crimes. Sources called at all hours of the night. His Sundays fell into an unsettling pattern: sitting in church in the morning, sitting in an unmarked car outside a Bloods meeting in the afternoon.

His stable of informants had expanded and key Bloods were being jailed.

In October 2002, county prosecutors had jailed Butler, charging him with a double homicide in Newark. FBI agents participated in the arrest, but didn't let on about their racketeering investigation.

In 2003, Smith pleaded guilty to manslaughter charges in Superior Court in Essex County, but he was released on bail and went on the lam.

A confidential informant told Havens and Martinez they could find him in the Bronx, living around a stretch of apartment buildings along Pelham Parkway. The tip was rather broad, but the agents headed to the neighborhood hopeful for any clue, like a car with New Jersey plates.

As they pulled onto the block, they got something even better: Smith crossed the street right in front of them. He had changed his hairstyle, and wore a Boston Celtics jersey and a baseball cap, but couldn't hide his pride. Wrapped around his wrist was a $32,000 diamond-studded watch.

Martinez slipped out of the car and, gun drawn, inched up behind his target. As he lunged for Smith, the stunned gang member fell to the ground. He looked up almost relieved that he was being arrested, not ambushed.

Butler continued to direct the gang's activities from jail. In late 2003, with many of the gang's status members behind bars, he declared a new, two-tiered hierarchy for the Double ii's, one to oversee the set in prison and a second group to continue running operations in East Orange. He spelled out the plan in a letter delivered back to the neighborhood.

By then the feds had found their insider. Havens had persuaded a ranking Double ii member to secretly cooperate.

Becoming an informant could be deadly. Bloods rules demanded cooperators on the street be killed and that those in prison be slashed in the face, marked in a way all Bloods members would recognize.

But the new informant, the same one who had been awed by the Bloods as a teen in the 1990s, decided cooperating was more appealing that dying behind bars. "I really wanted a way out," he said in a telephone interview last month. "I saw a way out. I saw a light under the tunnel."

Freed from prison, he returned to the neighborhood and discovered the Double ii's had become more aware of law enforcement and more cautious. At least once, he ditched his recording device before a meeting because he feared being strip-searched.

But he resumed his role as a status member. And when the new leaders decided they needed a new hide-out to discuss business, the informant offered a solution.

His "cousin," he said, had moved to tiny one-bedroom apartment just a block from 15th and William streets. For a few bucks, he said, she might let them congregate there.

They agreed. The cousin was slightly older and the gang members took an instant liking to her. One even helped her hang drapes.

But in reality she was no cousin. She was an undercover FBI agent. The apartment was wired, with a hidden camera in the living room. It gave investigators the glimpse inside the Double ii that they had long been seeking.

In one conversation, they heard status members plot the death of a rival Crip who had strayed too often into their turf. (Agents scrambled to warn him of the death threat.) The camera was running when J-Rock admitted to the shooting spree that killed Erron Lewin. It's also how investigators discovered Anthony Copeland's murderer.

Copeland, 16, lived in a Crips neighborhood in East Orange. Prosecutors never found proof he belonged to a gang.

Samir Moses, on the other hand, wanted to join the Double ii's but had been turned down. On a Saturday night in April 2004, he tried to earn his way in.

Cruising in a stolen car in East Orange with two Double ii members, Moses saw Copeland outside his house. He jumped from the car, pointed a .357-caliber snub-nose handgun toward the teen and uttered the Bloods salutation, "What's poppin'?"

Then he shot Copeland in the chest.

The killing wasn't too different from other random gang murders. But as Vash, the assistant U.S. Attorney, pored over the evidence, she was stung in particular by a photo of the victim's clothes. It suddenly reminded her how young he was.

"His socks," she said, "had little puppies on them."

Not long after the shooting, Moses admitted to the killing in a recorded conversation at the apartment. Days later, he was arrested.

By late summer 2004, nearly all the gang members had been jailed on drug or other charges. Prosecutors settled in to finalize their racketeering indictment.

Havens had one thing to do: He went to see Massacre.

SHOW AND TELL

With nearly all of the gang members locked up on drug or other charges, Havens visited Butler for the first time that fall at Trenton State Prison. It was Butler's 25th birthday, Oct. 1, 2004.

The two men had never spoken, but they knew of each other and knew why Havens was there. A racketeering indictment was looming; some members were cooperating. Both men knew many of the defendants would follow Butler's lead. If he took a plea, the rest would, too.

He chose not to.

"I know I'm never going home," Butler said, according to the agent. "I'm Mass. I'm 101."

But he agreed to exert his influence on one other gang member, his younger brother, Steven Butler. Massacre scrawled a note for Havens to deliver. In it, he gave his brother permission to cooperate and negotiate a plea.

Tell them "about me -- only me," Butler wrote.

Two weeks later, a federal grand jury indicted 19 Double ii members for racketeering. The 94-page charging document laid out the history of the gang set and spelled out five murders, 14 attempted murders and a list of other crimes.

Over the next 15 months, prosecutors twice revised the indictment. Some were crimes the defendants had already been charged with or convicted of in state courts, but were folded in as proof of the criminal enterprise. The last indictment, this past January, added murder allegations against Butler for the 2000 execution of Thompson.

By that time, many lower-ranking Double ii's had pleaded out. The leaders, however, wouldn't budge, perhaps wary of crossing each other. They were slated for a September trial under heavy security and with an anonymous jury.

The logjam broke one morning last April, when Agnifilo and Vash called the attorneys for the remaining defendants to federal court in Newark for a conference. When they arrived, some of the defenders were surprised to see their clients sitting, handcuffed, side by side in the jury box.

Armed U.S. marshals lined the courtroom and hallway. The doors were closed and locked.

The prosecutors began to spell out their case to the defendants, a group "show and tell" designed to push them toward a plea.

The defense attorneys had never seen anything like it. One stormed out. Others objected to the format and huddled in the hallway. But when they asked the gang members if they wanted to continue, all said yes.

Over the next several hours, Agnifilo and Vash let the defendants see what a jury would see. They played audio from the backyard barbecue and aired video from the apartment. They passed around photos of victims.

Vash read from transcripts of their secretly recorded conversations. Agnifilo promised that jurors would hear little LaQuan describe his father's murder.

As the prosecutors spoke, some of the gang members squirmed, turning to see how Butler responded or whispering about who the informants might be. Some asked questions.

"What's in it for us?" Amir Winn finally said. It seemed to be a bold question from the man accused of gunning down the 8-year-old's father.

The reply was terse: You might not spend the rest of your life in prison.

Within weeks, half of the defendants agreed to plead guilty. The rest, including Butler and Smith, held out for five more months. On Sept. 21, as their trial was about to begin, the pair struck a deal.

Butler acknowledged being the set leader, selling heroin, killing Thompson and ordering gang members to commit murders. At one point, Vash asked him if the Double ii's functioned with a chain of command.

"I was the chain of command," Butler told U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden.

The judge scheduled the sentencings for early next year. Butler is expected to get at least 30 years in prison without parole.

A BATTLE, NOT THE WAR

The gang problem has not disappeared in East Orange. A few days before the pleas in September, the city's civilian police director, Jose Cordero, announced the arrests of 76 gang members in the previous two months. Some identified themselves as Double ii members.

"What we're seeing now is a lot of folks coming out of prison after doing some time," said Cordero, a former New York City anti-gang coordinator.

But it's a far cry from when he arrived two years ago, Cordero said. At that time, he was stunned to see gangs operating brazenly on city streets.

The FBI's Violent Crime Criminal Enterprise task force has other major gang prosecution cases in its pipeline. Last month, agents and local police arrested 22 Crips members in East Orange, Irvington and Newark.

Wiser, the head of the FBI's Newark division, cautioned: "Law enforcement is not the answer to the gang problem. No one should make the mistake in thinking that it is."

Havens still hears from Double ii informants and witnesses several times a week. Some were relocated for their safety. After living with the case for the past four years, sometimes 24 hours a day, he's grateful it's over.

"I could investigate this case for the rest of my career," he said.

In a recent drive past the Double ii's old neighborhood in East Orange, Vash said she noticed how quiet it was, compared with three years ago. One defense attorney in the case marveled at the same thing.

"You've got all these people who are simply gone," said the attorney, who asked not to be named because he didn't want to antagonize what's left of the gang. "Gone. The whole set is gone."

IMMIGRATION:

HOLOCAUST JUSTICE HITS A WALL: Exile Or Mercy For Old Nazi Guards? (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, December 3, 2006

As U.S. pushes to deport suspected killers, others say it should just let 3 aging men die at home in Michigan

John Kalymon, Johann Leprich and Iwan Mandycz are old men now, hobbled by the same aches and pains that plague many senior citizens in their 80s.

Only these men are not ordinary senior citizens.

In the 1940s, the U.S. Department of Justice says, they helped the Nazi killing machine as it steamrolled across Europe, exterminating millions of people deemed enemies of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich.

As it has in scores of similar cases, the government has gone to court to strip all three metro Detroit men of their U.S. citizenship so they can be deported.

But getting rid of them has created a moral, legal and diplomatic dilemma.

Their families and neighbors regard them as harmless old men who were victims, forced to choose between the Nazi juggernaut or death. Detroit-area survivors of the Holocaust regard them as tormentors who helped mercilessly kill their loved ones and friends. And the federal government, which is racing to expel them from the country before they die, is having a tough time finding European countries to take them.

"If their mothers and fathers had been killed and if they saw what I saw, they would feel differently," William Weiss, a Holocaust survivor from metro Detroit who lost his mother, father and two sisters during the war, said last week in response to suggestions that the government should let bygones be bygones.

Eli Rosenbaum, head of the Justice Department's Nazi-hunting Office of Special Investigations, is mainly concerned about making travel arrangements for the men.

"Right now, we have six people who we could put on a plane tomorrow," Rosenbaum said, adding that Leprich is one of the six.

"In recent years, we've had great difficulty persuading European nations to take these people back," Rosenbaum said. "And in some cases, we've hit a brick wall."

Rosenbaum said many European countries are too embarrassed to take back people they can't prosecute because they lack the laws or the desire to do so.

Jonathan Drimmer, a former deputy director of the OSI and lead prosecutor in the Mandycz case, said many countries don't want the old men because they don't want to take care of them. And leaning on foreign governments to take them back isn't high on Washington's priority list because of other pressing international issues.

An impassioned defense ...

The problem became apparent in October when the OSI reluctantly agreed to release Leprich to his family on an electronic tether after 39 months in federal custody because Romania, Hungary and Germany wouldn't accept him. Kalymon and Mandycz are free.

Leprich, an ethnic German born in Romania, served as an SS Death's Head Battalion guard in 1943-44 at the Mauthausen concentration camp in Nazi-held Austria. An estimated 119,000 Jews, Gypsies, Jehovah's Witnesses and others died at the camp.

A federal judge in Detroit stripped Leprich of his citizenship in 1987 for concealing his wartime service to the Nazis before coming to the United States. After losing his citizenship, Leprich went to Canada before the government could initiate deportation proceedings.

Federal agents arrested him in 2003 as he hid in a secret compartment under a stairwell in the home he shared with his wife in Clinton Township. The agents had a judge lock him up as a flight risk.

Leprich, like Kalymon, declined to be interviewed or photographed for this story. Mandycz's lawyer didn't return calls and no one answered the door of Mandycz's home.

Kalymon and Leprich admitted working for the Nazis during the war, but said they did so because they had to and never persecuted anyone. Mandycz denied working for the Nazis, but a judge found otherwise. Leprich and Mandycz were concentration camp guards. Kalymon worked for a Nazi-run auxiliary police force in wartime Poland.

Leprich's lawyer, Joseph McGinness of Cleveland, has defended several people whom the government calls "Nazi persecutors" and accused the government of heavy-handed tactics. He said men like Leprich were compelled to work for the Nazis. He said they merely guarded camp perimeters and were never allowed to enter areas where prisoners were kept.

"The man isn't guilty of anything," McGinness said of Leprich. "Do you have any idea how little influence a 17-year-old private ... in the Waffen SS had? The only influence they had was to go out and get their head shot off on the Eastern Front."

... and skeptical response

But McGinnis' argument doesn't go down well with Holocaust experts like Professor Sidney Bolkosky of the University of Michigan-Dearborn.

"You couldn't guard one of those camps and not have some degree of complicity in brutality," Bolkosky said, adding that decades of research have failed to produce a single case of anyone being shot or shipped to the Eastern Front for refusing to help persecute Jews.

He said there are many instances of people being shot or imprisoned for helping rescue Jews. He said there must be consequences -- such as deportation -- for Nazi persecutors.

For years, the U.S. government did little to prevent them from immigrating to the United States or to make them leave.

From the end of the war until the late 1970s, only one person was stripped of citizenship for helping the Nazis -- Hermine Braunsteiner Ryan, a Queens, N.Y., homemaker and Austrian-born concentration camp guard who was extradited to Germany in 1973. Former prisoners called her "the Stomping Mare" because they said she stomped old women to death with steel-studded jackboots.

U.S. officials began taking an interest in Nazi persecutors in the early 1970s, after then-U.S. Rep. Elizabeth Holtzman, D-N.Y., was shocked to discover that federal immigration officials maintained a list of suspected Nazi persecutors living in the United States but did nothing to remove them.

She persuaded Congress to pass legislation in 1978 to denaturalize and deport participants in wartime persecution. The Office of Special Investigations was created the next year.

Since then, OSI lawyers have investigated 1,700 suspected Nazi persecutors, stripped 84 of their citizenship and deported 63. The office has 50 open Nazi-era investigations and 15 cases in litigation. It has lost only nine cases.

One of its targets was Kalymon, who in 1942-44 served in the Nazi-run Ukrainian Auxiliary Police. The government says the force helped the Germans round up nearly all of the 100,000 Jewish residents of L'viv, Poland, to be killed.

The government asked a federal judge in Detroit in January 2004 to strip Kalymon of his citizenship after discovering captured wartime documents from the former Soviet Union showing that he repeatedly shot at Jews who tried to escape during roundups. Kalymon killed one Jew and wounded another, the reports said.

During 3 1/2 hours of trial testimony in September, Kalymon insisted he never shot his rifle, never persecuted any Jews and never saw any Jews being mistreated or killed in L'viv.

He also denied submitting a handwritten report showing that an Ivan Kalymun fired four shots during a roundup of Jews at 7 p.m. Aug. 14, 1942, wounding one and killing another.

Kalymon and his lawyer, David Domina of Birmingham, insisted Kalymon is a victim of mistaken identity. They said the shooting reports, which officers submitted to account for ammunition, were created by a precinct commander who was stealing ammunition to sell on the black market.

Kalymon admitted lying to U.S. authorities about his wartime activities on his visa application in 1949. Kalymon, who was born in Poland, said he was afraid of winding up in the hands of the Soviets, who he said killed his wife's father, a Greek Orthodox priest.

They're 'wonderful neighbors'

After arriving in the United States, Kalymon and his wife, Lubow, moved to Detroit, where he worked as a draftsman for Chrysler. He retired in 1989 after 25 years of service.

His son, Alexander Kalymon of Troy, said the past two years have been hard for his family.

"Can you imagine how difficult it is to prove your innocence when no one from that time period is still alive?" Alexander Kalymon said.

"Where do you get the resources to even find out? The government has almost unlimited resources."

He said he doesn't know what his family will do if U.S. District Judge Marianne Battani strips his father of citizenship, paving the way for deportation proceedings.

John Kalymon's neighbor Eleanor Rink, who worked with Kalymon's wife years ago, said she feels bad for the couple.

"They're absolutely wonderful neighbors," Rink said.

She said John Kalymon helps remove snow from her sidewalks since her husband died 10 years ago.

But Weiss, the Holocaust survivor, was skeptical of Kalymon's court testimony.

"How could he not have known what was going on?" said Weiss, 81, who was born in L'viv and lost both sisters and his mother during roundups of Jews conducted by the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police.

Weiss, who survived several concentration camps and prisons and watched his father die when the Nazis forced them to march to a camp, said Ukrainian Auxiliary Police officers were a constant and brutal presence in the L'viv ghetto.

Weiss testified last year in Chicago in a similar court case against another former Ukrainian Auxiliary Police officer and at one point was asked to testify at Kalymon's trial.

Meanwhile, Rosenbaum warns the suspects not to get too comfortable with the idea of remaining in the United States.

"The message I would have for Leprich and the others is this: I suggest you keep your bags packed because we don't give a lot of notice when it's time to go," Rosenbaum said. "The time will come."

Do Immigrants Make Us Safer? (NYT)

By Eyal Press

The New York Times Magazine, December 3, 2006

Although the midterm election failed to render a clear verdict on illegal immigration, the new Democratic Congress may enact sweeping legislation tightening border controls and allowing more guest workers next year. If that happens, the rancorous debate about how undocumented workers affect jobs and wages in the United States will be rejoined. So, too, will an equally rancorous, if less prominent, debate: Do immigrants make the U.S. more crime-ridden and dangerous?

In an age of Latino gangs and Chinese criminal networks, the notion that communities with growing immigrant populations tend to be unsafe is fairly well established, at least in the popular imagination. In a national survey conducted in 2000, 73 percent of Americans said they believe that immigrants are either “somewhat” or “very” likely to increase crime, higher than the 60 percent who fear they are “likely to cause Americans to lose jobs.” Cities like Avon Park, Fla., have considered ordinances recently to dissuade businesses from hiring illegal immigrants, whose presence “destroys our neighborhoods.” Even President Bush, whose perceived generosity to undocumented workers has earned him vilification on the right, commented in a speech this May that illegal immigration “strains state and local budgets and brings crime to our communities.”

So goes the conventional wisdom. But is it true? In fact, according to evidence cropping up in various places, the opposite may be the case. Ramiro Martinez Jr., a professor of criminal justice at Florida International University, has sifted through homicide records in border cities like San Diego and El Paso, both heavily populated by Mexican immigrants, both places where violent crime has fallen significantly in recent years. “Almost without exception,” he told me, “I’ve discovered that the homicide rate for Hispanics was lower than for other groups, even though their poverty rate was very high, if not the highest, in these metropolitan areas.” He found the same thing in the Haitian neighborhoods of Miami. In his book “New York Murder Mystery,” the criminologist Andrew Karmen examined the trend in New York City and likewise found that the “disproportionately youthful, male and poor immigrants” who arrived during the 1980s and 1990s “were surprisingly law-abiding” and that their settlement into once-decaying neighborhoods helped “put a brake on spiraling crime rates.”

The most prominent advocate of the “more immigrants, less crime” theory is Robert J. Sampson, chairman of the sociology department at Harvard. A year ago, Sampson was an author of an article in The American Journal of Public Health that reported the findings of a detailed study of crime in Chicago. Based on information gathered on the perpetrators of more than 3,000 violent acts committed between 1995 and 2002, supplemented by police records and community surveys, it found that the rate of violence among Mexican-Americans was significantly lower than among both non-Hispanic whites and blacks.

In June, Sampson and I drove out to a neighborhood in Little Village, Chicago’s largest Hispanic community. The area we visited is decidedly poor: in terms of per capita income, 84 percent of Chicago neighborhoods are better off and 99 percent have a greater proportion of residents with a high-school education. As we made our way down a side street, Sampson noted that many of the residents make their living as domestic workers and in other low-wage occupations, often paid off the books because they are undocumented. In places of such concentrated disadvantage, a certain level of violence and social disorder is assumed to be inevitable. As we strolled around, Sampson paused on occasion to make a mental note of potential trouble signs: an alley strewn with garbage nobody had bothered to pick up; a sign in Spanish in several windows, complaining about the lack of a park in the vicinity where children can play. Yet for all of this, the neighborhood was strikingly quiet. And, according to the data Sampson has collected, it is surprisingly safe. The burglary rate in the neighborhood is in the bottom fifth of the city. The overall crime rate is nearly in the bottom third.

The safety of neighborhoods like these has received little attention in the debate about immigration — or, for that matter, the debate about crime. Ever since cities like New York began cracking down on panhandling and loitering in the mid-1990s, a move that coincided with a precipitous drop in violence, policy makers have embraced the so-called broken-windows theory, which emphasizes the deterrent effects of punishing such minor offenses. Lately, though, scholars have begun to question whether "broken windows" deserves all the credit for diminishing crime after all. Some researchers have linked progress to the cessation of the crack epidemic. Others point to an improved economy, community-policing initiatives or even the legalization of abortion, which reduced the number of poor, unwanted children growing up in high-risk neighborhoods.

Sampson's theory may be the most provocative yet. Could America's cities be safer today not because fewer unwanted children live in them but because a lot more immigrants do? Could illegal immigration be making the nation a more law-abiding place?

There are, to be sure, scholars who take issue with this rosy picture. Wesley Skogan, a political scientist at Northwestern University, has spent the past 13 years tracking violence and social disorder in the white, black and Latino communities in Chicago. In a new book, "Police and Community in Chicago: A Tale of Three Cities," just out from Oxford University Press, Skogan concludes that the big success story took place not in immigrant areas but in African-American ones, where participation in community-policing programs was highest and violence fell the most. "About two-thirds of the crime decline in Chicago since 1991 took place in black neighborhoods," Skogan says. In Hispanic communities, by contrast, Skogan found that the fear of crime, as measured in surveys of residents, and real social disorder — gang activity, loitering — actually became worse as the foreign-born population increased. Skogan acknowledges that Hispanic immigrants don't show up much in arrest records, but he says he believes part of the explanation for this rests in the fact that those who are undocumented go to enormous lengths to "stay off the radar." Many also come from a country, Mexico, where distrust of law enforcement is endemic, which is why he suspects they underreport crime and participate less in community-policing programs, as his study found.

Sampson doesn't deny that crime may be underreported in immigrant neighborhoods. Nonetheless, he is quick to note that as the ranks of foreigners in the United States boomed during the 1990s — increasing by more than 50 percent to 31 million — America's cities became markedly less dangerous. That these two trends might be related has been overlooked, he says, in part because immigrants, like African-Americans, often trigger negative associations regardless of how they actually behave. Not long ago, Sampson and Stephen W. Raudenbush, a sociologist who teaches at the University of Chicago, conducted an experiment to test this idea. The experiment drew on interviews with more than 3,500 Chicago residents, each of whom was asked how serious problems like loitering and public drinking were where they lived. The responses were compared with the actual level of chaos in the neighborhood, culled from police data and by having researchers drive along hundreds of blocks to document every sign of decay and disorder they could spot.

The social and ethnic composition of a neighborhood turned out to have a profound bearing on how residents of Chicago perceived it, irrespective of the actual conditions on the streets. "In particular," Sampson and Raudenbush found, "the proportion of blacks and the proportion of Latinos in a neighborhood were related positively and significantly to perceived disorder." Once you adjusted for the ethnic, racial and class composition of a community, "much of the variation in levels of disorder that appeared to be explained by what residents saw was spurious."

In other words, the fact that people think neighborhoods with large concentrations of brown-skinned immigrants are unsafe makes sense in light of popular stereotypes and subliminal associations. But that doesn't mean there is any rational basis for their fears. Such a message hasn't sat well with everyone. As the debate about immigration has grown more heated and polarized, Sampson has found himself barraged with hate mail. "Vicious stuff," he told me, "you know, thinly veiled threats, people saying, 'You should just come and look at the Mexican gangs here.' " But Sampson has also won some far-flung admirers. In Mexico, one of the nation's leading dailies, La Reforma, published a story hailing his findings, under the triumphal heading, "Son barrios de paisanos menos violentos que los blancos " ("Neighborhoods of our countrymen are less violent than white ones").

If immigrants really are making America safer, why is this so? "That," Sampson says, "is the $64,000 question." In discussing the persistence of poverty and the causes of crime, sociologists on the left often emphasize the importance of “structural” factors like unemployment and racism, while scholars on the right tend to focus on individual behavior like having an illegitimate child and using drugs. Sampson prefers to focus on the nature of the social interactions taking place in particular neighborhoods. At one point in Little Village, we strolled past a house where a couple of young girls were playing outside. It didn’t seem that anybody was supervising them. Next door, however, an elderly woman was standing just inside the window. The window was open, and as Sampson and I passed by, her eyes did not leave us. “Did you notice that?” asked Sampson as we proceeded down the block. She was making sure the two strangers who had appeared weren’t dangerous. It was an example of the kind of informal social control that Sampson says can prevent even the poorest neighborhoods from spiraling into chaos and that he suspects may distinguish many tightknit immigrant communities.

But Sampson also notes the importance of another factor, one often stressed by conservatives: Mexicans in Chicago, his study found, are more likely to be married than either blacks or whites. “The family dynamic is very noticeable here,” Sampson remarked as we passed a girl with long braided hair clutching her mother’s hand. Her father followed a few steps behind. Sampson does not believe family structure explains everything: the data showed that in immigrant neighborhoods, even individuals who are not in married households are 15 percent less likely to engage in crime. Yet neither did he discount its significance.

To the extent a strong family structure does play a role, it has left Sampson understandably mystified why the most strident opponents of immigration so often come from the right. Shouldn’t conservatives concerned about the breakdown of traditional values be celebrating these family-oriented newcomers? This is indeed what David Brooks argued not long ago in a column in The New York Times, gently chiding his fellow conservatives for reflexively assuming foreigners have had a corrosive impact on the nation’s moral fiber. “As immigration has surged, violent crime has fallen 57 percent,” Brooks noted in the column, which was titled “Immigrants to Be Proud Of.”

Sampson wrote Brooks a note complimenting him on the piece. But he is under no illusions that his views on crime and immigration will endear him to Republicans clamoring for America’s borders to be sealed. On the other hand, it might not make his colleagues on the left any happier. The flip side of the impulse to demonize immigrants is, after all, the tendency to romanticize them as hard-working Horatio Alger types who valiantly lift themselves out of poverty — with the implication that if they can avoid falling victim to drugs, gangs and other inner-city scourges, those who succumb to these forces have only themselves to blame. In calling attention to the virtues of immigrant communities, there is a risk that Sampson’s work will be taken by some as a commentary on the high crime rate in some poor African-American communities.

Of course, comparing the experiences of Mexican immigrants and African-Americans may seem grossly unfair, not least because studies have shown that many employers are willing to hire foreigners (on the assumption they work hard) but not blacks (on the assumption they don’t). Yet the fact that it is unfair hardly means such comparisons won’t be made — even though immigrants commit less crime not only than African-Americans in inner-city neighborhoods but less than American-born white people as well.

Before anyone rushes to conclude that crime would vanish from America’s cities if only more foreigners moved here, it is worth considering something else Sampson’s study uncovered. It is a finding as troubling as his basic thesis about immigrants is hopeful. Second-generation immigrants in Chicago were significantly more likely to commit crimes than their parents, it turns out, and those of the third generation more likely still.

Opponents of immigration frequently charge that Mexican immigrants threaten America’s national identity because of their failure to assimilate. A more reasonable concern might be the opposite of this: not that foreigners in low-income neighborhoods refuse to adopt the norms of the native culture but that their children and grandchildren do.

The sociologists Alejandro Portes and Rubén G. Rumbaut conducted a multiyear longitudinal study of immigrant children in Miami and San Diego. The offspring of foreigners who grow up in impoverished ghettos, they have argued, particularly Mexican-Americans exposed to racial as well as economic discrimination, often lose the drive and optimism their parents had and come to share the widespread attitude among their inner-city peers that survival depends on brandishing an oppositional stance toward school authorities and, more broadly, a culture that looks down on them. “The learning of new cultural patterns and entry into American social circles does not lead in these cases to upward mobility but to exactly the opposite,” Portes and Rumbaut contend, a process of “downward assimilation” that has created a new “rainbow underclass.” Astoundingly, in a recent paper, Rumbaut and several doctoral students found that the incarceration rate among second-generation Mexicans was eight times higher than for the first generation; among Vietnamese, it was more than 10 times higher. Where the first-generation immigrants in their data were less likely to wind up in prison than native-born whites, the second (with the exception of Filipinos and Chinese) were more likely.

Such findings suggest the class and race divisions that cleave America’s social landscape may prove decisive after all. In Sweden, a country with markedly less inequality and more generous social welfare policies — and far less violent crime — studies have shown the rate of offending tends to be lower for the second generation of immigrants than for the first. Of course,

America has historically done an admirable job of assimilating newcomers, and the theory of "downward assimilation" has not gone unchallenged. Recently, a team of researchers completed a study in New York of more than 2,200 second-generation immigrants and 1,200 native-born Americans that allowed them to compare the rate of offending among various groups, West Indians versus African-Americans, for instance, or Russians versus American-born whites. According to John Mollenkopf, a political scientist at the CUNY Graduate Center, the arrest rates among the children of immigrants were the same or lower in every case. "The second-generation immigrants are doing better, on the whole, than the native-born," he said.

Clearly, the debate over assimilation will continue, as Sampson acknowledges. When I asked him why he thought the positive trends he and his colleagues had discovered in Chicago seemed to become diluted by the second and third generations, he paused.

"That's another $64,000 question," he said, chuckling softly. Part of the explanation, he went on to speculate, may rest in the exposure subsequent generations have to the things that often lure young people in America's cities to engage in illicit activities: drugs, cash, cars, contraband. Part of it, as well, might be the adoption of streetwise attitudes that lead people to react quickly to insults in the United States. One thing it is difficult for Americans to realize, he said, is how unusually violent their country is, particularly in light of its inordinate wealth. Recently, scholars have become increasingly interested in the historical origins of American violence. Richard Nisbett of the University of Michigan and others have traced our "culture of violence" back to the valorization of retribution and dueling among Scotch-Irish immigrants in the American South, suggesting that antique folkways have become encoded into the nation's DNA.

It is a dark view, perhaps, but Sampson is hopeful that the good news about crime in recent years can continue, albeit under certain conditions, among them less alarmism about the supposedly dangerous foreigners in our midst. Sampson shook his head when describing some of the correspondence he has received from people absolutely certain that immigrants are sowing mayhem in our streets. In the last few years, he noted, such people have had somewhat less cause for worry, since the numbers show the flow of newcomers has subsided a bit. Meanwhile, the crime rate in some cities has begun to creep back up. Sampson, for one, does not think this is a mere coincidence. Those clamoring for America to close its borders in order to prevent violence-prone strangers from flooding our shores may well get their way, he acknowledged, but they ought to be careful what they wish for.

Georgia Legislator's Wife Battles Deportation Order (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

ATLANTA, Dec. 1 — The wife of a Georgia legislator known for his strong support of immigrants' rights is in hiding after federal agents came to their home on Tuesday with an order to deport her to her native Colombia, her lawyer said.

In a written statement issued on Wednesday, State Senator Curt Thompson, 37, a Democrat, said his wife, Sascha Herrera, 28, missed an immigration-related court hearing in February 2005. Mr. Thompson said notices about an asylum application that had been mistakenly filed on her behalf had been sent to the wrong address, causing her to miss the hearing.

Because Ms. Herrera did not appear in court, a federal judge issued a deportation order in February 2005, Charles H. Kuck, Ms. Herrera's immigration lawyer, said on Friday.

Mr. Kuck said Mr. Thompson told him that his wife was not at the couple's home when Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents arrived on Tuesday to take her into custody. Mr. Kuck would say only that Ms. Herrera was in a safe place.

"We're making an arrangement, we hope, for her to come in Monday morning," Mr. Kuck said, adding that he would try to persuade an immigration judge to reopen Ms. Herrera's case.

It is usually difficult to get an immigration case reopened, several experts said.

Advocates of immigrants' rights say Ms. Herrera's situation is another indication of how byzantine is the system for applying for legal residency in this country.

"It's a very, very onerous system," said State Senator Sam Zamarripa, a Democrat who was the first Hispanic elected to the Georgia Senate. "If the wife of a state senator can't handle it, how can we expect people who are working in our labor force to handle the bureaucracy?"

"This is going to take a U.S. congressman or a senator to step in," Mr. Zamarripa said. "To say, let's wait a minute. Let's think about this. This is a good person who deserves to be in this country."

Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Washington, said he could not comment on the specifics of Ms. Herrera's case. Generally, Mr. Raimondi said, "People who are here legally are very, very careful about their immigration status." Of the couple's claims of ignorance about the notices, he said, "It sounds like a lot of song and dance."

In his statement, Mr. Thompson also said his wife was the victim of an unscrupulous "notario." In some Spanish-speaking countries, a "notario publico" is a highly regarded lawyer with special power to negotiate with the government. In the United States, however, a "notario" is often a notary public with no special expertise in immigration law. Some notaries, however, advertise themselves within Latino communities and take advantage of the similarity between the two titles to charge high fees to file immigration paperwork with the government.

Mr. Kuck said Ms. Herrera originally paid $1,300 to the notary, whom he identified as Tomas Vilela, to help her file paperwork to extend her visitor's visa so she could take classes at Kennesaw State University, just north of Atlanta.

Mr. Vilela recommended that she apply for asylum, Mr. Kuck said, and had her sign the last page of an application. But after she received an F-1 student visa, for which university officials had helped her apply, Ms. Herrera instructed Mr. Vilela not to file the application, Mr. Kuck said.

Mr. Kuck said that Mr. Vilela filed the forms anyway, and that because the paperwork listed the address of his business, all subsequent letters from immigration officials were sent there, not to Ms. Herrera's home. Mr. Thompson's statement said the notary did not forward the letters to Ms. Herrera.

She did not know about the filing and never received notices about the hearing, Mr. Kuck said, adding that the deportation order "hit the couple completely out of the blue."

Mr. Vilela did not return several messages left at his office.

Though Ms. Herrera was in the country legally on the student visa, once she missed the date for the asylum hearing and the deportation order was issued, "it trumped all other legal status," Mr. Kuck said.

Mr. Thompson represents parts of DeKalb and Gwinnett Counties, in a district where about one in four residents is foreign born.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution quoted him as saying that he asked immigration officials about Ms. Herrera's status before their marriage in April 2006 — more than a year after the deportation order was issued — and was told that she was in the country legally. Because her husband is a United States citizen, after their marriage, Ms. Herrera also applied for an adjustment of her status to become a permanent resident and obtain a green card. But the approval process is lengthy, Mr. Kuck said.

If she is deported, Ms. Herrera could be barred from re-entering the United States for 10 years, Mr. Kuck said, "so we have to work with extreme speed to try to fix this."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Editorial: Leahy Has Historic Opportunity (BMTA)

Barre-Montpelier (VT) Times Argus, December 3, 2006

Friends and staff of Sen. Patrick Leahy are already talking about the opportunity now before him to establish a legacy that will place him among the most important senators in Vermont history.

It will not be about the pork he is able to secure from his position on the Appropriations Committee or his long-term work for the interests of the state's dairy farmers. It will be his legacy as a defender of the U.S. Constitution.

Leahy has been almost giddy since the elections last month, with the prospect that he will become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. But the challenges before him are serious indeed.

As chairman he will have the power to focus on the numerous ways that the Bush administration has worked to skirt and undermine the constitutional limits on executive power, straying into activities that might be judged illegal or even criminal. A successful effort to rein in the abuses of the Bush administration will place Leahy in the history books alongside Sen. Ralph Flanders of Vermont, who was instrumental in challenging the abuses of Sen. Joseph McCarthy — except Leahy's challenge is even greater and the abuses more serious than those of the senator from Wisconsin whose name has become synonymous with an era of thuggery and paranoia.

Leahy appears to understand what he is up against. Already he has sent letters to the Justice Department renewing numerous requests for information on a variety of programs and activities that are constitutionally dubious. President Bush has promised to foster a spirit of bipartisanship in his dealings with the new Democratic Congress, but so far the Justice Department and the White House show every sign that they will resist Leahy's efforts to let the sun shine on the doings of the federal government.

Leahy will have to focus both on the specifics of administration activities and on the broader legal and political philosophy the administration has offered in its own defense.

Thus, Leahy has sought documents that would shed light on the administration's decisions related to the detention of prisoners and on unauthorized domestic spying. Of broader concern is the claim of sweeping executive power used by the administration to place itself virtually above the law. Leahy's greatest contribution would be to expose the danger to our constitutional system of Bush's claims and to help re-establish proper limits on the reach of executive power.

This work requires the perspicacity and determination of a statesman. The work of the Judiciary Committee in investigating these issues must not be seen by the public as an effort to settle political scores. The Bush administration will try to cloak its practices in secrecy on the basis of national security, and Leahy will have the job of discerning the difference between legitimate national security concerns and bogus claims designed for political self-protection. There is plenty of precedent for the bogus, going all the way back to the Pentagon Papers.

The struggle over Bush administration abuses will be of the utmost seriousness. It is likely that Bush has sought legal justification for secret detention and "alternative" interrogation methods as a way to cover up torture and illegal imprisonment that could put members of the administration in legal jeopardy. A policy of torture, which apparently received approval at high levels of government, brings the administration close to the territory of war crimes. As Leahy and his committee get close to that territory, the political warfare will not be pretty.

It will be important for Leahy to maintain a focus on the legal and constitutional issues at stake: that the United States stands for human rights, the rule of law and a system of checks and balances that applies to the president even in a time of war. The American people will be grateful to him if he can establish that a democracy need not resort to the ruthless, lawless methods of a panicked bully. And Vermonters will remember him among the handful of Vermont's greatest statesmen.

Lame-Duck Congress May Run Out The Clock (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) wants legislation on President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program. Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) is sure the time has come for Congress to declare that aborted fetuses feel pain. And Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) still insists that the District of Columbia should be granted a vote in the House while the Republicans control Congress.

They shouldn't count on it.

Congress will convene on Tuesday for what some fear will be the lamest of lame-duck sessions, and GOP leaders have decided to take a minimalist approach before turning over the reins of power to the Democrats. Rather than a final surge of legislative activity, Congress will probably wrap up things after a single, short week of work. They have even decided to punt decisions on annual government spending measures to the Democrats next year.

"There is a lot of battle fatigue among members, probably on both sides of the aisle," said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), usually a reliable conservative firebrand. "Contrary to popular belief, members of Congress are human beings. They have a certain shelf life and a certain amount of energy to be drawn on. We're tired."

Before the midterm elections, GOP leaders had dismissed the Democrats' "do-nothing" label for the 109th Congress as political posturing, promising that a robust post-election session would put the accusation to rest. Instead, Republican lawmakers will have met for one week in November, devoted almost exclusively to leadership elections for next year, and one week in December, largely to pick committee assignments, move offices and pass a measure to keep the government operating through February.

That will mean this Congress will have spent the least time in session of any in at least half a century, according to Thomas E. Mann and Norman J. Ornstein, congressional historians and the authors of "The Broken Branch," a critical look at recent Congresses. In the time they have met, lawmakers have failed to approve a budget resolution or pass at least eight of the 11 annual spending bills.

Other significant pieces of legislation will be hard to find. Bush's push for a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws produced a partially funded measure to build a border fence. His calls to restructure Social Security, rewrite the tax code and ease the cost of health insurance went unheeded. And GOP lawmakers' pledge to tighten ethics regulations in the wake of the indictments or resignations of four members fell flat.

"Harry Truman's 'do-nothing' Congress passed the Marshall Plan," Mann pointed out.

To be sure, Congress will do something this week. Lawmakers have routinely extended a number of business tax breaks every year or so, including a tax credit for research and development and a break for hiring welfare recipients. But that routine was broken this year when GOP leaders decided to link those business-tax-cut extensions to a deep and permanent cut to the estate tax, a link that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had declared inviolable.

This week, the inviolable link will be broken. The tax extensions will be passed on their own after all, according to legislative aides, perhaps with a multibillion-dollar provision staving off scheduled cuts to physician reimbursements under Medicare.

The House has scheduled a vote on Smith's fetal-pain bill, which, among other things, would require abortion providers to inform patients of the controversial assertion that the procedure may cause pain. Providers would also have to offer anesthesia for the fetus, which the patient would have to accept or reject in writing. But GOP leaders put the measure on the fast track to passage, which means it will need the vote of two-thirds of the House. Even if the bill wins that much support, it will go nowhere in the Senate, Republicans concede.

Likewise, House Republicans on Friday relented on their opposition to a Senate-passed measure opening new territories off the Gulf Coast to oil drilling, with much of the royalty proceeds to be dedicated to Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas. That, too, will go on the expedited calendar, where it could be sunk by environmentalist lawmakers and Republicans who believe that the bill does not go nearly far enough to open up new frontiers for oil exploration.

Beyond that, there is little in the offing. Anguished over the Democrats' victory on Nov. 7 and the tumult that has followed, GOP lawmakers want to get out of town. One senior Senate Republican aide called hopes for substantive legislation "delusional."

Much of the problem is as prosaic as office space, GOP aides said. Lawmakers were forced to vacate their offices on Friday, and few of them want to hang around Washington with no place to sit. Retiring House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) got angry during a meeting of committee chairmen, demanding to know how he was supposed to complete work on the business tax extension bill without an office, according to one GOP aide present in the meeting.

And attendance is expected to be light. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.) may be crucial to passage of the offshore-oil-drilling bill, since he had led the charge to broaden the Senate's approach. But he may not have his heart in it, GOP leadership aides conceded. He was defeated on Nov. 7.

Besides, with committee assignments, chairmanships and ranking Republican posts up for grabs next week, there will be campaigns to run, presentations to make and alliances to form. Legislating may be far down the list of priorities.

Some members say they are willing to stick around, but with limits. "Most members feel we ought to stay in as long as we need to get done as much as we can do realistically," said Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.). "If that's a week, fine. If that's four weeks, fine."

But what's realistic is very limited, and even the firebrands have turned into coldhearted realists.

"If we had a chance to make law before the Democrats took over, I'd be interested in sticking around. If we have the opportunity just to make a point, only to see the Senate stop it, I'm disinclined," Pence said. "The time for Pyrrhic victories has passed."

Revival Of Tax Breaks Tied To Lame-duck Session (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

Millions of entrepreneurs, teachers and parents with children in college have a financial stake in whether Congress, in the waning hours of Republican rule, revives tax breaks that expired 11 months ago.

If Congress fails to act, teachers no longer will be able to deduct up to $250 for the books and supplies they pay for out of their own pockets.

Residents of Alaska, Florida, Nevada, South Dakota, Texas, Washington and Wyoming -- each without an income tax -- will miss out on an average $1,500 deduction for state and local sales taxes.

Lawmakers have tried all year to renew the diverse mix of targeted tax breaks. The breaks, which expired Jan. 1, enjoy wide support in both parties. Precisely because of this support, lawmakers have sought to add them as a "sweetener" to contentious legislation in hopes of getting that legislation through.

Before the election, Republicans tried unsuccessfully to link the tax cuts to a bill that would reduce the estate tax. Most Democrats find that bill unacceptable.

Lawmakers will take one more shot at the tax bill when they return this week to wrap up their work for the year, but they might not have the time or the will to agree on a compromise.

Aides in both the House and the Senate said a deal is possible, with prospects best if the tax bill is not combined with other measures.

Negotiators say they have agreed that the proposal will cover two years, retroactive to 2006 and through 2007.

Businesses could be big losers if Congress fails to renew the research-and-development tax credit, which offers a 20 percent credit for new activities. One estimate puts the value of the credit to businesses at $16.5 billion.

"There are some expenditures by the U.S. government that should really be called investments," William Archey, head of the American Electronics Association, said recently.

Also important, said Philip Beram, chief tax counsel with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, are provisions that allow employers to claim a tax credit of up to $3,500 for the first year of a worker who received public welfare for an extended time. Businesses also benefit from the provision allowing people from the seven states without income taxes to deduct state and local sales taxes.

The Internal Revenue Service said that on 2004 returns, 11.1 million taxpayers in those states claimed $17.3 billion in deductions from state and local sales taxes.

Also in 2004, an estimated 4.7 million families claimed $10.7 billion in deductions for college tuition and fees. In the legislation that Congress failed to pass before the November election, taxpayers could claim above-the-line deductions of up to $4,000, depending on their income, for higher-education expenses.

In 2004, the full deduction was available to a taxpayer earning up to $65,000, or $130,000 for a couple filing jointly. A person earning up to $80,000, or $160,000 for a couple, could claim up to $2,000.

Meanwhile, 3.4 million teachers took advantage of the $250 deduction for personal costs incurred to purchase supplies for their classrooms.

McConnell's Unlikely Role Models (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Ask Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky to name his role models for his responsibilities as Senate minority leader in the next Congress, and the answer is surprising. "Mike Mansfield and George Mitchell," he replied the other day. "I know they're both Democrats, but I admire the way they ran things here."

Mansfield, who was Senate majority leader from 1961 to 1977, took over from Lyndon Johnson and, as McConnell noted, erased Johnson's almost-dictatorial regime and substituted a much more collegial style. Mitchell, who was majority leader from 1989 to 1995, brought down from Maine the studied, judicious approach he had learned as a federal judge.

Both men were effective leaders of their party but were notable also for their willingness to reach across party lines to accomplish legislative goals. Mansfield allowed Everett McKinley Dirksen, his Republican counterpart, to claim most of the credit for the civil rights bills of the 1960s, and he famously began his days by sharing breakfast in the Senate dining room with his close friend George Aiken, the Republican senator from Vermont. Mitchell as majority leader engineered bipartisan agreements on the savings and loan bailout, a minimum wage increase, a major clean air bill and far-reaching immigration reform -- all while Republicans held the White House.

Mansfield and Mitchell shared one other trait. Both were intensely aware of the special role of the Senate and its place in the Constitution. Neither was in any way deferential to the president. Mansfield challenged President Johnson publicly and repeatedly on his Vietnam policy, and Mitchell was often a thorn in the side of President George H.W. Bush.

When McConnell was asked, during a visit to The Post last week, what obligation he felt toward the current President Bush, he replied, "I was elected by Senate Republicans, and they are the ones to whom I am responsible." While emphasizing that he was in "philosophical agreement" with the president, he clearly sees his role differently than did his predecessor, retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Frist was installed in the leadership job with major help from the Bush White House and often appeared to be more the president's liaison to the Senate than the Senate's leader.

McConnell is in the odd -- and potentially awkward -- position of having his wife, Elaine Chao, serving as secretary of labor in the president's Cabinet. But he is much more a creature of the Senate than Frist was, and he seems determined to set his own course.

In the interview, McConnell repeatedly stressed his belief that divided government -- a Democratic Congress confronting a Republican president -- need not produce gridlock. He cited a wide range of issues, from raising the minimum wage to revising ethics rules to immigration and Social Security reform, where he sees good prospects of legislative agreement.

In judging these words, realists will quickly note McConnell's reputation as a hard-nosed politician and crafty campaign tactician. No one who knows him doubts that high on his agenda is overthrowing the Democrats' shaky two-seat majority in the 2008 Senate elections so that he can become majority leader.

McConnell is no reformer. He has fought Sen. John McCain and other campaign-finance legislation supporters who have tried to rein in fundraising by members of Congress. Earlier this fall the Lexington Herald-Leader described in a lengthy series of investigative reports how McConnell has raised nearly $220 million for himself and other Republicans and how he has served the interests of those who furnished the money.

Cigarette makers, coal mine operators, casinos and a welter of others have found him with hand out, ready to listen to their legislative needs.

But the same practicality that drives his politics may make him a willing partner in dealmaking that can move bills to passage in the closely divided Senate. He is well aware of the power he will wield, with 49 votes, in a Senate where Democrats will have to find help across the aisle to pass any controversial bills.

He will undoubtedly block them on some issues, but he is smart enough to recognize the risks if he is solely an obstructionist for the next two years.

When you think of notable Senate leaders, you don't automatically think of "Three M's" -- Mansfield, Mitchell and McConnell. But if Mitch McConnell makes that linkage in his own mind, it's not a bad start.

He's The Worst Ever (WP)

By Eric Foner

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Ever since 1948, when Harvard professor Arthur Schlesinger Sr. asked 55 historians to rank U.S. presidents on a scale from "great" to "failure," such polls have been a favorite pastime for those of us who study the American past.

Changes in presidential rankings reflect shifts in how we view history. When the first poll was taken, the Reconstruction era that followed the Civil War was regarded as a time of corruption and misgovernment caused by granting black men the right to vote. As a result, President Andrew Johnson, a fervent white supremacist who opposed efforts to extend basic rights to former slaves, was rated "near great." Today, by contrast, scholars consider Reconstruction a flawed but noble attempt to build an interracial democracy from the ashes of slavery -- and Johnson a flat failure.

More often, however, the rankings display a remarkable year-to-year uniformity. Abraham Lincoln, George Washington and Franklin D. Roosevelt always figure in the "great" category. Most presidents are ranked "average" or, to put it less charitably, mediocre. Johnson, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Warren G. Harding, Calvin Coolidge and Richard M. Nixon occupy the bottom rung, and now President Bush is a leading contender to join them. A look at history, as well as Bush's policies, explains why.

At a time of national crisis, Pierce and Buchanan, who served in the eight years preceding the Civil War, and Johnson, who followed it, were simply not up to the job. Stubborn, narrow-minded, unwilling to listen to criticism or to consider alternatives to disastrous mistakes, they surrounded themselves with sycophants and shaped their policies to appeal to retrogressive political forces (in that era, pro-slavery and racist ideologues). Even after being repudiated in the midterm elections of 1854, 1858 and 1866, respectively, they ignored major currents of public opinion and clung to flawed policies. Bush's presidency certainly brings theirs to mind.

Harding and Coolidge are best remembered for the corruption of their years in office (1921-23 and 1923-29, respectively) and for channeling money and favors to big business. They slashed income and corporate taxes and supported employers' campaigns to eliminate unions. Members of their administrations received kickbacks and bribes from lobbyists and businessmen. "Never before, here or anywhere else," declared the Wall Street Journal, "has a government been so completely fused with business." The Journal could hardly have anticipated the even worse cronyism, corruption and pro-business bias of the Bush administration.

Despite some notable accomplishments in domestic and foreign policy, Nixon is mostly associated today with disdain for the Constitution and abuse of presidential power. Obsessed with secrecy and media leaks, he viewed every critic as a threat to national security and illegally spied on U.S. citizens. Nixon considered himself above the law.

Bush has taken this disdain for law even further. He has sought to strip people accused of crimes of rights that date as far back as the Magna Carta in Anglo-American jurisprudence: trial by impartial jury, access to lawyers and knowledge of evidence against them. In dozens of statements when signing legislation, he has asserted the right to ignore the parts of laws with which he disagrees. His administration has adopted policies regarding the treatment of prisoners of war that have disgraced the nation and alienated virtually the entire world. Usually, during wartime, the Supreme Court has refrained from passing judgment on presidential actions related to national defense. The court's unprecedented rebukes of Bush's policies on detainees indicate how far the administration has strayed from the rule of law.

One other president bears comparison to Bush: James K. Polk. Some historians admire him, in part because he made their job easier by keeping a detailed diary during his administration, which spanned the years of the Mexican-American War. But Polk should be remembered primarily for launching that unprovoked attack on Mexico and seizing one-third of its territory for the United States.

Lincoln, then a member of Congress from Illinois, condemned Polk for misleading Congress and the public about the cause of the war -- an alleged Mexican incursion into the United States. Accepting the president's right to attack another country "whenever he shall deem it necessary," Lincoln observed, would make it impossible to "fix any limit" to his power to make war. Today, one wishes that the country had heeded Lincoln's warning.

Historians are loath to predict the future. It is impossible to say with certainty how Bush will be ranked in, say, 2050. But somehow, in his first six years in office he has managed to combine the lapses of leadership, misguided policies and abuse of power of his failed predecessors. I think there is no alternative but to rank him as the worst president in U.S. history.

He's Only Fifth Worst (WP)

By Michael Lind

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

It's unfair to claim that George W. Bush is the worst president of all time. He's merely the fifth worst. In the White House Hall of Shame, Bush comes behind four other Oval Officers whose policies were even more disastrous: James Buchanan, Andrew Johnson, Richard M. Nixon and James Madison.

What makes a president horribly, immortally bad? Poor luck is not enough. Some of the greatest presidents, such as Abraham Lincoln and Franklin D. Roosevelt, have inherited crises and risen to the occasion. The damage must be largely self-inflicted. And there's another test: The damage to the nation must be substantial. Minor blunders and petty crimes do not land a president in the rogues' gallery.

Doing nothing can be even worse than doing something wrong. Take the worst president of all time, Buchanan. In office when Lincoln's election in 1860 triggered the secession of one Southern state after another, Buchanan sat by as the country crumbled. In his December 1860 message to Congress, three months before Lincoln was inaugurated, he declared that the states had no right to secede, but that the federal government had no right to stop them. By the time he left office, seven states had left the Union, and the Confederates had looted the arsenals in the South. If Buchanan had exercised his powers as commander in chief, the rebels might have been stopped at far less than the eventual cost of the Civil War -- more than half a million American dead and the ruin of the South for generations. (After he left the White House, Buchanan explained that he did not stop secession for fear that hostile blacks would overrun the North.)

The Civil War era also gave us the second-worst president: Johnson, Lincoln's vice president and successor, a Tennessean who vetoed civil rights acts and blocked the 14th Amendment because he didn't like blacks, of whom he declared, "It is vain to deny that they are an inferior race -- very far inferior to the European variety." Johnson's policies led to his impeachment and forced the Republicans in Congress to create a quasi-parliamentary system marginalizing the president. While Lincoln had his own racial prejudices, he was a model of enlightenment next to Johnson and Buchanan.

The third-worst president is Nixon, a criminal in the White House who is still the only commander in chief ever to resign. Many presidents have abused their power, and the "imperial presidency" existed long before Nixon. But he was the only president to run a criminal gang out of the Oval Office engaging in spying and burglary while he sought to corrupt the Justice Department, the FBI and the CIA. (By contrast, Bush's misguided authorization of torture, secret CIA prisons and illegal eavesdropping were at least directed at suspected terrorists, not at his personal and political opponents.)

The damage Nixon inflicted might have endured had he established the principle that the president is above the law. As he told David Frost in a famous 1977 television interview, "Well, when the president does it, that means that it is not illegal." Because of the exposure of Nixon's criminality during Watergate, we still live in a constitutional republic rather than a banana republic with an elective dictatorship.

Refusing to enforce the law while the country disintegrates, trying to re-enslave emancipated blacks, and doubling as chief magistrate and gangster -- what could rival these presidential misdeeds? Well, how about unnecessary and catastrophic wars?

To qualify a president for the Worst of All Time list, a war must be catastrophic as well as unnecessary. Ronald Reagan's invasion of Grenada, George H.W. Bush's invasion of Panama and Bill Clinton's invasion of Haiti don't cut it -- they were unnecessary, but minor. And presidents can be forgiven costly wars that were necessary or hard to avoid, such as Harry S. Truman's stalemated war in Korea and Lyndon B. Johnson's failed war in Vietnam, each of which was a Cold War battle more than a separate conflict. After 1950, U.S. strategy required Washington to go to war to prevent Soviet bloc proxies from taking over South Korea, Indochina and Taiwan -- the amazing thing is that the Cold War ended without a battle for Taiwan, too. Future historians are likely to be as kind to LBJ as they have been to Truman.

The two big, unjustified wars on my list are the War of 1812 and the current conflict in Iraq, and the first was far worse than the second. Madison, the "Father of the Constitution," was a great patriot, a brilliant intellectual -- and an absolutely abysmal president. In his defense, the world situation during the Napoleonic Wars was grim. The United States was a minor neutral nation that was frequently harassed by both of the warring empires, Britain and France. But cold geopolitics should have led Washington to prefer a British victory, which would have preserved a balance of power in Europe, to a French victory that would have left France an unchecked superpower. Instead, eager to conquer Spanish Florida and seize British Canada, Madison sided with the more dangerous power against the less dangerous. It is as though, after Pearl Harbor, FDR had joined the Axis and declared war on Britain, France and the Soviet Union.

It might have been worse. In 1812, Madison wrote Thomas Jefferson to ask what the former president thought of waging war simultaneously against Britain and France. Alarmed, Jefferson replied that this was "a solecism worthy of Don Quixote."

Instead, the United States fought only the British, who torched Washington, D.C., while Madison and first lady Dolley fled to Virginia. Gen. Andrew Jackson's victory in the Battle of New Orleans (waged two weeks after the United States and Britain, unknown to Jackson, had signed a peace treaty) helped Americans pretend that the War of 1812 was something other than a total wipe-out.

By contrast, George W. Bush has inadvertently destroyed only Baghdad, not Washington, and the costs of the Iraq war in blood and treasure are far less than those of Korea and Vietnam. Yet he will be remembered for the Iraq conflict for generations, long after tax-cut-driven deficits, No Child Left Behind and comprehensive immigration reform are forgotten. The fact that Bush followed the invasion of Afghanistan, which had sheltered al-Qaeda, with the toppling of Saddam Hussein, will puzzle historians for centuries. It is as though, after Japan had bombed Pearl Harbor, FDR had asked Congress to declare war on Argentina.

Why did Bush do it? Did he really believe that Hussein had weapons of mass destruction? Was it about oil? Israel? Revenge for Hussein's alleged attempt on Bush's father's life? The war will join the sinking of the USS Maine and the grassy knoll among the topics to exercise conspiracy theorists for generations, and the photos of torture at Abu Ghraib will join images of the napalmed Vietnamese girl and executed Filipino rebels in the gallery of U.S. atrocities.

Like all presidents, George W. Bush wants to be remembered. He will get his wish -- as the fifth-worst president in U.S. history.

Move Over, Hoover (WP)

By Douglas Brinkley

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Shortly after Thanksgiving I had dinner in California with Ronald Reagan's best biographer, Lou Cannon. Like many historians these days, we discussed whether George W. Bush is, conceivably, the worst U.S. president ever. Cannon bristled at the idea.

Bush has two more years to leave his mark, he argued. What if there is a news flash that U.S. Special Forces have killed Osama bin Laden or that North Korea has renounced its nuclear program? What if a decade from now Iraq is a democracy and a statue of Bush is erected on Firdaus Square where that famously toppled one of Saddam Hussein once stood?

There is wisdom in Cannon's prudence. Clearly it's dangerous for historians to wield the "worst president" label like a scalp-hungry tomahawk simply because they object to Bush's record. But we live in speedy times and, the truth is, after six years in power and barring a couple of miracles, it's safe to bet that Bush will be forever handcuffed to the bottom rungs of the presidential ladder. The reason: Iraq.

Some presidents, such as Bill Clinton and John F. Kennedy, are political sailors -- they tack with the wind, reaching difficult policy objectives through bipartisan maneuvering and pulse-taking. Franklin D. Roosevelt, for example, was deemed a "chameleon on plaid," changing colors regularly to control the zeitgeist of the moment. Other presidents are submariners, refusing to zigzag in rough waters, preferring to go from Point A to Point B with directional certitude. Harry S. Truman and Reagan are exemplars of this modus operandi, and they are the two presidents Bush has tried to emulate.

The problem for Bush is that certitude is only a virtue if the policy enacted is proven correct. Most Americans applaud Truman's dropping of bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki because they achieved the desired effect: Japan surrendered. Reagan's anti-communist zeal -- including increased defense budgets and Star Wars -- is only now perceived as positive because the Soviet Union started to unravel on his watch.

Nobody has accused Bush of flinching. After 9/11, he decided to circumvent the United Nations and declare war on Iraq. The principal pretext was that Baghdad supposedly was stockpiling weapons of mass destruction. From the get-go, the Iraq war was a matter of choice. Call it Mr. Bush's War. Like a high-stakes poker player pushing in all his chips on one hand, he bet the credibility of the United States on the notion that Sunnis and Shiites wanted democracy, just like the Poles and the Czechs during the Cold War.

Bush wasn't operating in a historical bubble. Other presidents had gambled on wars of choice and won. James K. Polk, for example, begged Gen. Zachary Taylor to start a border war with Mexico along the Rio Grande. An ardent expansionist, he wanted to annex land in what are now Arizona, California and New Mexico. Nearly half of the American population in 1846 screamed foul, including Henry David Thoreau, who refused to pay taxes for an unjust war. Yet in short order, Polk achieved his land-grab objective with a string of stunning military successes. Mr. Polk's War was a success, even if the pretext was immoral. On virtually every presidential rating poll, Polk is deemed a "near great" president.

Half a century later, William McKinley also launched a war of choice based on the bogus notion that the USS Maine, anchored in Cuba, had been sabotaged by Spain. The Maine, in truth, was crippled by a boiler explosion. An imperialist, McKinley used the Maine as a pretext to fight Spain in the Caribbean and in the Philippines. A group of anti-imperialists led by

Mark Twain and William James, among others, vehemently objected, rightfully accusing McKinley of warmongering. But McKinley had the last word in what his secretary of state, John Hay, deemed "a splendid little war." In just six months, McKinley had achieved his objectives. History chalks up Mr. McKinley's War as a U.S. win, and he also polls favorably as a "near great" president.

Mr. Bush's War, by contrast, has not gone well. When you don't achieve a stealth-like victory in a war of choice, then you're seen as being stuck in a quagmire. Already the United States has fought longer in the Iraq war than in World War II. As the death toll continues to rise, more and more Americans are objecting. The pending Democratic takeover of Congress is only one manifestation of the spiraling disapproval of Bush.

At first, you'd want to compare Bush's Iraq predicament to that of Lyndon B. Johnson during the Vietnam War. But LBJ had major domestic accomplishments to boast about when leaving the White House, such as the Civil Rights Act and Medicare/Medicaid. Bush has virtually none. Look at how he dealt with the biggest post-9/11 domestic crisis of his tenure. He didn't rush to help the Gulf region after Hurricane Katrina because the country was overextended in Iraq and had a massive budget deficit. Texas conservatives always say that LBJ's biggest mistake was thinking that he could fund both the Great Society and Vietnam. They believe he had to choose one or the other. They call Johnson fiscally irresponsible. Bush learned this lesson: He chose Iraq over New Orleans.

So Bush's legacy hinges on Iraq, which is an unmitigated disaster. Instead of being forgiven, like Polk and McKinley, for his phony pretext for war (WMD and al-Qaeda operatives in Baghdad), he stands to be lambasted by future scholars. What once were his two best sound bites -- "Wanted dead or alive" and "Mission accomplished" -- will be used like billy clubs to shatter his legacy every time it gets a revisionist lift. The left will keep battering him for warmongering while the right will remember its outrage that he didn't send enough battalions to Iraq.

There isn't much that Bush can do now to salvage his reputation. His presidential library will someday be built around two accomplishments: that after 9/11, the U.S. homeland wasn't again attacked by terrorists (knock on wood) and that he won two presidential elections, allowing him to appoint conservatives to key judicial posts. I also believe that he is an honest man and that his administration has been largely void of widespread corruption. This will help him from being portrayed as a true villain.

This last point is crucial. Though Bush may be viewed as a laughingstock, he won't have the zero-integrity factors that have kept Nixon and Harding at the bottom in the presidential sweepstakes. Oddly, the president whom Bush most reminds me of is Herbert Hoover, whose name is synonymous with failure to respond to the Great Depression. When the stock market collapsed, Hoover, for ideological reasons, did too little. When 9/11 happened, Bush did too much, attacking the wrong country at the wrong time for the wrong reasons. He has joined Hoover as a case study on how not to be president.

At Least He's Not Nixon (WP)

By David Greenberg

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

In 1950, President Harry S. Truman was under fire for "losing" China to communist forces, engaging in deficit spending and seeking to expand unemployment insurance. Harold E. Stassen, a prominent Republican, blasted him as "the worst president ever to occupy the White House."

Four years later, under Dwight D. Eisenhower, job growth had slowed and wages were down. West Virginia Sen. Matthew M. Neely declared Ike "the worst president in United States history."

In 1973, as Richard M. Nixon foundered amid the worsening Watergate scandal, crippling stagflation and increasing social strife, labor leader George Meany asserted, "He will go down in history as one of our worst presidents."

Six years into Ronald Reagan's presidency, the Iran-contra scandal broke and his approval ratings fell into the 40s. Ted Sorensen, who was a speechwriter for John F. Kennedy, suggested that Reagan could well be remembered "as one of our worst presidents."

Considering these moments from history, how likely is it that George W. Bush, as many now assert, is our all-time worst president? Yes, many of us can easily tick off our own lists of Bush policies that we believe have done the United States significant harm. But any declarations that history will consign him to the bottom tier of presidents are premature. As the now-flourishing reputations of Truman, Eisenhower and Reagan attest, the antipathy a president elicits from his contemporaries usually fades over time.

And as Nixon's still-dismal reputation also attests, in the contest for the dubious title of "worst president," Bush faces stiff competition.

Comparisons of presidents across different eras are typically the stuff of parlor games, not serious historical study. But if anyone can be said to deserve the mantle of the worst, it's Nixon. Indeed, looking at his disastrous presidency may help put Bush's failures in perspective.

Like Bush, Nixon fancied himself a "wartime" president in the manner of Franklin D. Roosevelt and therefore entitled to deference in the face of a national emergency -- a view at odds with how most Americans see these controversial, far-off conflicts. And while the oft-cited analogies between the Vietnam and Iraq wars tend to be glib, each conflict has significantly determined its president's reputation. Like Nixon, Bush has heeded Henry Kissinger's advice not to withdraw from a quagmire, preferring to brand critics cowards or traitors. Like Nixon, Bush has also sought to conceal from the public the full scope of the U.S. commitment. Under blanket assertions of "national security" meant to end public debate, he has used Nixonian wiretapping to achieve his ends. These decisions will surely stain his legacy.

But can we conclude that Bush's war policy is worse than Nixon's? However toxic the fallout from Iraq, it's hard to imagine that it could greatly exceed the damage wrought by Vietnam, the wounds from which are still raw 30 years later, as its role in the 2004 presidential election showed. (On the other hand, Nixon can't be blamed for starting his war, whereas Bush initiated his -- albeit with substantial backing from Democrats.) Bush's view of power and his iron-fisted manner of governance also come from the Nixon playbook. Karl Rove, who headed the College Republicans during Watergate, sought to complete Nixon's mission of building a permanent Republican majority. In Nixonian fashion, the Bush-Rove strategy has been to use bullying to stifle opposition: demonizing the news media, discrediting policy experts, disdaining the separation of powers. Bush's theory of a "unitary" executive power is little more than a restatement of a Nixon utterance: "When the president does it, that means that it is not illegal."

But again, if Bush has given Nixon good chase when it comes to undemocratic hardball politics, he hasn't surpassed the master. Nixon's belief in the inherent legality of his own actions led him to authorize burglaries and approve criminal acts -- paying hush money, trying to get the CIA to lie to the FBI -- to thwart the Watergate investigation. And these were only the most well-known and well-documented of the counts against him in the articles of impeachment approved by the House Judiciary Committee in 1974.

While Nixon had his diehard defenders, something close to a national consensus emerged over the idea that his crimes were unprecedented and required his removal from office. Barry Goldwater conservatives and Lowell Weicker Republicans, libertarians and liberals, Main Streeters and Wall Streeters all agreed that Nixon was, if not necessarily the worst president in U.S. history, deserving of the most extreme reprimand ever visited on a commander in chief. Instead of being impeached and removed from office, Nixon resigned.

No such consensus exists for a Bush impeachment. On the contrary, in this fall's election campaign, Democrats pointedly quashed any talk of seeking his ouster if they were to win control of Congress. One can argue that Bush's sanctioning of illegal wiretapping by the National Security Agency constitutes an impeachable offense. His policy of depriving suspected terrorists and POWs of Geneva Convention protections may also strike some people as grounds for removal -- although Congress, by acquiescing in Bush's military detention policy last fall, made the latter argument a tougher sell.

Either way, judgments about the impeachability of Bush for such offenses are far less clear than those rendered in 1974 about Nixon's law-breaking. Many presidents skirt the edges of unconstitutionality. Only Nixon transgressed it so blatantly that impeachment became, to use a Bush-era phrase, a slam dunk.

Bush has two years left in his presidency and we don't know what they'll hold. They may be as dismal as the first six. Future investigations may bear out many people's worst fears about this administration's violations of civil liberties. And it's conceivable that the consequences of the invasion of Iraq may prove more destructive than those of Nixon's stubborn continuation of the Vietnam War. Should those things happen, Bush will be able to lay a claim to the mantle of U.S. history's worst president. For now, though, I'm sticking with Dick.

Time's On His Side (WP)

By Vincent J. Cannato

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

After the 2004 election, a number of terribly depressed people at my university told me what a shame it was that President Bush had been reelected. If only people knew history, they lamented, they would never have voted for him.

It must be a comforting thought that this abstract thing called "history" can give us the wisdom to choose the right president, as if history books were Ouija boards and historians were modern-day oracles.

Certainly, some historians see themselves that way. In early 2004, just three years into the Bush administration, an "informal, unscientific survey of historians" by the History News Network found that more than 80 percent believed that the president was already a failure. And a miserable one at that.

Earlier this year, Princeton University historian Sean Wilentz took to the pages of Rolling Stone to ponder whether Bush is the "worst president in history" and concluded that he "appears headed for colossal historical disgrace."

So, case closed? Not yet. I long ago learned to look with suspicion when members of the left-leaning historical profession delve into contemporary politics or profess near unanimity. Today's pronouncements that Bush is the "worst president ever" are too often ideology masquerading as history.

Historical and popular judgments about presidents are always in flux. Dwight D. Eisenhower used to be considered a banal and lazy chief executive who embodied the "conformist" 1950s. Today, his reputation has improved because of more positive appraisals of his Cold War stewardship. Ronald Reagan, whom many historians dismissed as an amiable dunce, has also had his stock rise. On the flip side, Bill Clinton's presidency looks somewhat different after Monica Lewinsky, the bursting of the dot-com bubble and 9/11 than it did in 1997.

Perhaps Bush can take solace in the case of Harry S. Truman, who was reviled at the end of his presidency, with approval numbers hovering around 30 percent. Too liberal for conservatives and too conservative for liberals, Truman was saddled with an unpopular stalemate in the Korean War and accusations of corruption at home. Many saw him as a belligerent rube, too unsophisticated for the White House.

Today, however, many historians have revised their estimate of his presidency upward. There certainly are echoes of Truman in the current carping about Bush.

Most clearly, the Iraq war colors every judgment about Bush these days -- and increasingly, that color is dark. Weakened by the conflict, the administration is now stymied on challenges such as North Korea and Iran. And while focusing most of its energies on terrorism and Iraq, the Bush administration -- for which I worked briefly as a speechwriter in 2001 -- has been less energetic on the domestic front. Attempts at entitlement reform and tax reform have stalled, as has immigration reform. But there have been domestic policy successes: tax cuts, the No Child Left Behind Act, the prescription drug plan and housing policies that have expanded home ownership. All have their critics, but they represent some semblance of a domestic policy.

Any appraisal of Bush's record must consider that he took over in difficult times. By most objective measures, the economy is doing well: Inflation, interest rates and unemployment are low, economic growth is steady, and the stock market is climbing. Complaints about income inequality are legitimate, but the issue has long-term structural roots, and neither party has done much to address it.

What is disheartening is the tendency of many historians to rate presidents based on their support for liberal social policies. Just as frustrating is the inability to acknowledge the deep debates over law enforcement measures, such as the USA Patriot Act, enacted after 9/11. Rather than acknowledge the tough tradeoffs between security and privacy, we are left with the hyperbole that this administration is "trampling on civil liberties." Sometimes wisely and sometimes rashly, Bush has steered the nation through the post-9/11 world. It has been an uneven trip so far, but the country has not suffered another attack in more than five years.

Much of Bush's legacy will rest on the future trajectory of the fight against terrorism, the nation's continued security and the evolving direction of the Middle East. Things may look grim today, but that doesn't ensure a grim future.

No one expects historians to be perfectly objective. But history should at least teach us humility. Time will cool today's political passions. As years pass, more documents will be released, more insights gleaned and the broader picture of this era will be painted. Only then will we begin to see how George W. Bush fares in the pantheon of U.S. presidents.

I don't know how history will judge him. My guess is that, like most presidents, he will bequeath a mixed record. We can debate policies and actions now, but honesty should force us to acknowledge that real judgments will have to wait.

Conflict Management (WP)

By Joel Achenbach

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

The columnist George Will recently wrote that the Republicans were routed in the November elections because of "war leadership even worse than during the War of 1812." Mr. Will's words carry great weight, because he is among our leading conservative thinkers and was on record opposing both the Iraq war and the War of 1812 from the beginning.

But let's be frank: Most of us don't know anything about the War of 1812 other than the approximate date and the fact that one of the two sides was probably the United States of America (because why else would we have heard of it?). Let me divulge details of this conflict, so that the next time the War of 1812 comes up at a party, you'll be so knowledgeable that the other partygoers will refer to you as the War of 1812 Expert, which will, in turn, make you the object of feverish sexual fantasies.

Our opponent, or perhaps "enemy" is the technical term, was Great Britain. Perversely, the War of 1812 also took place in 1813, 1814 and early 1815, and thus should really be called the "War of 1812ish."

The war was arguably unnecessary. At the very least, it was an optional war, a war of choice -- if you can imagine such a thing. We'd fought the enemy before, and won, but somehow got the notion that we needed to fight the enemy again. The British were hardly blameless -- they had a nasty habit of kidnapping our sailors -- but the "war hawks" in America greatly exaggerated the threat posed by the enemy.

The fools.

How bad was our war management? Well, until recently there were three levels of wartime incompetence: Bad, Very Bad and War of 1812 Bad. Contemplate the fact that, in August 1814, the very refined first lady of the United States was forced to flee the White House and spend the night on the lam, hauled by carriage on dark country roads and finally deposited in a tavern to be hectored by fellow refugees from Washington.

Dolley Madison was, in truth, a hero, having stuck it out at the White House to the last possible moment (and having saved the famous portrait of a grim, humorless George Washington). Not so brilliant was the performance of the general assigned to protect the capital, William Winder, who had a gift for dithering around and running away. Historian Henry Adams wrote, "When he might have prepared defences, he acted as scout; when he might have fought, he still scouted; when he retreated, he retreated in the wrong direction; when he fought, he thought only of retreat; and whether scouting, retreating, or fighting, he never betrayed an idea."

Our leaders lacked a winnable strategy. Worse, they failed to anticipate what might go wrong. (The mind reels.) As British ships sailed up the Chesapeake Bay, someone warned the commander of the Army, John Armstrong Jr., that the Brits might sack Washington. "No, no! Baltimore is the place, sir; that is of so much more consequence," Armstrong responded. He never bothered to erect a single battery to protect the capital, not even a sign saying "Keep Out" or "Bad Dog."

We fought the war without enough troops. (!) We relied mostly on militiamen, which is to say, farmers with hunting rifles. A British officer described them as "country-people, who would have been much more appropriately employed in attending to their agricultural occupations than in standing with muskets in their hands."

His forces smashed, Winder retreated past the capital, deep into Montgomery County, and would have kept going to the Pacific if his men had not been exhausted.

President James Madison, more suited to desk work (he helped write a little thing we call the Constitution), did his best to gallop around the front lines to avert catastrophe, but he finally fled to the country, while the British marched into Washington, ate all the food on his dining room table, drank his wine and burned down his house. That wasn't the rocket's red glare that lighted up the sky; that was his furniture on fire.

"Before midnight the flames of three great conflagrations made the whole country light," Adams wrote, "and from the distant hills of Maryland and Virginia the flying President and Cabinet caught glimpses of the ruin their incompetence had caused."

That's rock bottom. That's what we mean by War of 1812 Bad. And maybe in a few years, historians will be able to tell us if there's a new standard.

Has He Started Talking To The Walls? (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

IT turns out we've been reading the wrong Bob Woodward book to understand what's going on with President Bush. The text we should be consulting instead is "The Final Days," the Woodward-Bernstein account of Richard Nixon talking to the portraits on the White House walls while Watergate demolished his presidency. As Mr. Bush has ricocheted from Vietnam to Latvia to Jordan in recent weeks, we've witnessed the troubling behavior of a president who isn't merely in a state of denial but is completely untethered from reality. It's not that he can't handle the truth about Iraq. He doesn't know what the truth is.

The most startling example was his insistence that Al Qaeda is primarily responsible for the country's spiraling violence. Only a week before Mr. Bush said this, the American military spokesman on the scene, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, called Al Qaeda "extremely disorganized" in Iraq, adding that "I would question at this point how effective they are at all at the state level." Military intelligence estimates that Al Qaeda makes up only 2 percent to 3 percent of the enemy forces in Iraq, according to Jim Miklaszewski of NBC News. The bottom line: America has a commander in chief who can't even identify some 97 percent to 98 percent of the combatants in a war that has gone on longer than our involvement in World War II.

But that's not the half of it. Mr. Bush relentlessly refers to Iraq's "unity government" though it is not unified and can only nominally govern. (In Henry Kissinger's accurate recent formulation, Iraq is not even a nation "in the historic sense.") After that pseudo-government's prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, brushed him off in Amman, the president nonetheless declared him "the right guy for Iraq" the morning after. This came only a day after The Times's revelation of a secret memo by Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, judging Mr. Maliki either "ignorant of what is going on" in his own country or disingenuous or insufficiently capable of running a government. Not that it matters what Mr. Hadley writes when his boss is impervious to facts.

In truth the president is so out of it he wasn't even meeting with the right guy. No one doubts that the most powerful political leader in Iraq is the anti-American, pro-Hezbollah cleric Moktada al-Sadr, without whom Mr. Maliki would be on the scrap heap next to his short-lived predecessors, Ayad Allawi and Ibrahim al-Jaafari. Mr. Sadr's militia is far more powerful than the official Iraqi army that we've been helping to "stand up" at hideous cost all these years. If we're not going to take him out, as John McCain proposed this month, we might as well deal with him directly rather than with Mr. Maliki, his puppet. But our president shows few signs of recognizing Mr. Sadr's existence.

In his classic study, "The Great War and Modern Memory," Paul Fussell wrote of how World War I shattered and remade literature, for only a new language of irony could convey the trauma and waste. Under the auspices of Mr. Bush, the Iraq war is having a comparable, if different, linguistic impact: the more he loses his hold on reality, the more language is severed from its meaning altogether.

When the president persists in talking about staying until "the mission is complete" even though there is no definable military mission, let alone one that can be completed, he is indulging in pure absurdity. The same goes for his talk of "victory," another concept robbed of any definition when the prime minister we are trying to prop up is allied with Mr. Sadr, a man who wants Americans dead and has many scalps to prove it. The newest hollowed-out Bush word to mask the endgame in Iraq is "phase," as if the increasing violence were as transitional as the growing pains of a surly teenager. "Phase" is meant to drown out all the unsettling debate about two words the president doesn't want to hear, "civil war."

When news organizations, politicians and bloggers had their own civil war about the proper usage of that designation last week, it was highly instructive — but about America, not Iraq. The intensity of the squabble showed the corrosive effect the president's subversion of language has had on our larger culture. Iraq arguably passed beyond civil war months ago into what might more accurately be termed ethnic cleansing or chaos. That we were fighting over "civil war" at this late date was a reminder that wittingly or not, we have all taken to following Mr. Bush's lead in retreating from English as we once knew it.

It's been a familiar pattern for the news media, politicians and the public alike in the Bush era. It took us far too long to acknowledge that the "abuses" at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere might be more accurately called torture. And that the "manipulation" of prewar intelligence might be more accurately called lying. Next up is "pullback," the Iraq Study Group's reported euphemism to stave off the word "retreat" (if not retreat itself).

In the case of "civil war," it fell to a morning television anchor, Matt Lauer, to officially bless the term before the "Today" show moved on to such regular fare as an update on the Olsen twins. That juxtaposition of Iraq and post-pubescent eroticism was only too accurate a gauge of how much the word "war" itself has been drained of its meaning in America after years of waging a war that required no shared sacrifice. Whatever you want to label what's happening in Iraq, it has never impeded our freedom to dote on the Olsen twins.

I have not been one to buy into the arguments that Mr. Bush is stupid or is the sum of his "Bushisms" or is, as feverish Internet speculation periodically has it, secretly drinking again. I still don't. But I have believed he is a cynic — that he could always distinguish between truth and fiction even as he and Karl Rove sold us their fictions. That's why, when the president said that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq before the midterms, I just figured it was more of the same: another expedient lie to further his partisan political ends.

But that election has come and gone, and Mr. Bush is more isolated from the real world than ever. That's scary. Neither he nor his party has anything to gain politically by pretending that Iraq is not in crisis. Yet Mr. Bush clings to his delusions with a near-rage — watch him seethe in his press conference with Mr. Maliki — that can't be explained away by sheer stubbornness or misguided principles or a pat psychological theory. Whatever the reason, he is slipping into the same zone as Woodrow Wilson did when refusing to face the rejection of the League of Nations, as a sleepless L.B.J. did when micromanaging bombing missions in Vietnam, as Ronald Reagan did when checking out during Iran-Contra. You can understand why Jim Webb, the Virginia senator-elect with a son in Iraq, was tempted to slug the president at a White House reception for newly elected members of Congress. Mr. Bush asked "How's your boy?" But when Mr. Webb replied, "I'd like to get them out of Iraq," the president refused to so much as acknowledge the subject. Maybe a timely slug would have woken him up.

Or at least sounded an alarm. Some two years ago, I wrote that Iraq was Vietnam on speed, a quagmire for the MTV generation. Those jump cuts are accelerating now. The illusion that America can control events on the ground is just that: an illusion. As the list of theoretical silver bullets for Iraq grows longer (and more theoretical) by the day — special envoy, embedded military advisers, partition, outreach to Iran and Syria, Holbrooke, international conference, NATO — urgent decisions have to be made by a chief executive who is in touch with reality (or such is the minimal job description). Otherwise the events in Iraq will make the Decider's decisions for him, as indeed they are doing already.

The joke, history may note, is that even as Mr. Bush deludes himself that he is bringing "democracy" to Iraq, he is flouting democracy at home. American voters could not have delivered a clearer mandate on the war than they did on Nov. 7, but apparently elections don't register at the White House unless the voters dip their fingers in purple ink. Mr. Bush seems to think that the only decision he had to make was replacing Donald Rumsfeld and the mission of changing course would be accomplished.

Tell that to the Americans in Anbar Province. Back in August the chief of intelligence for the Marines filed a secret report — uncovered by Thomas Ricks of The Washington Post — concluding that American troops "are no longer capable of militarily defeating the insurgency in al-Anbar." That finding was confirmed in an intelligence update last month. Yet American troops are still being tossed into that maw, and at least 90 have been killed there since Labor Day, including five marines, ages 19 to 24, around Thanksgiving.

Civil war? Sectarian violence? A phase? This much is certain: The dead in Iraq don't give a damn what we call it.

Presidential Crisis Management (WP)

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

I think the American public is very forgiving. The admission that you were on the wrong track and you're changing works well in this country.

We've taken on companies when for one reason or another polls showed that regard for them wasn't very high. You have to change behavior and then communicate that change. The classic example is what Johnson & Johnson did in the Tylenol crisis. Six people in Chicago died after taking Tylenol that had been tampered with. The chief executive of Johnson & Johnson took charge of the crisis, and he followed a policy of being as transparent as he possibly could be to protect the public. He implemented a large-scale recall of Tylenol even though he wasn't forced to do it, because he thought it would give greater assurances to Tylenol consumers. The message: Johnson & Johnson is interested in your welfare and will do everything it can to protect you and the product it sells to you.

Another situation I worked on was when Coca-Cola changed its formula and introduced what's referred to now as "New Coke." The public just did not accept it. When the original Coke was reintroduced as Coca-Cola Classic, the president of the company went on television to apologize to the American people for his bad judgment, and Coca-Cola went on to post higher sales than before. It got a hole in one after the ball hit the tree.

The number one lesson for people in government and business: If something bad happens on your watch, the sooner and the more comprehensively you disclose it, the less likely you will be to suffer from it.

Harold Burson,

founder and chairman of the public relations firm Burson Marsteller

The president should prepare America to compassionately welcome all of our troops now in harm's way as they return home, and advocate a plan to help them reenter private life. Soldiers depart to bands playing and colors flying; they return to national silence. He also needs to find those three or four key areas where he can agree with the new Congress and push for legislation that unites the country. In both of these tasks, he must avoid business school solutions. Very few of the solutions our country needs are productively measurable or usefully countable. Besides, we are suffering through one of the worst eras in our history regarding business leadership and ethics. Could Bush even find an executive free of back-dated options? Business and government are very different, and must remain so.

James E. Lukaszewski,

crisis management consultant

What the president should be focusing on right now is saying, "I've had some wins, I've had some losses. What do I want to accomplish for the American people? I know I'm taking a risk in Iraq and Iran and Afghanistan. But here are two or three smaller initiatives that will help the American people." What better way than to get the first lady involved? Laura Bush is still incredibly popular in this country -- getting her more involved in domestic initiatives (such as health care) would be extremely important for his legacy.

Mike Paul,

"The Reputation Doctor" blog

The first two rules of crisis management are: 1) Think clearly; and 2) Take the pain. Think clearly means define the problem to be solved, and understand the consequences of doing nothing, doing something and doing something more. Take the pain means doing what has to be done when it can do you the most good, whether you like it or not.

George W. Bush's presidency risks being defined by his failure to think clearly or to take the pain. From Abu Ghraib (silence followed by dissembling, allowing adversaries to define us) to Hurricane Katrina (delay, denial and delusion) to Iraq (insisting things are fine when they're not), this president has allowed wishful thinking to define his reaction to crises. If he is to have any chance of turning his presidency around, he'll need to follow Winston Churchill's advice: You must look at the facts, for the facts are looking at you.

Helio Fred Garcia,

crisis communications consultant

It's surprising that in the face of the Iraq crisis, the president hasn't embraced time-tested strategies to better manage public expectations or to speak to the fears that attentive audiences are feeling. I think this president has a lingering problem from Hurricane Katrina -- that is, that he is seen as slow to take ownership of thorny problems. Let the American people know that he is absolutely, completely and totally responsible for the prosecution, effects and outcome of the war in Iraq. No question.

Restate the war's objectives and why it is still relevant to Americans and the war on terror. Let America know what victory will look like and what will allow the war to be brought to a close. Exhibit understanding and compassion for the human toll the war is taking on soldiers, their families and innocent civilians. There's an adage in crisis communications: They don't care that you know until they know that you care. I'm not sure the president's compassion is showing through, and it's hurting his stature and credibility.

National Intelligence Director Says He'll Stay On (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, who had been rumored to be going over to the State Department as deputy secretary, said last week that he plans to remain in his current position through the end of the Bush administration.

"In my own mind at least, I visualize staying . . . through the end of this administration, and then I think probably that'll be about the right time to pack it in," he told Brian Lamb in an interview done Wednesday that will be shown on C-SPAN today.

Concerns had been raised, on Capitol Hill and within the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community, that Negroponte would leave the newly created position after having assembled a staff from other agencies that now totals 1,200.

"I've pulled together a very good team, and they've stayed with me for the past 18 months," he said, "and I hope they'll stay with me as long as I'm in the job."

Negroponte, 67, said anyone who holds his position has to have a good relationship with the defense secretary. He said he was looking forward to working with Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon.

At the end of the Reagan administration, Negroponte was the deputy national security adviser in the White House under Colin L. Powell and worked with Gates when he was CIA deputy director. "I had worked with him very closely . . . and look forward very much to working with him again," he said.

When Gates later came to the White House under President George H.W. Bush, he replaced Negroponte on the National Security Council staff as deputy director.

"One can't be responsible for overseeing the nation's intelligence activities without having a very good, cooperative and strong relationship with the Pentagon," Negroponte said.

Ironically, Gates, a former CIA director and longtime agency analyst, was openly opposed to the legislation that created the national intelligence director position and turned down the job before it was given to Negroponte.

Under Rumsfeld, the Defense Department's intelligence gathering and analysis activities have increased dramatically, as has overall government spending on intelligence. Rumsfeld also created the job of undersecretary of defense for intelligence in 2003 to coordinate all Pentagon activities. He gave the job to one of his top longtime aides, Stephen A. Cambone.

On Friday, the Pentagon announced that Cambone would be resigning at the end of the month. A Pentagon spokesman said that Gates had not requested Cambone's resignation.

Gates, whose confirmation hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee are to begin tomorrow, is expected to be questioned about Pentagon intelligence activities. In his responses to the committee's questionnaire, Gates said he did not believe the Defense Department's role was "fundamentally changed" with establishment of the national intelligence director. But he added that he wanted to see "how the program is working in actual practice."

Asked about an earlier article in which Gates had written that "for the last decade, intelligence authority has been quietly leaching from the CIA and to the Pentagon," Gates responded that it was "an area I would look into."

As Trucking Rules Are Eased, A Debate On Safety Grows (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2 — As Dorris Edwards slowed for traffic near Kingdom City, Mo., on her way home from a Thanksgiving trip in 2004, an 18-wheeler slammed into her Jeep Cherokee.

The truck crushed the sport-utility vehicle and shoved it down an embankment off Interstate 70. Ms. Edwards, 62, was killed.

The truck driver accepted blame for the accident, and Ms. Edwards's family filed a lawsuit against the driver and the trucking company.

In the course of pursuing its case, the family broached a larger issue: whether the Bush administration's decision to reject tighter industry regulation and instead reduce what officials viewed as cumbersome rules permitted a poorly trained trucker to stay behind the wheel, alone, instead of resting after a long day of driving.

After intense lobbying by the politically powerful trucking industry, regulators a year earlier had rejected proposals to tighten drivers' hours and instead did the opposite, relaxing the rules on how long truckers could be on the road. That allowed the driver who hit Ms. Edwards to work in the cab nearly 12 hours, 8 of them driving nonstop, which he later acknowledged had tired him.

Government officials had also turned down repeated requests from insurers and safety groups for more rigorous training for new drivers. The driver in the fatal accident was a rookie on his first cross-country trip; his instructor, a 22-year-old with just a year of trucking experience, had been sleeping in a berth behind the cab much of the way.

Federal officials, while declining to comment about the Edwards accident, have dismissed the assertion that deregulation has reduced safety and have maintained that in fact it has helped, though the Edwards family and many other victims of accidents have come to the opposite conclusion.

In loosening the standards, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration was fulfilling President Bush's broader pledge to free industry of what it considered cumbersome rules. In the last six years, the White House has embarked on the boldest strategy of deregulation in more than a generation. Largely unchecked by the Republican-led Congress, federal agencies, often led by former industry officials, have methodically reduced what they see as inefficient, outdated regulations and have delayed enforcement of others. The Bush administration says those efforts have produced huge savings for businesses and consumers.

Those actions, though, have provoked fierce debate about their benefits and risks. The federal government's oversight of the trucking industry is a case study of deregulation, as well as the difficulty of determining an exact calculus of its consequences. Though Ms. Edwards's family and the industry disagree on whether the motor carrier agency's actions contributed to her death, her accident illuminates crucial issues in regulating America's most treacherous industry, as measured by overall deaths and injuries from truck accidents.

The loosened standards, supporters say, have made it faster and cheaper to move goods across the country. They also say the changes promote safety; without longer work hours, the industry would be forced to put more drivers with little experience behind the wheel. Regulators and industry officials point out that the death toll of truck-related accidents — about 5,000 annually — has not increased, while the fatality rate, the number of deaths per miles traveled, has continued a long decline. The number of annual injuries has also been dropping slowly, falling to 114,000 last year.

"This administration has done a good job, and the agency has done a good job, in advancing safety issues in a manner that takes into account all the important factors of our industry," said the top lobbyist for the American Trucking Associations, Timothy P. Lynch.

But advocates of tighter rules say the administration's record of loosening standards endangers motorists. The fatality rate for truck-related accidents remains nearly double that involving only cars, safety and insurance groups say. They note that weakening the rules has reversed a course set by the Clinton administration and has resulted in the federal government repeatedly missing its own targets for reducing the death rate.

"It is a frustrating disappointment that has led to a tragic era," said David F. Snyder, an assistant general counsel at the American Insurance Association who follows the trucking industry closely. "The losses continue to pile up at a high rate. There has been a huge missed opportunity."

An Industry's Influence

In decisions that had the support of the White House, the motor carrier agency has eased the rules on truckers' work hours, rejected proposals for electronic monitoring to combat widespread cheating on drivers' logs and resisted calls for more rigorous driver training.

While applauded by the industry, those decisions have been subject to withering criticism by federal appeals court panels in Washington who say they ignore government safety studies and put the industry's economic interests ahead of public safety.

To advance its agenda, the Bush administration has installed industry officials in influential posts.

Before Mr. Bush entered the White House, he selected Duane W. Acklie, a leading political fund-raiser and chairman of the American Trucking Associations, and Walter B. McCormick Jr., the group's president, to serve on the Bush-Cheney transition team on transportation matters.

Mr. Bush then appointed Michael P. Jackson, a former top official at the trucking associations, as deputy secretary of the Department of Transportation. To lead the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, the president picked Joseph M. Clapp, the former chairman of Roadway, a trucking company, and the leader of an industry foundation that sponsored research claiming fatigue was not a factor in truck accidents, a conclusion at odds with government and academic studies.

And David S. Addington, a former trucking industry official who led an earlier fight against tougher driving limits, became legal counsel and later chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, an advocate of easing government regulations.

In addition to supplying prominent administration officials, the trucking industry has provided some of the Republican party's most important fund-raisers. From 2000 to 2006, the industry directed more than $14 million in campaign contributions to Republicans. Its donations and lobbying fees — about $37 million from 2000 to 2005 — led to rules that have saved what industry officials estimate are billions of dollars in expenses linked to tougher regulations.

But to the families of accident victims, the motor carrier agency has failed to fulfill a promise to significantly reduce fatalities, exacting a tragic personal price.

"They are not getting much done in Washington," said Daphne Izer of Maine, who founded Parents Against Tired Truckers in 1994 after a Wal-Mart driver fell asleep at the wheel of his rig, killing her son and three other teenagers in the car with him. "As a result, more people will continue to die."

Federal regulators disagree with that assessment of their performance. "We have made significant progress, yet much work remains to achieve our vision," said David H. Hugel, the new deputy administrator of the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration. "Our challenges also are increasing because our nation maintains the most extensive and complex transportation system in the world, and that system and number of people who use it continues to grow."

The federal government began overseeing the trucking industry in the 1930s, setting rates, limiting competition and regulating safety practices. From the start, companies won important concessions from Washington, including exemptions from minimum wage and other labor laws. The industry also resisted efforts to impose tougher safety standards, saying it could police itself.

In 1937, the first driving hour limits were set. Truckers were allowed drive up to 10 continuous hours but were required to rest for a minimum of 8 hours. The remaining six hours could be used for other work activities, like loading, or for breaks or meals. Truckers could drive up to 60 hours over 7 consecutive days, or 70 hours over 8 days. To enforce those rules, the government required drivers to keep logs.

Repeated efforts over the years to tighten the rules were blocked, often as a result of vigorous industry lobbying.

Trucking companies have long argued that tougher standards are not necessary to promote safety, and that they would cause devastating economic pressures. Profit margins in the industry are thin, particularly after economic deregulation in 1980 prompted competition. Long hours and low pay for drivers have led to high turnover, and carriers struggle to find replacements. Those conditions, safety experts say, have contributed to widespread safety problems.

The practice of falsifying driver hours is an open secret in the industry; truckers routinely refer to their logs as "comic books." Fines are small. The federal motor carrier agency does not have the staff to monitor closely 700,000 businesses and almost eight million trucks.

Timothy L. Unrine, a 41-year-old driver from Virginia, said in a recent interview that he was taught to conceal excessive driving hours during training last January by his former employer, Boyd Brothers Transportation of Birmingham, Ala. Mr. Unrine said his orientation instructor told his class that government inspectors were allowed to examine a monthly logbook if it was bound. But if the staples were removed, the log was considered "loose leaf" and inspectors could require an examination of only those pages from the most recent seven days, Mr. Unrine said the drivers were told.

Company officials advised drivers to use fuel credit cards that recorded only the date, not the time, of the fuel stop, he said.

Mr. Unrine added that the company pushed him to work longer hours than permitted, and that his logbooks were "adjusted" many times to make it appear he was within the limits. Several times, when he told a dispatcher he was too tired to make another trip, he said, he was ordered to do so after just a few hours' sleep.

"I never felt safe driving under these conditions," said Mr. Unrine, who left Boyd last June because of a legal dispute over medical bills from a fall. "I talked to many drivers on the fuel islands, truck stops and rest areas. Logbooks are so fake; it scares me that there aren't more accidents on the road."

Richard Bailey, the chief operating officer at Boyd Brothers, and Wayne Fiquett, the company's vice president for safety, disputed Mr. Unrine's claims. They said that drivers might have been instructed to keep only seven days of log entries, but denied that they were encouraged to violate the rules.

"Nobody here will tell someone to do something unsafe," Mr. Fiquett said. "If a driver is tired or over his hours, the system will not allow that driver to continue driving."

In 1995, Congress directed regulators to study truck driver fatigue and its safety consequences and to consider new rules. But the agency then charged with truck safety, the Federal Highway Administration, never did so. Two years later, the Clinton administration vowed to cut the annual death toll of truck-related accidents in half within a decade. In 1999, Congress created the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration in response to what lawmakers considered ineffectual regulation and high casualties.

A year later, the agency proposed tighter service hour rules. They would allow long-haul drivers to work a maximum of 12 hours a day, and require them to take 10-hour breaks between shifts. They also required installation of electronic devices to replace driver logs.

Advocates of tighter standards said the rules did not go far enough, while the industry said cutting driver hours could raise costs by $19 billion over a decade, five times more than government estimates. Action stalled when trucking lobbyists inserted language into a spending bill that forced the motor carrier agency to delay action until after the presidential election that November.

Rewriting the Rules

Industry leaders overwhelmingly supported the candidacy of George W. Bush, confident that his administration would be friendlier than one led by his opponent, Al Gore. On the campaign trail, Mr. Bush accused his Democratic rival of wanting to expand government, while Mr. Bush repeatedly expressed his desire to reduce federal regulations.

During the 2000 election cycle, trucking executives and political action committees gave more than $4.3 million in donations to the Republicans and less than $1 million to Democrats, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan research organization.

In the months before and after the election, a leading industry figure in the campaign against tighter driving rules was Mr. Acklie, who became chairman of the American Trucking Associations in the fall of 2000. A longtime Bush family friend and Republican fund-raiser, he led one of nation's largest trucking companies, Crete Carrier, based in Nebraska. Mr. Acklie, who stepped down from the post about a year after his appointment, did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Another important advocate was Mr. Addington, then general counsel to the Trucking Associations. In August 2000, when two top transportation officials complained in a press release about the industry's "raw use of political power," he demanded that they be investigated for possibly violating a federal law that prohibits officials from lobbying and issuing propaganda. In January 2001, he joined Mr. Cheney's office, where he is now chief of staff. Lea Anne McBride, the vice president's spokeswoman, said Mr. Addington had not been involved in issues related to his trucking activities.

Other industry officials also joined the administration. Mr. Jackson, a former colleague of Mr. Acklie and Mr. Addington at the trucking group, became the No. 2 official at the Transportation Department, which oversees the industry. Mr. Clapp, the former head of Roadway trucking, took over the motor carrier agency and soon became involved in rewriting the rules.

The insurance industry and safety groups provided studies showing a high percentage of accidents were caused by tired truck drivers. But after the Trucking Associations produced a study concluding that only 2 percent of accidents were caused by fatigued truckers, while more than 80 percent were caused by passenger cars, the agency decided to loosen the hourly restrictions.

In April 2003, the agency issued rules that increased the maximum driving hours to 77 from 60 over 7 consecutive days and to 88 hours from 70 over 8 consecutive days. It capped daily work hours at 14, which included driving as well as waiting for loading and unloading. The agency also decided not to require truck companies to install electronic monitoring devices.

The agency said the new rules would modestly decrease the number of fatalities by increasing the required time off for drivers, to 10 hours from 8. A year later, the agency set training standards for new drivers: 10 hours of training, none of it on the road.

Congress has provided little scrutiny of the trucking standards.

"There has not been the kind of in-depth examination of these issues that should have occurred," said Representative James L. Oberstar of Minnesota, the ranking Democrat on the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure. Mr. Oberstar and others blamed the failure on the political muscle of the industry. From 2000 to 2004, the American Trucking Associations donated $2 million to lawmakers, mostly to Republicans who served on committees with jurisdiction over trucking issues.

The courts have played a more significant role. In July 2004, a three-judge panel from the federal appeals court in Washington issued a harsh opinion in a lawsuit brought by several safety organizations over the trucking work rules.

Judge David B. Sentelle, a conservative Republican appointed by President Ronald Reagan, wrote the opinion, faulting the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration for "ignoring its own evidence that fatigue causes many truck accidents."

The opinion continued, "The agency admits that studies show that crash risk increases, in the agency's words, 'geometrically' after the eighth hour on duty." The judges said they could not understand why the agency had not estimated the benefits of electronic monitoring, saying the agency's "passive regulatory approach" probably did not comply with the law. The panel struck down the hour and service rules.

But a year later, in August 2005, the agency issued virtually identical rules, which the safety groups and the Teamsters union are again challenging in court. Oral arguments are set for Monday before another three-judge federal appeals panel here. The agency had a similar legal setback on driver training. A three-member appeals court panel called the regulation "baffling" and criticized the agency for ignoring its own studies on the need for more comprehensive training.

The agency has not responded to the court's decision by issuing any new rules.

Meanwhile, the agency has failed, by growing margins, to meet its annual targets for lowering the death rate for truck-related accidents.

Mr. Hugel, the agency's deputy administrator, blames increasing traffic for the agency's inability to meet its goals. "More trucks, combined with even more passenger vehicles," he said, "leads to more roadway congestion, increased risk and a larger number of fatalities."

In a budget submission to Congress last February, though, the Transportation Department noted its repeated failure to cut the death rate and conceded that the agency "has difficulty demonstrating how its regulatory activities contribute to reaching its safety goal."

Safety experts, for their part, say the numbers reflect the agency's failings.

"The fatalities speak to the agency's lackluster performance," said Jacqueline S. Gillan, vice president of Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety, an alliance of consumer, health and insurance organizations. "These truck crashes happen one at a time in communities across the country and get little attention," Ms. Gillan said. "Can you imagine what the outcry would be at the F.A.A. if we had 25 major airplane crashes a year, which is the equivalent of what is happening with trucks?"

A Family's Lawsuit

After Ms. Edwards's death, her only son, Steve, a professional musician in Chicago, sued the trucking company, Werner Enterprises of Omaha, and the driver involved in the accident, John L. McNeal, 36. Mr. McNeal was dismissed shortly after the accident.

Mr. McNeal said in a sworn deposition that he had been tired from driving all day from Tennessee without a break. He had been in the cab for about 12 hours, including about 8 hours at the wheel. Because he had been driving trucks professionally for only a month, he was assigned a trainer, who had slept much of the trip.

After Mr. McNeal acknowledged he was at fault, Werner Enterprises settled the lawsuit for $2.4 million. Werner's general counsel, Richard S. Reiser, said that the company had a strong safety record and that its training program far exceeded the federal requirements. Mr. Reiser said that Mr. McNeal was in compliance with both the old and new work hour rules but acknowledged he was unfamiliar with the proposals by safety groups that would have prevented the driver from working as long as he did that day. He also said that any driver who was tired should stop, regardless of how long he had been on the road.

"The driver should be the one who says, 'If I'm tired, I should pull over,' " Mr. Reiser said.

Mr. Edwards, though, thinks responsibility for safety goes beyond individual drivers, and links his mother's death to the Bush administration's decisions against imposing tighter driving limits. "These drivers are working hard every day on the road to make a living," he said. "They are overtired and underpaid."

Mr. Edwards said his mother, who had worked at a Procter & Gamble Company factory before her weakened knees forced her to retire, had been looking forward to traveling, gardening and playing with her grandchildren.

"If there is any silver lining, it is that he hit her so hard she never saw it coming," Mr. Edwards said of the accident. "She probably was happy that she was going to be home soon."

$10M CDC Deal Raises Questions (AJC)

By Alison Young

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 3, 2006

It began when a prominent Atlanta business leader introduced Dr. Julie Gerberding to a man who wanted to be her free management adviser, to help her transform operations at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Now the agency is scrambling to explain the gyrations it used to give $10 million in business without competition to a consulting firm associated with and recommended by CDC director Gerberding's free adviser.

A CDC public relations risk-management analysis obtained by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution identified several "threats" to the agency, including "significant procurement mistakes" and an "inappropriately backdated" contract document.

The circumstances described in that risk analysis â€" which CDC officials now seek to discredit as merely "conjecture" â€" raise questions about serious and potentially criminal violations of federal procurement law, according to government contract experts.

And an explanation offered late Friday by CDC officials appears to illustrate questionable practices that experts say are designed to award contracts to favored companies, denying others the opportunity to compete and taxpayers the assurance that the government is paying a fair price.

Gerberding and CDC officials have refused repeated requests to release documents involving the firm Celerant Consulting, which worked at the agency from 2003 through 2005. The agency also has refused to release documents relating to whether a conflict of interest existed when James W. Down, Gerberding's volunteer business adviser, recommended Celerant to overhaul CDC's procurement and grants office. He made the recommendation around October 2003, four months after Celerant sent out a press release announcing Down as a new member of the firm's U.S. Advisory Board.

Celerant and Down contend the press release was mistakenly issued and that he never accepted the firm's position.

Down, who lives in Winchester, Mass., and has been a member of the CDC Foundation board of directors since 2004, declined to be interviewed. His attorney, former Massachusetts Attorney General Scott Harshbarger, said Saturday that Down never had a conflict of interest and was only trying to help the CDC. He praised Down's integrity.

"Candidly, I am defending Jim Down here, I'm not defending some of the issues CDC and the foundation need to address," Harshbarger said. He said volunteers like Down are put at risk of questions of impropriety because the agency and the foundation are lax in having procedures for them to make formal disclosures of even potential conflict of interest issues.

Celerant, a global consulting firm with its U.S. headquarters in Lexington, Mass., declined to grant interviews. In a brief statement, the company said: "Celerant's business relationship with the CDC was legal and proper."

And the company said it never had any relationship with Down, despite the 2003 press release. Harshbarger said that while Down had a discussion with Celerant, he never agreed to work for the firm. He said he doesn't know why Celerant never issued a correction.

CDC officials said Friday that while some mistakes were made in the contracting process, their only intent was to get the agency the expertise it needed to revamp its sluggish contracting office. The agency believed it followed proper procedures, they said, and that taxpayers were well-served, regardless of the process used.

"The procurement and grants office at CDC is a completely different entity than it was a few short years ago," said Alan Kotch, the office's acting director, citing dramatic drops in processing times and increases in productivity as a result of Celerant's help.

Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said late Friday that he will be asking the CDC to provide information on its contracting with Celerant. He also said he will ask the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, to examine the CDC's contracting procedures.

Fear of bad publicity

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution has been seeking records about Celerant and Down under the federal Freedom of Information Act since Oct. 3.

After the FOIA request was made, a CDC employee from the Office of the Director performed a risk analysis of issues facing the agency if and when information about its dealings with Celerant became public.

The analysis, obtained by the AJC, said there was "No assurance that CDC received the best value solution to its concerns because [of the] inappropriate procurement process used." It states that the agency "inappropriately backdated a contract document" and notes a "potential conflict of interest between external individual serving as adviser to CDC and Celerant."

The analysis was prepared by Martin Landry, who is listed in an agency directory as a management adviser in Gerberding's office.

Among the "threats" identified by Landry in the document: "Negative publicity will further question top CDC management, as it was so involved in the early process."

And among the top four questions Landry posed â€" without an answer â€" in the memo were: "Why did CDC's top management collude to provide a generous, $10 million, sole-source contract to Celerant, primarily based on the recommendation of another CDC contractor who was discussing potential employment with Celerant at the same time?"

Landry did not respond to interview requests.

Donna Garland, chief of CDC's Office of Enterprise Communications, an arm of the director's office that specializes in risk communications, did not respond to an interview request about Landry's analysis.

She sent an e-mail to all CDC employees and contractors Friday evening, in anticipation of this report, saying the analysis was "an internal document that was not using the facts, but conjecture."

She wrote: "CDC's core values of accountability, respect, and integrity count. When we get it wrong we must own it. The fictitious questions that someone could possibly ask when pursuing a story about PGO [the procurement and grants office] were written down, and I own that this was not a good idea. I apologize for this."

'This is a common abuse'

The road that led to the CDC's hiring of Celerant began with an introduction made by Atlanta businessman Kent "Oz" Nelson, who at the time was board chairman of the CDC Foundation, a nonprofit that supports the agency.

Nelson, former chairman and chief executive officer of United Parcel Service, became a key Gerberding adviser after she was named CDC director in July 2002. Nelson, among other things, worked to identify business consulting expertise to help Gerberding chart a new strategic vision and reorganization of the agency.

"I told her I'd be glad to help and began searching for someone. Coincidentally, around the same time, I got a phone call from Jim Down," said Nelson in an article in the CDC Foundation's 2002-2003 annual report.

In an interview, Nelson said he knew and respected Down from Down's work years earlier as a UPS consultant. Down "was extremely effective in strategic planning," he said.

Nelson said he set up a meeting between Down and Gerberding. "They hit it off very well," he said. And Down agreed to provide his help and expertise for free, flying between Massachusetts and Atlanta nearly every week, Nelson said. The CDC reimbursed Down only for expenses, Nelson added.

Nelson said he feels "horrible" that Down is facing scrutiny. He added that when the issue first surfaced within the government in 2004, he was so comfortable that Down had done nothing wrong that he added Down to the CDC Foundation board.

"I think he is a very fine, moral man who has made a huge personal sacrifice to try to help the CDC," Nelson said.

In June 2003, while Down was serving as Gerberding's adviser, Celerant Consulting issued the press release announcing that Down had been appointed to the company's advisory board.

Around October 2003, CDC officials began discussing the need to overhaul the operations in its procurement and grants office. Down recommended Celerant for the job to CDC Chief Operating Officer Bill Gimson, said James Seligman, the CDC's chief information officer, in an interview Friday.

Gimson said Down did not mention any potential conflict of interest when he recommended Celerant. "Jim's conversation, as a matter of fact, was extremely brief," Gimson recalled Saturday. "He said 'I would like to introduce you to a company I think would do great work for CDC.' " After the agency became interested, Gimson said, Down had no further involvement.

After examining Celerant and interviewing company officials, CDC decided to hire the firm, CDC officials said.

Rather than open up the consulting contract to competitive bidding, CDC executives went looking for an existing contract elsewhere in the federal government that would allow them to hire Celerant directly. Seligman, Kotch and Gimson said this is a common and accepted practice. "Government agencies are encouraged to use government-wide contracts when they're available and appropriate," said Seligman.

Seligman called contracting officials at the National Institutes of Health, who he said identified a pre-existing contract that would work. According to the NIH Web site, this particular contract, called ECS III, is for the purchase of computer hardware and software "to satisfy your agency's desktop computing needs." CDC officials said it also allowed for the purchase of "services."

And, most important for achieving the agency's goal of hiring Celerant, one of the prime contractors had as a listed vendor Novell, the computer software giant, which at the time owned Celerant.

"This is a common abuse of IT hardware and software contracts," said Christopher Yukins, associate professor of government contracts law at the George Washington University Law School in Washington. "In this case you have an information technology â€" really a hardware/software contract â€" being used for consulting services that have little to do with information technology."

It's called "out-of-scope contracting," and in the wake of revelations that some interrogators at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq were paid under an IT contract, "this has been a matter of acute concern in the government," Yukins said.

Regardless, the NIH contract is the mechanism CDC used from about December 2003 to February 2004 to hire Celerant to do an initial assessment of how to fix the agency's procurement and grants office. The cost of this initial phase was about $580,000, Seligman said.

The CDC was pleased with Celerant's initial work and wanted the company to go ahead and implement its overhaul plan, at a cost of $10 million. Although the first contract had ended, Seligman said CDC let Celerant continue working and incurring costs while the agency sought NIH approval to again link to the IT contract.

Celerant worked without a contract in place for three months, Kotch said.

Yukins, the government contract law expert, said: "The federal government takes work done without a contract very seriously. ... It's a violation of federal law, [and] technically speaking it is a criminal violation of law." While prosecutions are rare, he said, it is a very serious matter.

A scramble to fix things

In April 2004, an anonymous letter arrived at the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, the parent agency of both the CDC and the NIH, alleging improprieties in the Celerant contracting process. Gimson said that when HHS notified him of the letter, he immediately sent a memo to HHS asking that it conduct an independent inquiry.

By July 2004, HHS officials were sufficiently concerned about the appropriateness of the contract that they issued a formal stop-work order. HHS officials would not grant interviews on the matter.

In September 2004, the CDC said HHS officials allowed the Celerant contract to be reinstated, but required the CDC to take over managing it. They also required the CDC to renegotiate the terms, which resulted in Celerant reducing its costs by $500,000, to $9.5 million. And the CDC set the effective date back to cover the February-May period when Celerant was working without a contract, the agency said.

In a brief statement, HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson said: "Through internal and independent reviews, we found that CDC entered into what it believed to be an acceptable contracting arrangement through an NIH contract."

The statement noted that HHS identified the need for stronger contracting controls at both the CDC and the NIH and both agencies promptly addressed those issues.

A spokesman for the NIH did not respond to an interview request.

Funding Continues For Illness Scientists Dismiss (WP)

By David Brown

Fifteen years after the end of the 1991 war with Iraq, a Texas researcher is in line to get as much as $75 million in federal funding to press his studies of "Gulf War syndrome," even though most other scientists long ago discounted his theories.

Epidemiologist Robert W. Haley has been trying for 10 years to prove that thousands of Persian Gulf War troops were poisoned by a combination of nerve gas, pesticides, insect repellents and a nerve-gas antidote. With the help of $16 million in past funding obtained by his backers in Congress and the Pentagon, Haley has argued that his "toxicity hypothesis" is the best explanation for the constellation of physical complaints that many veterans reported after returning from the Gulf.

Haley and his supporters, who also include a powerful cluster of veterans and government advisers, are undeterred by the scientific consensus against him.

As recently as September, a panel of the National Academy of Science's Institute of Medicine reached the same conclusion that half a dozen other expert groups had: Gulf War syndrome does not exist. After reviewing 850 studies -- essentially all the scientific literature on the topic -- the 13 scientists wrote that "the nature of the symptoms suffered by many Gulf War veterans does not point to an obvious diagnosis, etiology [cause], or standard treatment."

"Gulf War syndrome" became a catchall name for a spectrum of non-life-threatening complaints that up to 30 percent of the conflict's veterans say they have experienced at some point since the end of the war in 1991. The most commonly cited symptoms are fatigue, memory loss, poor sleep, mood changes, digestive troubles and rashes.

The ground war lasted four days and resulted in 147 battlefield deaths, but almost 199,000 of the 698,000 people who were deployed have since qualified for some degree of service-related disability. Of those, 3,317 people are disabled by "undiagnosed conditions."

From 1994 through 2003, the departments of defense, veterans affairs, and health and human services sponsored 256 studies of Gulf War syndrome, at a total cost of $316 million.Scientists Cry Foul

The size, timing and purpose of the latest appropriation has elicited muffled outrage among scientists who say there is little more to gain from pursuing Haley's ideas.

"This is a tremendously egregious misuse of government funding," said Gregory C. Gray, who headed the Navy's Gulf War illness research center in San Diego before retiring in 2001. He now directs the Center for Emerging Infectious Diseases at the University of Iowa's College of Public Health.

"After hundreds of millions of dollars and a decade or better of research, we really haven't made any significant findings," said John R. Feussner, who was VA's chief research officer from 1996 to 2002 and is now chairman of medicine at the Medical University of South Carolina. "What is the chance we will find something now? Not as high as zero."

At VA, people will not talk on the record about the appropriateness of Haley's grants -- almost all awarded outside the usual competitive routes.

"This is a very sensitive topic around here right now, in part because this might be seen as an apparent shift in how VA selects and funds research," said one official, speaking anonymously so as not to offend members of Congress. A former VA official, also unwilling to be quoted by name, was more straightforward: "Everyone is dismayed."

Haley's research was originally underwritten by billionaire H. Ross Perot. It later gained the support of VA's Research Advisory Committee on Gulf War Veterans' Illnesses, on which Haley sat until recently, and of a politically diverse group of legislators that includes Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) and Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Haley's chief congressional patron is Texas's senior senator, Kay Bailey Hutchison (R), who chairs the Appropriations Committee's subcommittee on military construction and veterans affairs. A year ago, she inserted an earmark in the 2007 federal budget that will channel $15 million to the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center, where Haley is a professor and chief of epidemiology. The grant can be renewed four times, for a total of $75 million over five years.

VA cemented the arrangement Nov. 14 when it signed a contract saying UT Southwestern will "conduct and manage research projects in order to answer central questions on the nature, causes and treatments of Gulf War veterans' illnesses," said VA spokeswoman Karen Fedele.

Hutchison twice declined a request to talk to The Washington Post for this article, as did Haley.

Just how much money will go to Haley's research is unknown. Other scientists will be able to apply for funding, but the awarding of grants will bypass VA's usual mechanisms and instead go through "a process established by and headed by the dean of the medical school" at UT Southwestern, Fedele said.

Haley's backers say a lack of focus and money are the chief reasons a cause and treatment for the Gulf veterans' ailments have not been found. Hutchison spokesman Marc Short said the senator "doesn't want people to stop doing Gulf War illness research as long as there are symptoms out there that we don't understand."The Conventional Wisdom

Outside Haley's circle, most experts think the syndrome is rooted more in medicine, psychology and culture than in toxicology.

They have concluded that it is the product of a medley of factors, including the stress of the war and the fear that Saddam Hussein might use chemical or biological weapons. For some people -- particularly reservists, in whom the symptoms are more common -- it may be a physical expression of the disruption that deployment caused in their lives. Some of the physical complaints may simply be the ordinary ups and downs of people's health, magnified by public and media attention. Gulf War syndrome may also be the military manifestation of something long seen in civilian medicine: symptoms whose cause is never found despite extensive testing and diagnostic studies.

Haley adamantly rejects that view, especially the stress argument. In three papers published in the Journal of the American Medical Association in January 1997, he outlined six distinct neurological syndromes he identified in several dozen former members of the Navy Reserve "Seabees" construction unit who served in the Gulf. He has spent much of the past decade studying them, focusing on the three most disabling syndromes. For one series of papers, he took 165 measures of neurological function.

Among the things he and his colleagues reported was that in 12 veterans with the most severe complaints, a deep-brain structure called the left basal ganglion was smaller than usual. (The right one was normal.) He also found that some ill veterans tended to have a less active version of the enzyme paraoxonase-1, which breaks down the nerve agent sarin. Veterans with symptoms were also more likely to have abnormal eye reflexes and subtle changes in the daily variation of heart rate. What remains unclear is the significance of these results.Poisoned on the Battlefield

Haley's most controversial claim is that many veterans suffering from the syndromes were probably exposed to a nerve agent during the war.

Nerve gas was released after the war, during the destruction of 816 pounds of sarin and cyclosarin at a storage complex in Khamisiyah, Iraq, in March 1991. The Defense Department modeled the "plume zone" from this explosion and in 1997 notified 98,910 veterans that they may have been briefly exposed downwind of Khamisiyah. That number was later increased to about 102,000.

Haley's backers consider those letters proof that the veterans were exposed to nerve gas. That is the view of James H. Binns Jr., a retired businessman and former deputy assistant secretary in the Defense Department who chairs the VA Gulf War illnesses research panel. "There is no contradicting that there was low-level exposure to sarin gases as a result of destruction of Iraqi weapons depots," he said in an interview.

Defense officials, however, have always been careful to talk of "potential exposures," not definite ones.

No one doing the demolition reported any symptoms of sarin poisoning at the time. Neither did anyone in the plume zone. Few doubt that air containing the vaporized compound drifted over troops, but there is no evidence that anyone actually came in contact with sarin. Furthermore, the Seabees Haley studied were far outside the plume zone, as were most other soldiers who later complained of persistent symptoms. For sarin to be part of the mix of toxins causing Haley's syndromes, there would had to have been other releases -- something experts say is extremely unlikely.

"I haven't spoken to anyone in the military or in intelligence who believes it is credible that there was deliberate use of sarin and nobody noticed," said Simon Wessely, a psychiatrist and leading British researcher of Gulf War illness.

Evidence that low-level exposure to sarin can lead to chronic illness is equally sparse.

Brain-wave tracings of monkeys exposed to low doses sometimes show changes, although the animals' behavior does not change. Rats exposed to low doses of nerve agent and pesticide perform worse in mazes, but most are back to normal in three months. The relevance of those findings to human illness that includes symptoms as diverse as joint pain and chronic diarrhea is unknown.

The few studies of people who were exposed and survived are also not very enlightening. American and British soldiers exposed to non-fatal doses of nerve gas as human guinea pigs decades ago suffered no chronic illness, but some survivors of two sarin attacks by terrorists in Japan in the 1990s reported tiredness, headaches and vision changes up to five years later.

There is also little evidence that simultaneous exposure to toxins -- even without nerve gas -- has lasting effects. A study published in October found that, properly used, DEET insect repellant, the anti-nerve-gas pill pyridostigmine bromide and insecticide-impregnated uniforms did not cause physical or mental impairment.

Overall, most scientists who have investigated the question share the same conclusion: The chance that thousands of people suffered poisoning they did not recognize at the time, and are now ill with a disease that has never been seen before, is close to nil.

But while the scientific establishment has always been skeptical of Haley's findings, 10 years ago Pentagon officials saw them as possibly the key to the mystery of Gulf War syndrome.Support Lost, and Regained

"In my opinion, Haley was researching the very essence of Gulf War illness," recalled Bernard Rostker, an economist who headed the Defense Department office devoted to that subject. In 1997, his office provided $3 million to Haley out of discretionary funds when the Dallas scientist failed to win a grant through the military's usual competitive funding mechanism.

They money was to give Haley a chance to confirm his findings in a larger, representative sample of veterans. But he did not do that, which became clear when Rostker toured the Dallas research ward in 1998 and encountered only previously examined veterans.

"I thought Dr. Rostker was going to blow a gasket right then and there," recalled Michael E. Kilpatrick, deputy director of deployment health support at the Pentagon, who was on the visit.

Haley eventually did test 336 additional veterans reached through the Dallas VA hospital, identifying 29 with one of his six syndromes. Among the 249 Seabees he had examined earlier, he found 25.

"Basically, Haley stiffed the government," Rostker said recently. He refused to give Haley more money, and Hutchison began inserting budget earmarks to fund Haley's work.

Pentagon and VA officials still say the crucial question that needs answering is whether Haley's syndromes can be found in a larger group of veterans.

To that end, the government is spending more than $10 million to ask a random sample of 10,000 veterans about symptoms, and to study the brains of several hundred who are clearly ill, using MRI scanners. Along with the new appropriation, that will extend efforts to examine Haley's theory to almost the 20th anniversary of the conflict.

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

Fewer Americans are wearing seat belts compared with last year, but usage continues to be higher in states where motorists can be pulled over solely because they are not wearing a safety belt, a new federal study shows.

Seat-belt use climbed from 58 percent in 1994 to 81 percent this year. It reached an all-time high in 2005 at 82 percent, according to a report released last week by the Department of Transportation.

"A seat belt doesn't work if it isn't on," Transportation Secretary Mary E. Peters said in announcing the findings. "Whatever it takes, we all need to do a better job making sure everyone chooses to buckle up" to help reduce rising highway fatalities.

The study gave Western states the highest marks, with usage in that region increasing from 85 percent to 90 percent in the past year.

Seat-belt use in the South edged up from 82 percent in 2005 to 83 percent this year. But it fell from 78 percent to 74 percent in the Northeast and from 79 percent to 77 percent in the Midwest during the same 12-month period, the report showed.

Data released in August by the department's National Highway Traffic Safety Administration revealed that 43,443 persons died in traffic accidents in the United States in 2005. It was the highest level in 15 years and 1.4 percent ahead of 2004, according to NHTSA.

Maryland is one of 24 states, along with the District of Columbia, that have so-called primary-prevention seat-belt laws, which allows drivers to be pulled over and ticketed solely because they are not wearing a safety belt.

Data shows these laws promote seat-belt use, and that was the case again this year, Mrs. Peters said. States with primary-prevention seat-belt laws had a combined seat-belt use rate of 85 percent in 2006, compared with 74 percent in other states.

Mrs. Peters said the department rewarded states with primary-prevention seat-belt laws incentive grants totaling $123 million this year and will continue working with states to encourage use of safety belts.

Data for the study was obtained from the National Occupant Protection Use Survey, which observes seat-belt usage on selected roadways, and by NHTSA's National Center for Statistics and Analysis.

This year's findings were based on a two-week period of observation of seat-belt use by occupants in 126,000 vehicles at about 1,900 sites.

The study found significant jumps in the proportion of front-seat passengers using safety belts between 2005 and this year and in the number of motorists wearing them while driving in heavy traffic and light fog.

The percentage of front-seat passengers who buckled up climbed from 78 percent to 97 percent during the 12-month period. The proportion of drivers wearing seat belts while traveling in light fog rose from 81 percent to 94 percent during the same period. The percentage of drivers using safety belts when traveling in heavy traffic climbed from 87 percent to 96 percent.

Pickup truck drivers are the least likely to use seat belts, the study showed. Only 74 percent currently use them, up from 73 percent last year.

The New, Soft Paternalism (NYT)

By Jim Holt

The New York Times Magazine, December 3, 2006

When the government tells you that you can't smoke marijuana or that you must wear a helmet when you ride your motorcycle even if you happen to like the feeling of the wind in your hair, it is being paternalistic. It is largely treating you the way a parent treats a child, restricting your liberty for what it deems to be your own good. Paternalistic laws aren't very popular in this country. We hew to the principle that, children and the mentally ill apart, an individual is a better judge of what's good for him than the state is and that people should be free to do what they wish as long as their actions don't harm others. Contrary to what many people believe, you can even commit suicide legally (although if you don't live in Oregon, you should think twice about seeking assistance).

But what if it could be shown that even highly competent, well-informed people fail to make choices in their best interest? And what if the government could somehow step in and nudge them in the right direction without interfering with their liberty, or at least not very much? Welcome to the new world of "soft paternalism." The old "hard" paternalism says, We know what's best for you, and we'll force you to do it. By contrast, soft paternalism says, You know what's best for you, and we'll help you to do it.

Here's an example. In some states with casino gambling, like Missouri and Michigan, compulsive gamblers have the option of putting their names on a blacklist, or "self-exclusion" list, that bars them from casinos. Once on the list, they are banned for life. If they violate the ban, they risk being arrested and having their winnings confiscated. In Missouri, more than 10,000 people have availed themselves of this program. In Michigan, the first person to sign up for it was, as it happens, also the first to be arrested for violating its terms when he couldn't resist sneaking back to the blackjack tables; he was sentenced to a year's probation, and the state kept his winnings of $1,223.

The voluntary gambling blacklist is an example of what's called a self-binding scheme. It is a way of restructuring the external world so that when future temptations arise, you will have no choice but to do what you've judged to be best for you. The classic case is that of Ulysses, who ordered his men to tie him to the mast of his ship so that he could hear the song of the Sirens without being lured to his destruction. As a freely chosen hedge against weakness of the will, self-binding would seem to enlarge individual liberty, not reduce it. So what is there to object to in a program like Missouri's or Michigan's?

Plenty, say libertarian critics. To begin with, they don't like soft paternalism when it involves the state's coercive power; they are much happier with private self-binding schemes, like alcoholism clinics, Christmas savings clubs and Weight Watchers. They also worry that soft paternalism can be a slippery slope to the harder variety, as when campaigns to discourage smoking give way to "sin taxes" and outright bans. But some libertarians have deeper misgivings. What bothers them is the way soft paternalism relies for its justification on the notion that each of us contains multiple selves — and that one of those selves is worth more than the others.

You might naïvely imagine that you are one person, the same entity from day to day. To the 18th-century philosopher David Hume, however, the idea of a permanent "I" was a fiction. Our mind, Hume wrote, "is nothing but a bundle or collection of different perceptions, which succeed each other with an inconceivable rapidity, and are in a perpetual flux and movement." According to this way of thinking, the self that inhabits your body today is only similar to, not identical with, the self that is going to inhabit your body tomorrow. And the self that will inhabit your body decades hence? A virtual stranger.

The idea of multiple selves may seem like a stoner's fantasy, but economists who study human decision-making have found it surprisingly useful. Consider: Most people, if given a choice today between doing seven hours of irksome work on May 1, 2007, versus eight hours on May 15, 2007, opt for the former. When May 1 arrives, however, they will find that their preference has flipped: they now wish to put off the work for a couple of weeks, even at the cost of having to do the extra hour's worth. Why this inconsistency, if the self calling the shots is one and the same?

Further evidence for the fragmented self comes from neuroscience. Brain scans show that the emotional part of the brain, the limbic system, is especially active when the prospect of immediate gratification presents itself. But choice among longer-term options triggers more activity in the "reasoning" part of the brain, located (suitably enough) higher up in the cortex. Now suppose you're tempted by a diet-violating Twinkie. Which part of your brain — the shortsighted emotional part or the farsighted reasoning part — gets to be the decider? There may be no built-in hierarchy here, just two autonomous brain modules in competition. That is why you might find yourself eating the Twinkie even while knowing it's bad for you. (A similar disconnect between two parts of your brain occurs when a visual illusion doesn't go away even after you learn it's an illusion.)

The short-run self cares only about the present. It is perfectly happy to indulge today and offload the costs onto future selves. For example, recent studies show that teenage smokers do not underestimate the risk of getting lung cancer as an adult (if anything, they tend to overestimate it); they simply don't mind making the future self suffer for the pleasure of the moment. The long-run self may deplore this ruinous behavior, but its prudent resolutions are continually ignored. Yet it can enforce its will indirectly by shaping the environment to constrain some short-run selves from exploiting others — by, say, putting a time lock on the refrigerator.

But why, some skeptics ask, should the government side with your prudent long-run self against your hedonistic short-run selves? What's so great about the long-run self, anyway? As the economist Glen Whitman has observed in a shrewd critique of soft paternalism, the harms that selves impose on one another are reciprocal: "The long-run self can harm the short-run self by adopting self-control devices — such as flushing cigarettes down the toilet, refusing to allow ice cream in the house, checking into a clinic and so on." It is not good to be profligate, lazy and obese, but neither is to good to be a miser, a workaholic or an anorexic.

If the goal is to promote freedom, though, there is an interesting argument favoring the long-run self. A distinctive quality of humans, as the third earl of Shaftesbury observed three centuries ago, is that we do not simply have desires; we also have feelings about our desires. Take the unhappy heroin addict: he gives himself an injection because he desires the drug, but he also has a desire to be rid of this desire. The philosopher Harry Frankfurt has given such "second order" desires a central role in his analysis of free will: we act freely, he submits, when we act on a desire that we actually desire to have, one that we endorse as our own. Beings that do not reflect on the desirability of their desires — like animals and infants and, perhaps, our short-run selves — are what Frankfurt calls "wantons."

People have fashioned a wide range of techniques for keeping their inner wantons under control — like buying a pint of ice cream instead of the more economical quart because they know they would end up consuming the latter in one sitting. So why can't soft paternalism be left to the private sector, as some libertarians prefer? The problem is that private self-binding schemes are easily subverted when someone can make a buck off your weakness of will. One Michigan man who signed up for a casino's private self-blacklisting program found the owners all too accommodating when he had a change of heart. "Within a half an hour, I was back in," he said.

Editorializing against soft paternalism earlier this year, The Economist warned that "life would be duller if every reckless spirit could outsource self-discipline to the state." There are certainly more exalted ways to achieve mastery over unwelcome impulses. Thinkers of an existentialist kidney, like Jean-Paul Sartre, used to insist that each of us is free to redefine his character through an act of radical choice. For the religiously inclined, an access of divine grace might be what is needed to stiffen the will.

But what if you are one of those people who rely on more mundane stratagems, like self-binding? The general problem you face (as put by the political theorist Jon Elster) is this: For a given uphill goal and a given strength of will, does there exist a path, however circuitous, that will get you to the top of the hill? By adding a new path here and there, state soft paternalism makes it more likely that the answer will be yes.

Is The New Congress To Be Believed? (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Well before Election Day, the smart-money lobbyists of K Street were already shifting campaign donations to safe Democratic incumbents, greasing access to the next Congressional majority. That should be warning enough to the incoming speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, and Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, to deliver quickly and credibly on their campaign vows to attack the corrupt, quid-pro-quo culture that besotted the Republican-controlled Capitol.

Yet even before the new Congress arrives, there is disquieting talk of advance compromises on what will be done — or not done. It's fortunate the incoming members will be in the Capitol this week, preparing for January and, not incidentally, observing the lame-duck finale of the Congress that failed on this vital issue.

There will be only one good chance to get this right. Once the new year begins, any feeling of urgency will fade, replaced by a determination to acquire, and protect, whatever power and turf are available. At a minimum, the reforms must include:

Creation of a public integrity office to do more than merely audit lobbyists' filings. If Congress is to regain the public's respect, both houses must create an independent office to investigate the behavioral lapses of lawmakers themselves, not just their sycophants. Anything less, and the ethics issue falls back into the lap of the moribund internal policing machinery that has long protected wayward members.

An enforceable ban, with penalties, on all meals, gifts and travel — not just from lobbyists, but also from the organizations that hire them. The ban should cover staff members as well. Privately financed "fact-finding" junkets should at long last be banned, along with lawmakers' riding as fat cats' chattel on corporate jets for token fares.

Restraints on the revolving-door horde of Congressional alumni turned backslapping lobbyists. Former lawmakers should be required to wait two years, not one, before cashing in on their nice-to-see-you cachet. No lobbyists, even former members, should have access to the floor, gym or cloakroom of either house. If a sitting member of Congress or a staff member starts negotiating for a job in the private sector, he or she should be required to disclose it. The public cannot be expected to tolerate replays of the low moment when architects of the new Medicare drug subsidy plan were secretly working to land lucrative jobs in the pharmaceutical industry while they devised the legislation.

Detailed disclosure of costly and undebated "earmarks" — amendments passed as pork-barrel favors to backdoor pleaders. The secretive spending and midnight conference games should be brought into the sunlight via Internet technology. Transparency will not stop lawmakers from trying to get funding for pet projects back home. But it might at least discourage them from doing the same thing on behalf of special interest lobbyists.

The new Congress must realize the ethics issue will test its mettle in the opening hours, and signal if real change is possible. A field general of the incoming majority, Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, is already warning that failure to deliver on ethics reform will be "devastating to our standing" in the very first moment of Democratic power.

He is absolutely right.

Seeking Clarity On Inflation (NYT)

By Condrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

IS inflation getting a second wind?

If you look at bond yields and economic reports like one on Friday that showed weakness in manufacturing, you may not think so. But other evidence may be more worrisome.

Economic growth and inflation often go hand in hand. Some recent reports have shown a bit of resilience in the housing market and an upward revision to the calculation of third-quarter economic output.

Plainly spelling out the risks, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said in a speech last week that inflation remained "uncomfortably high."

None of this has lifted rates on 10-year Treasury notes, which yield less than 4.5 percent, versus short-term rates above 5 percent.

John Lynch, chief market analyst at Evergreen Investments, attributes the strength in Treasuries to investors' faith in Mr. Bernanke and his ability to curb growth enough to keep inflation in check.

That faith will be tested on Friday, when November jobs data is announced. It is a test that Mr. Lynch expects him to pass. A Bloomberg News poll of economists estimates that the economy added 100,000 jobs last month, up from 92,000 in October, with unemployment rising to 4.5 percent from 4.4 percent. Mr. Lynch sees a gain of 100,000 to 125,000 net new jobs.

The number of Americans filing claims for unemployment benefits has been running high, he noted. “Claims have started to creep up in the last several weeks,” he said.

He added that the unemployment rate was anything but indicative of a more severe slump that would send bond yields even lower. “It’s hard to have a recession if 95 percent-plus of us are working,” he said.

A soft landing may not push bond yields much lower or help stocks much, either. Earnings growth is likely to slow with the economy, and that should limit percentage gains in share prices, to the high single digits next year, Mr. Lynch predicted.

DATA WATCH The Bloomberg poll forecasts a dip in the November reading of the Institute for Supply Management’s survey of the service economy, to 55.5 from 57.1; that report is due Tuesday. The University of Michigan’s first reading of consumer sentiment in December, due Friday, is predicted to show a slight drop to 92, down from 92.1.

Gender Pay Gap Narrows -- For Unexpected Reasons (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Marie White is a healthcare aide who looks after patients in their homes in Sonoma County, Calif. There's a shortage in her female-dominated profession, which has helped workers unionize and command better pay over the last five years — driving the pay ceiling from $6.75 to $10.50 an hour.

"By organizing, a good many of us have been able to get out of the minimum-wage category," White said.

John Wilson of Los Angeles, meanwhile, is still trying to find a job that pays as much as he earned 12 years ago. Laid off in 1994 from a software programming job that paid $50,000 a year with full health benefits, Wilson went to work as a security officer earning minimum wage.

Now he works at the Lantana Media Campus in Santa Monica, providing security for such celebrities as Ben Affleck and Cameron Diaz. He has worked his way up to $12.25 an hour, but pays about $100 a month for health insurance for his 15-year-old daughter.

Even though Wilson is making half of what he did before, he feels lucky: Many security guards he knows, mostly men, earn minimum wage without benefits.

White's and Wilson's experiences illustrate a noteworthy trend in the 21st century economy: Women are closing in on men when it comes to wages, but not for the reasons anticipated — or hoped for — when gender pay equity became a rallying cry in the 1970s.

Data show that the pay gap has been narrowing not because women have made great strides, labor experts say, but because men's wages are eroding.

The disparity in median hourly pay between men and women narrowed to 18.3% in August from 21.5% five years earlier, according to recently released census figures. In addition, the U.S. Labor Department noted recently that the wage differential in 2005 was the smallest since the department began tracking it 33 years ago, when it was 36.9%.

Even when men's and women's work patterns are taken into account — men tend to work more hours — the pay gap is narrowing. The difference between men's and women's median annual earnings shrank between 2000 and 2005 from 26.3% to 23%, or 77 cents on each dollar earned by men. Women earned an average $31,858 and men $41,386.

The gap was even smaller in California: 17.8%, with women earning $37,076 and men $45,126.

However — as the economy expanded, profits rose and unemployment fell — men's hourly wages declined a total of 2% from 2000 to 2005 while women's rose 3%, census records show. Women's gains were barely enough to keep up with inflation.

"Wages generally have been depressed, but men's have been more depressed," said Michele Leber, chair of the Washington-based National Committee on Pay Equity, who called the trend "discouraging."

Economists say the forces behind these trends show that men and women are experiencing the economy in different ways.

In the U.S., men have tended to dominate in blue-collar and manufacturing jobs, which have been disappearing — or seeing downward wage pressure — for the last few decades.

Women, on the other hand, have been more prevalent in service jobs such as healthcare, which historically have been lower-paying but have seen wages rise in recent years.

Indeed, economists note that among those with a high school education or less, men's wages have been falling while women's have been rising due to increased demand for service-sector jobs.

Meanwhile, better-educated women have seen their pay rise — but not as much as their male counterparts have. So women's gains relative to men's appear to be coming mostly in lower-wage jobs.

The gap started narrowing in the 1980s due largely to women's increased access to education and better-paying jobs. In the 1990s, their gains leveled out while men's wages rose at all skill levels, thanks to the economic expansion fueled by the dot-com boom, economists say.

Women lost some ground in the recession after 2001, said Heather Boushey, an economist at the Washington-based Center for Economic and Policy Research, and have seen their wage gains resume only recently.

"This year [women's relative pay] reached a new peak, but I don't think it was much to get excited about, especially since the only reason was because men's wages fell faster," Boushey said.

Some say a vanishing pay gap should be celebrated as good news, no matter what the reason.

"All we care about is the ratio," said Claudia Goldin, a Harvard University economics professor who has studied women in the workforce.

While men may be earning less, women are earning more on average than they used to, which is in itself an achievement, said Francine D. Blau, the Frances Perkins professor of Industrial and Labor Relations and Labor Economics at Cornell University.

Indeed, she said, achieving pay equity almost requires a slowdown in men's wage growth. "You can't have it both ways," Blau said. "For women to catch up, their wages have to grow more."

But other economists and pay equity advocates say the whole idea of narrowing the gap was to help women and their families earn substantively more.

"We're closing the wage gap in exactly the wrong way," said Rebecca Blank, dean of the University of Michigan's Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy. "The idea was that women's wages were supposed to rise, not that men's wages would fall to women's level."

Economist Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute in Washington said: "Low-wage men have just been taking it on the chin. What you would like to see, especially during a period when the economy is growing at a good clip, is men's wages rising but women's wages rising more as they move toward equal pay for equal work."

Blank said that men and women's wages would probably stabilize and then rise during the next two decades as baby boomers retire and the labor supply dwindles.

White, the home health worker, said she hoped something could be done sooner to help workers — both men and women — who had seen their pay suffer. She noted that although her pay had risen in recent years, "it's still not a living wage."

"You have loads of people down at the bottom and super jobs at the top and the middle class in between being really squeezed," she said. "It's got to get better because we can't survive on these wages. It's scary."

Downsized, But Not Out Of Demand (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

Former autoworkers find themselves courted by industries elsewhere.

DEARBORN, MICH. — After spending most of his working life on an assembly floor at Ford Motor Co., Harold Jackson wasn't expecting many offers as he trudged into a job fair at the union hall.

Here he was, a 40-year-old factory worker in a state that has lost about 110,000 auto jobs over the last six years.

But John Riddle, a recruiter for CSX Transportation Inc., pressed forward out of the crowd to shake his hand. "Ever thought about moving to the East Coast? Ever wanted to be a train conductor?"

After Riddle finished his spiel, a recruiter from the U.S. Secret Service stepped up, touting the wonder of government service, pointing out that such jobs couldn't be outsourced to India and that no Japanese competitor could underbid the work.

Soon, instructors who train casino dealers were courting Jackson with visions of fat tips and flexible hours.

"I had no idea there were so many options," Jackson said.

After decades of being kicked around by foreign competitors and laid off by the hundreds of thousands by their U.S. employers, the autoworker has unexpectedly become one of the hottest commodities in industrial America.

Last week, Ford announced that 38,000 factory workers had agreed to take buyout and early retirement offers to leave their jobs as soon as January, walking away with payouts of as much as $140,000 each. Nearly 35,000 General Motors employees took buyouts over the summer.

Michigan is suffering through the longest stretch of job losses since the Great Depression, and the outlook for autoworkers is expected to remain grim, according to a recent report by the Research Seminar in Quantitative Economics at the University of Michigan.

From now through the end of 2008, the state's manufacturing sector is expected to lose 11.5% of its remaining workforce, seven in 10 of these jobs from the auto industry, the report said.

But for employers outside the Rust Belt, the bounty of former autoworkers is pure gold. For generations, these workers have epitomized the industrial work ethic, putting in long hours on often mind-numbing tasks involving complex machinery.

"There's a huge pool of people that know how to work hard, have enough skills that they can be retrained and are hungry for a job," said Kathryn Blackwell, a corporate spokeswoman for Union Pacific Railroad. Company recruiters have attended several Midwestern job fairs in search of replacements for its own aging work force.

"Considering the economy's doing well in other parts of the country, what company needing workers wouldn't see this as a prime opportunity?" Blackwell said.

Squeezing through a dirt-streaked crowd of fellow autoworkers freshly clocked out of their factory shifts, Corey Wilson wandered the packed United Auto Workers Local 600 hall. Every few steps, recruiters stuffed tchotchkes into his hands — along with job applications.

Have a free mug. By the way, electricians are wanted in Florida. Take this pen. Did you know that welders are needed in Wyoming? How about a slice of pizza? You can use your Ford buyout money to open a Little Caesars franchise in the Southwest.

Overwhelmed, Wilson — who has worked on a Ford assembly line for five years — stepped away from the crowd and found a quiet corner.

Framed black-and-white photographs hung along the walls around him: autoworkers marching in 1932 to demand jobs and emergency relief from Ford; police attacking the protesters; and bodies littering the streets.

Suddenly, a recruiter stepped up, blocking Wilson's view.

"What are you looking for?" asked Robert Gale, who was seeking students for Home Building Workshops Inc. "What do you want?"

Wilson, 36, will leave his Ford assembly line job next year with $100,000 in buyout money, no health insurance and no idea of what to do with the rest of his life.

His reply was simple: "Opportunity."

But leaving Michigan to take advantage of job offers sometimes isn't easy.

Couples find themselves scrambling to land jobs in the same city. And cuts in the workforce here have dragged down property values and slowed home sales.

Blackwell — who worked in media relations at Ford and DaimlerChrysler AG before she and her husband headed to Omaha in 2001 so she could take the Union Pacific job — said she has tried over the years to sell friends back home on the idea of following her.

Few have been willing to make the jump.

"I've really had to talk up Nebraska. We don't have any lines at restaurants. We don't have traffic. There's a lot of money here, so there's heavy support for cultural things," Blackwell said. "Sure, the salaries aren't as high as you can make in the auto industry. But there's stability.

"But when you're working for an auto company," she said, "you consider yourself part of a family that built the American dream. Leaving that dream behind is too much for a lot of people."

Other recruiters have enjoyed more success. Campbell County, a rural part of northeast Wyoming where natural gas and coal production is booming, has hosted several job fairs in Michigan this year. More than 100 residents have left the Wolverine State for the Great Plains, said Ruth Benson, executive director of the Campbell County Economic Development Corp.

She's planning another Michigan fair in March, as well as trips next year to Indiana, Wisconsin and Ohio.

"The Midwesterners are hearty, blue-collared folks. They're our kind of people," Benson said. "Now that we're getting them here, the question for us is whether they'll stay here for the long term, or whether the draw back home will be too strong to ignore."

Health Hazard: Computers Spilling Your History (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim And Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

BILL CLINTON'S identity was hidden behind a false name when he went to NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital two years ago for heart surgery, but that didn't stop computer hackers, including people working at the hospital, from trying to get a peek at the electronic records of his medical charts.

The same hospital thwarted 1,500 unauthorized attempts by its own employees to look at the patient records of a famous local athlete, said J. David Liss, a vice president at NewYork-Presbyterian.

And just last September, the New York City public hospital system said that dozens of workers at one of its Brooklyn medical centers, including doctors and nurses, technicians and clerks, had improperly looked at the computerized medical records of Nixzmary Brown, a 7-year-old who prosecutors say was beaten to death by her stepfather last winter.

Powerful forces are lobbying hard for government and private programs that could push the nation's costly and inefficient health care system into the computer age. President Bush strongly favors more use of health information technology. Health insurance and medical device companies are eager supporters, not to mention technology companies like I.B.M. and Google. Furthermore, Intel and Wal-Mart Stores have both said they intend to announce plans this week to embrace electronic health records for their employees.

Others may soon follow. Bills to speed the adoption of information technology by hospitals and doctors have passed both chambers of Congress.

But the legislation has bogged down, largely because of differences over how to balance the health care industry's interest in efficiently collecting, studying and using data with privacy concerns for tens of millions of ordinary Americans — not just celebrities and victims of crime.

Advocates of such legislation, including Representative Joe L. Barton, the Texas Republican who is the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said that concern about snooping should not freeze progress on adopting technology that could save money and improve care.

"Privacy is an important issue," said Mr. Barton, who will lose the chairman's post when the Democrats take over next year, "but more important is that we get a health information system in place." Congress can address privacy later "if we need to," he said.

Democrats, however, have made it clear that they are determined to address the issue of medical-records privacy once they take command of both houses of Congress next month. "There is going to be much more emphasis placed upon privacy protections in the next two years than we have seen in the last 12 years," said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts and a longtime privacy advocate.

Mr. Markey, a member of the Energy and Commerce committee, said he supported legislation that would allow individuals to keep their medical records out of electronic databases, and require health care providers to notify patients when health information is "lost, stolen or used for an unauthorized purpose."

Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the ranking Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the Energy and Commerce committee next month, said that expanding electronic health care systems "clearly has great potential benefit." But he added that "it also poses serious threats to patients' privacy by creating greater amounts of personal information susceptible to thieves, rascals, rogues and unauthorized users." Members of his committee, as well as the House Ways and Means Committee, have been struggling with such issues.

Academic medical centers like NewYork-Presbyterian have considerable experience with electronic records. But many other hospitals have been slow to jump on board, as have doctors and patients. Only one in four doctors used electronic health records in 2005, according to a recent study by researchers at Massachusetts General Hospital and George Washington University, and fewer than 1 in 10 doctors used the technology for important tasks like prescribing drugs, ordering tests and making treatment decisions.

Cathy Schoen, a senior researcher at the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit foundation, said primary-care doctors in the United States were far less likely than doctors in other industrialized countries to use electronic records. In Britain, 89 percent of doctors use them, according to a recent report in the online edition of the journal Health Affairs; in the Netherlands, 98 percent do.

Technology experts have many explanations for the slow adoption of the technology in the United States, including the high initial cost of the equipment, difficulties in communicating among competing systems and fear of lawsuits against hospitals and doctors that share data.

But the toughest challenge may be a human one: acute public concern about security breaches and identity theft. Even when employers pay workers to set up computerized personal health records, many bridle, fearing private information will fall into the wrong hands and be used against them.

"When I talk to employees, the top concern they have is: 'What happens to my information? What about the Social Security numbers on my employee insurance, as well as the identity threat now appearing in health care?' " Harriett P. Pearson, I.B.M.'s chief privacy officer, said in a recent interview. "We have to be proactive about addressing privacy issues."

Dr. J. Brent Pawlecki, associate medical director at Pitney Bowes, the business services company, said that people in the United States are most concerned that they could lose their health insurance, based on something in their health records. Pitney Bowes is weighing the pros and cons of electronic personal health records for its employees.

The worries are widely held. Most Americans say they are concerned that an employer might use their health insurance records to limit job opportunities, according to several surveys, including a recent one by the nonprofit Markle Foundation.

Some patients are so fearful that they make risky decisions about their health. One in eight respondents in a survey last fall by the California HealthCare Foundation said they had tried to hide a medical problem by using tactics like skipping a prescribed test or asking the doctor to "fudge a diagnosis."

Dr. Stephen J. Walsh, a psychiatrist and former president of the San Francisco Medical Society, said, "I see many patients who don't want any information about their seeing a psychiatrist on a record anywhere."

CONGRESS addressed some of these concerns in 1996, when it passed the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act. That made it a federal crime, albeit rarely punished, to disclose private medical information improperly.

But critics say that the law has some worrisome loopholes, that infractions are rarely prosecuted, and that violators have almost never been punished. The law, for example, lets company representatives review employees' medical records in order to process health insurance claims.

Critics say that it would not be unusual in some companies for the same supervisor to be in charge both of insurance claims and of hiring and firing decisions; this could allow companies to comb their ranks for people with expensive illnesses and find some reason to fire them as a way to keep health costs under control. Easily accessible computerized files would make the job that much easier, the critics say.

Joy L. Pritts, a health policy analyst at Georgetown University, said that in developing and promoting health information technology, the government seemed to assume that it could "tack on privacy protections later." But she warned: "That attitude can really backfire. If you don't have the trust of patients, they will withhold information and won't take advantage of the new system."

Executives can hire private tutors who specialize in teaching how to stay on the right side of the rules. But based on the experience so far, there is little chance that executives will be punished if they break them.

The Office for Civil Rights in the Department of Health and Human Services has received more than 22,000 complaints under the portability law since the federal privacy standards took effect in 2003; allegations of "impermissible disclosure" have been among the most common complaints. But the civil rights office has filed only three criminal cases and imposed no civil fines. Instead, it said, it has focused on educating violators about the law and encouraging them to obey it in the future.

With federal enforcement so weak, privacy advocates say they are also concerned about recent efforts in Congress to pre-empt state consumer protection laws. They often provide stronger privacy rights and remedies, particularly for information on H.I.V. infection, mental illness and other specific conditions.

State laws, unlike the federal law, have resulted in some stiff penalties. Last April, a California state appeals court approved a malpractice award of $291,000 to Nicholas Francies, a San Francisco restaurant manager, who lost his job after his doctor disclosed his H.I.V.-positive status in a worker's compensation notice to Mr. Francies's employer. He also got $160,000 from his employer in a settlement.

Dr. Deborah C. Peel, a psychiatrist and privacy advocate in Austin, Tex., has assembled a broad group called the Patient Privacy Rights Foundation, to lobby in Washington. Members span the political spectrum, from the American Civil Liberties Union and the U.S. Public Interest Research Group to the American Conservative Union and the Family Research Council.

Newt Gingrich, the Republican former House speaker, has called for "a 21st-century intelligent health system" based on electronic records. He also says individuals "must have the ability to control who can access their personal health information."

"People do have a legitimate right to control their records," said Mr. Gingrich, who has worked closely with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, on the issue of computerized records. On their own, they have also advocated strict rules to protect privacy.

Mr. Gingrich noted that the Senate had twice passed bills to prohibit discrimination based on personal genetic information; the House did not vote on them. Democrats say the outlook for such legislation will improve when they take control of Congress.

EVEN without new federal laws to guide them, some companies have begun to encourage their employees to embrace electronic medical records. At Pitney Bowes, employees are paid a bonus if they store a copy of their personal health records on WebMD.com, the medical Web site.

"We haven't pushed that, except to make an offering," Dr. Pawlecki said. But for those without electronic records, he added, "any time you go to a different system or a different doctor, the chances are that your records will not be able to follow you." As a result, there is a risk of "harmful care," like drug interactions or side effects, he said, as well as risks of omitting needed care and conducting duplicate tests.

Pitney Bowes and WebMD Health are among a group of 25 companies meeting with Ms. Pearson of I.B.M. to develop a set of principles and best practices that she said would help persuade people that their employers really did not look at private information stored online.

Ms. Pearson's group is working with Janlori Goldman, director of the Health Privacy Project in Washington. Employers need to adopt standards for personal health records that address their workers' privacy, confidentiality and security concerns, Ms. Goldman said.

WebMD, which manages employees' health records for dozens of companies, had discussions earlier this year with Google, which is developing a Web site called Google Health, according to people familiar with the project. Google has not commented on its plans. But commenting generally on the issues, Adam Bosworth, the vice president for engineering at Google, said that privacy is a hurdle for technology companies addressing health care problems.

"There is a huge potential for technology to improve health care and reduce its cost," Mr. Bosworth said in a statement. "But companies that offer products and services must vigorously protect the privacy of users, or adoption of very useful new products and services will fail."

Even before the theft this year of a Veterans Affairs official's laptop that contained private medical records of 28 million people, a consumer survey found that repeated security breaches were raising concerns about the safety of personal health records.

About one in four people were aware of those earlier breaches, according to a national telephone survey of 1,000 adults last year for the California HealthCare Foundation. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The survey, conducted by Forrester Research, also found that 52 percent were "very concerned" or "somewhat concerned" that insurance claims information might be used by an employer to limit their job opportunities.

The Markle survey, to be published this week, will report even greater worry — 56 percent were very concerned, 18 percent somewhat concerned — about abuse by employers. But despite their worries, the Markle respondents were eager to reap the benefits of Internet technology — for example, having easy access to their own health records.

Companies that have tried to use computers to increase the efficiency of medical care say their success has hinged on security. "The privacy piece was critical," said Al Rapp, corporate health care manager at United Parcel Service, which recently introduced a health care program built on computerizing the records of 80,000 nonunion employees.

U.P.S. offers to add $50 each to workers' flexible spending accounts if they agree to supply information for a personal "health risk appraisal." They can receive another $50 if spouses also participate. More than half accepted, Mr. Rapp said, with the understanding that the information would go to data archives at UnitedHealth Group and Aetna. "We are not involved in any way," he said, referring to U.P.S.'s managers.

Aetna and UnitedHealth combine these appraisals with each person's history of medical claims and prescription drug purchases. When the software signals a personal potential for costly conditions like diabetes, heart problems and asthma, an insurance company nurse, or health coach, telephones the employee with suggestions for preventive care and reminders for checkups, taking medications and the like.

"The employee can tell the nurse who calls that they don't want to participate," Mr. Rapp said. "Thus far, it has been very well accepted."

Last week, he said, the health coach reached out to the spouse of an employee after noting that her condition and weight suggested a potential risk for a heart attack.

"She asked this person, 'Are you taking your cholesterol medication, Lipitor?' She said, 'I won't take Lipitor,' " and went on to mention the side effects she had read about on the Internet, Mr. Rapp said.

The nurse informed the woman's doctor, who changed her prescription to a similar drug, Mr. Rapp said. He added that he was one of "a very few select people in the human resources department" who are permitted to see personal health records, under the federal privacy rules.

"I can see the names, to see the issues," Mr. Rapp said. "I manage the program. I have responsibility for the success of the program." But he added that he was prohibited under the law from sharing the employee's data with other U.P.S. managers. "Generally speaking, U.P.S. would have no knowledge of it," Mr. Rapp said.

Still, worries linger across the health care system. Hospital executives say that private investigators have often tried to bribe hospital employees to obtain medical records that might be useful in court cases, including battles over child custody, divorce, property ownership and inheritance.

But computer technology — the same systems that disseminate data at the click of a mouse — can also enhance security.

Mr. Liss, of NewYork-Presbyterian, said that when unauthorized people tried to gain access to electronic medical records, hospital computers were programmed to ask them to explain why they were seeking the information.

Moreover, Mr. Liss said, the computer warns electronic intruders: "Be aware that your user ID and password have been captured."

Reality Check For Stem Cell Optimism (LAT)

By Mary Engel

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

The meeting was almost over when Roman Reed steered his wheelchair to the microphone.

On the table before him sat a 149-page book of budget charts and timetables, the first concrete outline of what California's voter-approved stem cell institute plans to accomplish in its 10-year lifespan.

"I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart," Reed said to the institute's staff and 29-member oversight board in October. "I promised my son that one day I would be able to walk, stand next to him and go hold my wife's hand. And seeing this road map to cures, I know that this will come true."

The room at Los Angeles' Luxe Hotel thundered with applause for the Fremont resident, who broke his neck while playing college football in 1994.

Despite the enthusiasm of Reed and his audience, the book offered no promise of a cure for his paralysis.

Two years after California voters authorized $3 billion in bonds to fund stem cell research, the institute created to oversee the enterprise has just begun what experts see as a long and slow scientific journey. Even with the $150-million state loan approved recently to kick-start work stalled by legal challenges, there are no breakthroughs in sight. Gone are the allusions to healing such afflictions as spinal cord injuries and Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases that dominated the 2004 campaign for Proposition 71. In fact, scientists say, there is no guarantee of cures — certainly not any time soon — from the measure that was optimistically titled the California Stem Cell Research and Cures Act.

Set for final approval at UC Irvine this week, the draft plan is clear: "It is unlikely that [the California Institute of Regenerative Medicine] will be able to fully develop stem cell therapy for routine clinical use during the 10 years of the plan."

Instead, the top goal is to establish, in principle, that a therapy developed from human embryonic stem cells can "restore function for at least one disease."

That would be only the first step toward persuading pharmaceutical or biotech companies to fund expanded clinical trials, a process that takes years and millions of dollars. Fewer than 20% of potential therapies that enter trials make it to market.

In addition, the institute hopes to have treatments for two to four more diseases in development within the decade.

"We picked a goal that we thought was realistic, that, with some luck, would be achieved," institute President Zach Hall said. "The field will go on beyond 10 years. We want to have a whole pipeline of things that are in movement."

Honesty appreciated

Jesse Reynolds of the Oakland-based Center for Genetics and Society, a watchdog group that supports stem cell research but advocates better public accountability, called the goals "refreshingly honest."

"The Prop. 71 campaign went beyond the line of responsible political rhetoric," he said. "If there are therapies, they're decades out."

One TV ad, for instance, showed an unidentified young mother beside a child strapped in a wheelchair and breathing through a tube.

"I will vote 'yes' on Prop. 71, definitely," the woman said. "I believe that it's something that can cure spinal cord injuries."

State Senate Health Committee Chairwoman Deborah Ortiz (D-Sacramento), another research backer, was philosophical about the campaign's optimism.

"A campaign requires a message to be driven home," she said. "You can't raise those hopes and then say, 'Oh by the way, it may take us 10 or 15 years.' That's just the nature of campaigns."

California's attempt to cure diseases by referendum is unique. But touting dramatic cures in exchange for research dollars has become "the American way" of doing medical research, said Robert Blendon, professor of health policy and management at the Harvard School of Public Health.

The Nixon-era "war on cancer" suggested that a country that could put a man on the moon — in less than a decade — could surely find a cure within the same time frame. Now, Blendon said, "You can't just talk about investing in research without the equivalent of the trip to the moon."

Such campaigns appeal to an American public that expresses great faith in science but shows little understanding of the plodding nature of most scientific research. Blendon doesn't see downplaying the time frame as dishonest as long as the research truly holds potential.

Proposition 71 came about in response to President Bush's August 2001 mandate restricting federal funding to only a handful of human embryonic stem cell lines, prompted by moral concerns about destruction of embryos during such research. When the measure passed in November 2004, jubilant supporters had predicted that $350 million a year from bond sales would start flowing to scientists by May 2005.

The first reality check came in the form of lawsuits by taxpayer and antiabortion groups.

A loan from the state

Today, the bonds remain tied up in litigation, though stem cell institute officials are confident that an appellate court will uphold a favorable ruling from a Superior Court judge. To tide over the institute, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in July promised a $150-million state loan. A state finance committee formally approved the loan Nov. 20, and the institute is gearing up to award its first research grants in January.

Even if researchers hit the ground running, the field is young and progress is likely to be slow. Scientists at the University of Wisconsin derived the first human embryonic stem cells just eight years ago, using donated embryos left over from in vitro fertilization clinics.

Dana Cody, executive director of Life Legal Defense Foundation, which represents two of the groups that sued, said the plan's modest ambitions are a sign that the initiative's promise was overblown.

"I just don't understand the fascination with embryonic stem cell research other than that it's something supported by Hollywood," said Cody, whose organization supports research using adult stem cells. "Even proponents say it's going to be years before any breakthroughs are made, if at all."

Those who support the research — especially those whose lives could depend on it — see the institute's plan through a lens of hope.

The science "is coming along fast, in my opinion," said John Ames, whose son David was diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or Lou Gehrig's disease, four years ago. "I'm not trying to contradict the position of the strategic plan, but we have hope. We're going to win."

The life expectancy of someone diagnosed with the devastatingly progressive neuromuscular disease is three to five years.

"The thing that drives these individuals and their families is hope," said Christopher Thomas Scott, executive director of the Stanford Program on Stem Cells in Society. "Without that hope, it's very difficult to get yourself going."

Joan Samuelson prefers to call it determination. The Napa Valley attorney founded the Parkinson's Action Network 18 years ago, two years after being diagnosed with early onset Parkinson's disease. She now sits on the institute's oversight board.

"I care deeply about how urgently we pursue the mission of Prop. 71," she said. "I wake up every day with a disorder that gets worse with the passage of time."

To Samuelson, the campaign was about potential. The institute's plan is about day-to-day implementation. They may sound different, she said, but they are steps toward the same goal.

"I read the realism, if you will, as a statement of the fact that this isn't going to be easy," she said. "Nothing great is easy."

Cells' unique ability

What makes embryonic stem cells unique — and so full of potential — is their ability to become any type of cell in the body.

Some researchers envision someday transplanting such cells into patients whose own cells have been damaged by injury or disease, with the hope that the transplanted cells develop into new spinal cord or pancreas cells. But scientists don't yet understand the cues that trigger an undifferentiated embryonic stem cell to become, say, an insulin-secreting pancreas cell.

The plan more accurately reflects what most scientists studying human embryonic stem cells are actually doing, at least in this early stage of the research: not so much curing a disease as studying it.

Scientists, for instance, can introduce the gene for Lou Gehrig's or Parkinson's into a human embryonic stem cell and unravel some of the mysteries of how such diseases develop. They can use such cells to quickly test thousands of drugs.

"What's happening even now is that human embryonic stem cells and their derivatives are being used for models for developing therapies," said Dr. Arnold Kriegstein, who runs the stem cell research program at UC San Francisco. "It allows us for the first time in a petri dish to have a human disease, not an animal disease. It brings us so much closer to coming up with a therapy that really will work."

Who knows? advocates say. Treatments — even cures — sometimes crop up unexpectedly.

Jeff Sheehy, who represents HIV and AIDS patients on the institute's citizen oversight board, tells the story of his friend Jeff Getty, who died in October of complications from AIDS. In 1995, Getty volunteered for a controversial bone marrow transplant from a baboon.

The transplant didn't take, but Getty, who had been near death, experienced a then-amazing remission that lasted more than 10 years. It turned out that the drugs used to prepare him for the transplant anticipated the antiretroviral cocktail that, a year later, would turn AIDS from a death sentence to an often manageable, chronic disease.

Similarly, Sheehy asked, if scientists fail to successfully transplant embryonic stem cells but along the way discover drugs or other treatments that work, wouldn't the research be considered a success?

"My thing is just not to get obsessed with what was presented in the campaign," Sheehy said. "Science is a very complex business. It's full of failure. It's full of opportunity. And failure often equals opportunity."

National Health Care? We're Halfway There (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0101390

By Daniel Gross

WHEN Democrats assume control of Congress next month, they may be dusting off some long-dormant proposals on how to deal with the growing disconnect between health insurance and employment. From 2000 to 2005, the proportion of workers aged 18 to 64 with employment-based health benefits fell to 70.6 percent from 74.5 percent, according to the Employee Benefits Research Institute. A record 46.6 million Americans lacked health insurance last year; of them, more than 82 percent lived in households headed by someone holding a job.

Any efforts to expand government's role in providing insurance will likely be opposed by the Bush administration, which says it opposes excessive direct government involvement in an industry that constitutes about 14 percent of the gross domestic product. Michael O. Leavitt , the secretary of health and human services, recently dismissed a proposal to have the government negotiate drug prices for the Medicare benefit, arguing that "it's a surrogate for a much larger issue, which is really government-run health care."

While the administration may oppose government-run health care in principle, the government's role in the vast health industry has been expanding. By various measures, the United States is about halfway toward a system in which the government and taxpayers fully fund health care. And trends are pushing the government to become more involved each year.

Out of a total population of about 300 million, 35.6 million elderly Americans were on Medicare in 2005. Of the working-age population, which reached 257.8 million in 2005, some 45.5 million were covered by Medicare, Medicaid or military health programs, according to the benefits institute. An additional 18.2 million workers had health insurance through jobs in the public sector, which includes state, federal and local governments, public schools and state universities, according to Paul Fronstin, director of the institute's health research and education program. Millions of those workers' dependents are covered as well. Even if those dependents are not included in the tally, taxpayers paid the bill for almost two-fifths of all Americans with insurance in 2005.

But that's not the full extent of government and taxpayer involvement. Employer-provided health insurance premiums are a form of compensation, yet are not subject to federal payroll or income taxes and are exempt from many state and local taxes. Economists consider these exemptions a form of subsidy. Thomas M. Selden, economist at the federal Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, estimates that the tax subsidy for employment-related coverage at $208.6 billion in 2006, or 35.4 percent of the amount spent on premiums.

"The tax subsidy is one of the largest public expenditures on health care," Mr. Selden said. In fiscal 2006, by comparison, spending on Medicare was $378.7 billion and federal spending on Medicaid was $180.6 billion.

Viewed strictly in terms of dollars and cents, the government already accounts for more than half of the nation's health care spending. Mining data from the National Health Expenditures Accounts, Mr. Selden found that public expenditures on health care — Medicare, Medicaid, military health care and federal employee benefits — accounted for $888 billion of the $1.96 trillion spent on health care in 2004. Adding in the aforementioned subsidies, and premiums paid for public-sector employees, the total comes to $1.2 trillion, or 61 percent.

Uwe E. Reinhardt, the James Madison professor of political economy at Princeton, suggests adding 5 percent for the federal mandate that hospitals provide free health care to the uninsured. "So government accounts for about two-thirds of health care spending," Mr. Reinhardt said.

The government spends money as if there were a national health insurance program. In 2004, government spending on health care equaled 9.6 percent of the gross domestic product, compared with 6.9 percent in Canada, which has a single-payer universal health care program, said David Himmelstein, associate professor of medicine at Harvard Medical School. And yet some significant components of federal support are not efficient methods of providing health insurance to the people who most need it. Higher-income workers are likely to have higher rates of coverage, higher premiums and higher taxes, all of which means that the tax break for compensation disproportionately helps the well-off.

"We're paying for national health insurance, but we're not getting it," Dr. Himmelstein added.

Taxpayers also don't get as much bang for their bucks because the government guarantees coverage for the elderly and the poor, groups that account for a disproportionately large amount of expenditures.

"A rough rule holds that private insurance covers two-thirds of the population and pays for only one-third of all health care," Mr. Reinhardt said.

THE raw figures may be worrisome, but the trends behind the data are clearly troubling. Despite five consecutive years of economic growth, the private sector has continued to reduce its role in providing insurance. As the population ages, the ranks of Medicare recipients grow. And if the price of health insurance keeps rising at a much faster rate than the average earnings of lower-income people, more and more of the working poor will be priced out of the market.

So even as politicians rail against the pernicious effects of government-run health care, taxpayers, one way or another, are likely to be footing more of the nation's huge and mounting medical bills.

Clinton's Talks With Democrats May Signal Bid For President (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has begun a calculated series of meetings with top New York Democratic officials to signal that she is likely to run for the presidency in 2008 and to ask for their support if she does, according to one state Democratic official who spoke with her and two others who have been briefed on her plans.

Senator Clinton met last week with Charles B. Rangel, the dean of the New York Congressional delegation, in what her advisers said was an effort to meet with most New York Congressional Democrats by the end of this month to discuss her plans.

On Friday, she also spoke with Herman D. Farrell Jr., the chairman of the State Democratic Party, Mr. Farrell said, and she plans to meet with Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer as early as today. Mr. Farrell confirmed that Senator Clinton briefed him on her 2008 intentions; Mr. Rangel declined to describe their conversation.

Senator Clinton's outreach was disclosed and confirmed yesterday by three New York Democratic officials, all on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized by the Clinton camp to release the information. One of the officials said he was contacted by Senator Clinton directly about her plans. The two others said they were informed by senior Clinton advisers that she was entering a new phase of contacting officials to line up support for a possible presidential bid.

Her maneuvering comes at a time of growing speculation about a hard-fought contest for the Democratic presidential nomination between her and another possible hopeful, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois.

Mr. Obama's political profile has been rising as an antiwar Democrat who proved wildly popular on the campaign trail, aiding candidates in the 2006 elections. With Mr. Obama scheduled this month to visit New Hampshire, the site of the first presidential primary, some Clinton allies see him as the single biggest obstacle to her nomination.

There has been little doubt that Senator Clinton was likely to mount a presidential bid. Her discussion marks a new phase of her exploration, as she seeks to build a united bench of Democratic support in her home state and then reach out for support nationally from elected officials, major donors and allies of both her and her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Asked yesterday evening about Senator Clinton's conversations with New York Democratic officials, a senior adviser, Howard Wolfson, said, "Senator Clinton made clear that after the election she would begin seriously considering a presidential run, and that process involves reaching out and talking to her colleagues."

Another top adviser to Senator Clinton described the conversations with elected officials in exchange for anonymity because the adviser did not want to be quoted talking about internal deliberations.

"The message is, 'Everybody keep their powder dry,' " the adviser said. "She is seriously looking at it. She's not making any decision yet."

The three Democratic officials said that Senator Clinton was strongly inclined to run for the presidency and was eager to do so, and that her outreach was an important new chapter that was likely to end with her declaration of a candidacy. The one Democrat who described his conversation with her said that Senator Clinton sounded enthusiastic and energized about undertaking a presidential campaign, and that she did not sound equivocal or unsure.

All three Democrats said the Clinton team was clearly moving ahead on a path to a candidacy; Senator Clinton was not seeking advice to make a decision on running, they said, but rather was lining up support so her candidacy was on the strongest possible footing.

While Senator Clinton, in her private conversations with Democrats, is not declaring her candidacy, her outreach is significant because so little had been known until now about her true intentions. And she has been coy at times about whether she would run.

Lengthy magazine articles have speculated about a possible Clinton candidacy, but only now has she taken the affirmative step of asking key officials to support her if she does run.

Such signals, in the political world, are generally interpreted as a sign that a well-positioned politician like Senator Clinton is going to run, barring an unforeseen event or change of heart.

The meetings and telephone calls have involved only Senator Clinton and the elected officials, and not their staffs.

Mr. Rangel, who was instrumental in first recruiting Senator Clinton to run for Senate in 2000, said the two of them had breakfast in New York on Wednesday and discussed her plans.

Mr. Farrell said he received a telephone call directly from her. "I had a discussion with her about her decision to run for president — I'm not telling you what the decision was, only that we had the discussion," he said in an interview yesterday.

He did note that he has been encouraging Senator Clinton to run, and that her news pleased him.

"And I'm positive that if she runs, the people of the United States will elect her as our next president," Mr. Farrell said.

Other Democratic elected officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the Clinton camp has asked them to stay silent, said that Senator Clinton had spent the past week calling allies to describe her plans and her thinking. Somewhat conspicuously, Senator Clinton had no schedule of public events last week, instead holing up at her homes in Washington and in Chappaqua, N.Y., and in private meetings.

Allies of Senator Clinton say that she wants to run for the White House but is weighing whether she can in fact become the first woman to win the presidency. Her advisers appear confident that Senator Clinton could build the sort of broad support among Democrats, independents and women that she had this fall in her landslide re-election victory in New York.

Yet Senator Clinton remains a highly divisive figure for many Americans from her eight years as first lady, her leading role in the failed effort to overhaul the nation's health care system, and the multiple investigations of her husband's administration.

Public polls indicate that Senator Clinton would be the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, were she to run, but they also suggest that a majority of Democrats would prefer to support other party figures — Mr. Obama, former Vice President Al Gore or former United States Senator John Edwards.

Democrats familiar with Senator Clinton's strategy said she had planned to brief New York officials first and then reach out to national party leaders. These Democrats emphasized that she was not declaring her candidacy for the presidency, but they also said that she was expected to become more definitive in her comments about her intentions by the start of the new year.

Senator Clinton also planned to speak with, or had already spoken with, Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and other members of the Congressional delegation. Senator Charles E. Schumer, Senator Clinton's Democratic colleague, could not be reached for comment through his spokeswoman last night.

The senior Clinton adviser who spoke on condition of anonymity noted that the Clinton camp, with the political and financial assets accrued during Mr. Clinton's presidency and Senator Clinton's own career, was a powerful political force that did not have to hew to any timetable. At the same time, the adviser acknowledged, she cannot wait too long to assemble a campaign operation.

"She can relax through the holidays and into the beginning of next year," the adviser said. "But beginning of next year, she and everybody else who is thinking about this has to start signaling that you are serious. At some point, you have to start locking down political operatives."

Senator Clinton has also kept her political operation well tuned, with a veteran staff of aides and advisers on hand and more than $10 million left in the bank from her 2006 re-election campaign.

Edwards, Clark Carry Debt From Unsuccessful 2004 White House Bids (AP)

NEW YORK (AP) — Democrats John Edwards and Wesley Clark have debts of several hundred thousand dollars from their unsuccessful White House bids in 2004, a burden as they consider presidential runs in 2008.

Edwards, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, had about $2,200 in his campaign account at the end of September and more than $300,000 in unpaid bills from his failed campaign for his party's nomination.

Clark, who has said he will decide in the next few months whether to run again, had about $390,000 left from the last campaign and debts totaling more than $260,000.

According to the Federal Election Commission, candidates are not obligated to pay off debts from a past presidential campaign before starting a new one.

In the case of Edwards and Clark, their 2004 committees will stay open until the debts are retired, but the men are free to begin fundraising for 2008.

Federal law does prohibit them from rolling whatever is left in their 2004 accounts into a 2008 campaign until outstanding bills are paid.

"The campaign wouldn't be able to transfer any assets to a new committee before the debt is retired," said Michelle Ryan, a spokeswoman for the Federal Election Commission.

It is not uncommon for losing political campaigns to delay paying their bills or sometimes default on payments entirely. But the notion that Edwards and Clark may run again has angered some of their unpaid 2004 vendors, many of whom run relatively small operations with tight cash flow.

"We'd like to be paid and since Clark is considering running for president again, we hope he'd pay us before the next campaign," said Marty Stone of Stones' Phones, which runs political telephone banks and is owed $10,000.

Both the Edwards and Clark campaigns insist they are waiting for the outcome of a federal audit before retiring their debts. Legally, presidential campaigns that receive federal matching funds are subject to audit by the FEC — a process that can take many years.

"The campaign decided to halt payments and keep a positive balance of cash in reserve just in case there are penalties to be paid once the FEC review is complete. At that time the cash will be expended to satisfy these debts," said Erick Mullen, a spokesman for WesPAC, Clark's political committee.

Edwards, generally considered part of the top tier of potential Democratic presidential contenders, is in a significantly weaker financial position than several other leading hopefuls.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee, each has more than $10 million in their political accounts.

Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, owes $200,000 to a Washington law firm and $64,000 to David Axelrod, a Chicago-based media consultant.

"Campaigns are not businesses. They end abruptly," Axelrod said. "We've been working with them to reconcile the books."

The Clark campaign owed money to nearly two dozen creditors, including $38,500 to pollster Geoff Garin and nearly $19,000 to a Little Rock, Arkansas-based accounting firm.

Separately, Edwards raised more than $2.4 million for the One America Committee, his political action committee formed to fight poverty and promote Democratic candidates in the recent elections. The committee ended the 2006 campaign season with just $23,000 in the bank. Clark raised about $877,000 for WesPAC, his political action committee, and had $49,000 left.

Money from PACs, however, cannot be transferred to presidential campaign committees.

Other would-be presidential contenders over the years have found themselves hamstrung in campaign debt. Former Ohio Democratic Sen. John Glenn took years to pay off $3 million in debt from his failed 1984 presidential campaign.

A Rarity: No Lone Star Candidates In 2008 Presidential Race (COX)

By Ken Herman

Cox News Service, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — There's a Texas-sized hole in the crowded field of candidates hanging around the starting line for the 2008 presidential nominations.

The hole? No Texans.

Depending on how and who you count, there are 24 potential candidates, including three from New York and two each from Arkansas and Massachusetts.

Even Delaware, South Dakota and New Mexico have one apiece.

Texas, the Land of the Big Ego, has none, zilch, nada.

Depending again on how you count, 2008 could be the first time in a third- or a half-century in which there might not be a Texan involved in the presidential race.

And Texans are used to having one of their kind not only in the race for the White House but actually in the White House. When President Bush leaves office in 2009, a Texan will have served as president (if you count Dwight Eisenhower, born in Texas, raised in Kansas) or vice president for 36 of the previous 56 years.

Why no Texans in 2008? Nothing personal against the state, observers say, noting instead that Texas, for once, is short on candidates of presidential caliber.

"I don't think it's anti-Texan," Texas A&M political scientist George Edwards said of the absence of home state contenders. "It's more about not having the right people."

None of the state's top three elected Republicans (Gov. Rick Perry, Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn) are potential 2008 presidential contenders. Hutchison, however, gets mentions as a potential vice presidential candidate, especially if the Democrats nominate New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and the GOP feels pressured to put a woman on the ticket.

Hutchison could be a tough sell to the GOP's social conservative base because of her support for abortion rights before a fetus is viable outside the womb.

Some of Perry's aides like to see his name added when vice presidential speculation percolates, but that's about as far as that discussion goes.

"The governor is not an impressive figure," said Edwards.

On the other side, there hasn't been serious speculation about a Texas Democrat on a national ticket since the late Lloyd Bentsen did time as Michael Dukakis' running mate in 1988. A Texas Democrat has not won a statewide race since 1994.

The fact that Texas lacks a candidate ready for a presidential race might be fortuitous because the nation probably is not ready for back-to-back Texans in the White House.

"Everyone assumes that there will never be two Texans in a row in the White House," said David Beckwith, a Cornyn aide and longtime GOP political operative who once worked for Vice President Quayle. "So in all likelihood it would be a non-starter even if someone was running."

The last state to have back-to-back presidents was New York, with Chester Allen Arthur elected 1880 and Grover Cleveland in 1884.

Political scientist Edwards, a professor at Texas A&M's Bush School of Government and Public Service, believes the specific Texan now in the White House would be a negative for any Texan who ran in 2008.

"Any association with Bush is not likely to be helpful, certainly in a general election," Edwards said in a nod to Bush's low favorability ratings.

In New Hampshire, a state that prides itself on its pivotal role in picking presidents, veteran GOP operative Tom Rath does not sense any anti-Texan sentiment after six years of Bush, who ran a poor second to Arizona Sen. John McCain in the 2000 GOP primary in the Granite State.

"I don't think it has anything to do with Texas," said Rath, a senior adviser to Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's presidential campaign. "There were those days when there were signs in Texas that said, 'Drive fast. Freeze a Yankee.' Those regional differences have gone away now. We're pretty cosmopolitan here in acceptance of people from all over the country."

The lack of a Texas contender?

"I don't see anything inherently off the mark about Texas other than that in their gestation of candidates they don't have one that's as fully developed" as Bush and other Texans have been, Rath said.

"There's not a New Hampshire person either," he added about the 2008 field. "We haven't has one since Franklin Pierce."

Beckwith, a native of Washington state, acknowledged that the Texas mystique has its upside and downside.

"People are proud to say they are from Texas, and it conjures up an image," he said. "If you say, 'I'm from Illinois,' it conjures up almost nothing. Though I'm sure that periodically the happiness people have in identifying themselves as Texans wears on other people."

Democrats Face A Tough Job, Leader Says (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2 — The Democratic National Committee chairman, Howard Dean, warned party leaders on Saturday not to revel too long in the victories from last month's midterm elections or treat their Congressional majorities as a permanent directive from voters.

"The other party made mistakes in the past claiming that elections are mandates," Mr. Dean said. "Elections are not mandates. The voters of this country loaned the Democrats the power of the country for two years. Now it's our job to earn it back again."

In a speech to the party's executive committee here, Mr. Dean said "governing is more difficult than campaigning," and declared that Democrats must not squander opportunities to keep building the party. The modest gains winning over evangelical voters, he said, should be strengthened by asserting that "moral values are an important part of foreign policy."

"If George Bush made any single huge mistake," Mr. Dean said, "it's that he thought he could be president by being president for half of America and by treating the rest of us with contempt. That is not a mistake I ever want Democrats to make."

In the celebratory aftermath of the November elections, Democrats have rushed to seize credit for winning control of the House, the Senate and the majority of governor's offices. But despite the jubilation, many longtime party leaders have criticized Mr. Dean's 50-state strategy, saying Democrats could have won even more seats had he not dispatched money and personnel to states that typically favor Republicans.

"Everybody had a huge contribution to make — including some of the participants in all the feuding that was going on," Mr. Dean told reporters. To make his point on Saturday, Mr. Dean invited two newly elected members of the House to address the gathering of a few dozen party officials. The representatives-elect, Tim Walz of Minnesota and Nancy Boyda of Kansas, said they defeated Republican incumbents with the help of Mr. Dean's on-the-ground strategy to reorganize and rebuild the party.

In an interview, Ms. Boyda said it was time to look forward. She said that she and the other Democrats who defeated Republican candidates would face a difficult burden winning re-election if the party did not follow through on pledges made in the midterm elections.

"My personal concern is that the presidential campaign is going to dominate the conversation," Ms. Boyda said. "If that happens and Democrats can't get anything done, we will get kicked out of office just as fast as the Republicans."

Democratic Chairman Says Party Must Show Results (AP)

By Will Lester

WASHINGTON — Democrats face a challenge defending their gains in the 2006 congressional elections because "now it's what we do and not what we say," national chairman Howard Dean told party leaders.

Dean told members of the Democratic Party's executive committee on Saturday: "Governing is more difficult than campaigning" — noting the big job the Democrats will face when they take control of Congress in January.

Also on Saturday, a Democratic National Committee rules panel gave preliminary approval to a plan to give bonus delegates to states that hold their presidential contests in April 2008 or later. That plan is intended to discourage states from jamming up the early weeks of presidential voting by moving their contests up.

Democrats, who will take control of both the House and the Senate, have outlined an agenda that includes overhauling ethics, raising the minimum wage and making college more affordable.

Dean said Democrats must prove to people in conservative and swing districts that they can earn the voters' trust.

"Elections are not mandates. Elections are power being loaned to politicians for a two-year period by the voters of this country," Dean said. "Now it's our job to earn it back again in '08." The next presidential vote is in November 2008.

That approach is critical if Democrats are to build on their majority in Congress and retake the White House, said Dean, who said Democrats did well in November because they appealed to all types of voters.

"George Bush made a huge mistake by representing half of America, while treating the rest of us with contempt," Dean said. "We need to reach out to everybody whether they agree with us or not."

Republicans said they will be watching Democrats closely.

"We have already learned the Democrat agenda of raising taxes and surrendering key fronts in the war on terror," said Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz. "Republicans over the next two years will focus on holding Democrats accountable and recommitting to reforms that deliver for hardworking families."

Dean said he was pleased that Democrats drew more support than in the past from "faith voters." Democrats gained among religious voters, including those considered evangelical Christians, because they talked about their values and competed in all parts of the country, Dean said.

Members of the Democrats' rules panel gave preliminary approval to an incentive system of bonus delegates to the party's national convention to persuade states not to move their presidential nominating contents too early in the 2008 calendar.

The idea is to discourage jamming the primary calendar after moving up Nevada and South Carolina into the first wave of contests to increase diversity in voting. The full Democratic National Committee will consider the bonus plan at their winter meeting in Washington.

Jim Roosevelt, co-chair of the rules panel, said the incentive plan could cause enough big states to hold contests later and keep the presidential competition going until late spring. Some states are already mulling moving their contests up, however.

Two Democrats who defeated Republican incumbents in House races this year told Democratic leaders that the party's commitment to candidates around the country was crucial.

"We have to quit seeing these things as David and Goliath fights and start seeing them as opportunities," said Tim Walz, a high school geography teacher who beat Republican Congressman Gil Gutknecht in Minnesota. "We have the opportunity to extend this to policy and in two years we can extend our majority. There was no controversy to how this was done. It was a great use of resources."

Nancy Boyda, who defeated Republican Congressman Jim Ryun in Kansas, said, "The difference in organization and execution (between the two parties) was so marked, it was startling."

Dean dismissed his critics within the party, who had said his 50-state strategy wouldn' t work.

"I think the best thing to do is say 'Look we won,'" he said "Everybody had a huge contribution to make, including some of the participants in all the feuding that was going on."

Denver Tries To Sell New Look To Democrats (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

DENVER, Dec. 2 — In the competition between Denver and New York City to play host to the Democratic Party's presidential nominating convention in 2008, Denver officials readily admit to being the new kids on the block.

New York, they say, has advantages in fund-raising, experience in running national conventions and a track record of success for the Democrats. The last two Democratic presidents, Jimmy Carter in 1976 and Bill Clinton in 1992, both strode onto the big stage in New York. Denver last held a convention in 1908, and the nominee, William Jennings Bryan, a Democrat, was trounced by William Howard Taft.

But if Denver prevails this time — a decision is expected by the end of the year — party members from around the country say it will probably be by virtue of a polished and highly organized effort to turn the city's lemons into lemonade. A new location, Denver's convention-bid organizers have argued to the party hierarchy, is precisely what the Democrats need.

The Rocky Mountain West, they say, is competitive politically and could decide the next presidency, with ranks of disaffected Republicans ripe for the picking and resurgent Democrats ready to be mobilized.

New and newly empowered Democrats across the region, like Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who vaulted to majority leader with last month's election, and Senator-elect Jon Tester of Montana, whose election helped swing the chamber, have been enlisted to cheer for Denver as well. A Western convention, they say, would bring recognition to a part of the country long taken for granted as the parties focused on the Midwest and the South.

Some political experts question whether the traditionally Republican West is really up for grabs. Frustration with the Iraq war and the big budget deficits run up by Republicans in Washington in recent years, they say, may have made the Democrats a temporary fling for Western voters in the last few elections rather than a permanent love.

And New York has some powerful allies, including both its Democratic senators, Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton. Mrs. Clinton has said she favors the city because it is the best choice for the party and the economy of her state, not because it might be a nice place for a nomination. Technical issues, including transportation, security and the size of the hotels will weigh heavily on the decision too, and could come down in New York's favor.

But party members across the country say that there is no doubt that Denver has hit on a potent combination of economic development goals and political ambition. A convention with 30,000 eating, drinking, hotel-room-using Democratic partiers and journalists would inject perhaps $160 million into the local economy, organizers say, and at the same time crown the city as an unquestioned capital of the interior West — and the two goals are in sync.

"A convention can provide a stage to introduce the nominee in a way that gets the country's attention and tells a story," said Debbie Willhite, a longtime Democratic strategist who came here earlier this year to run Denver's bid as executive director. "And the networks can't come in here without showing the broad plains and Rocky Mountains — that's a very big stage."

A spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, Karen Finney, said the final decision would be based on many factors.

"Logistics, fund-raising, the political questions — these are all factors that go into the decision, all of which are important," Ms. Finney said. "Our end goal is to have the best convention possible."

Money is probably Denver's biggest hurdle. Running a national political convention costs about $80 million, of which the host city must raise about $55 million. Denver bid officials believe they are close to that, including more than $12.5 million in cash and in-kind corporate donations just this week, and $5 million to $10 million more that Democratic governors in nearby states have said they could draw from local contributors.

Party members say that last month's election probably bolstered Denver's hopes by underscoring the political argument about a Western realignment and thus making it easier to raise money.

Democrats made gains in Montana, in Mr. Tester's election, and here in Colorado, where the election of Bill Ritter as governor put Democrats in charge of the executive and legislative branches of state government for the first time since 1960. The state's junior senator, Ken Salazar, a Democrat who was elected in 2004, has also become a standard-bearer for Hispanic voters, especially in the Southwest.

"It would be a mistake to have it in New York," Mr. Salazar said. "The Rocky Mountain West and the Southwest are key parts of the new direction for the Democratic Party, so if it's just on the merits, there's no question that it should be held in Denver."

Not too surprisingly, Mr. Schumer disagreed. "The West is an important region," he said. I wouldn't deny that. But we ought to have the city that's best for the convention, and I think New York is it."

Troopers Can Arrest Illegal Immigrants In Romney Deal (BOS)

By Michael Levenson, Jonathan Saltzman

The Boston Globe, December 3, 2006

Governor Mitt Romney has reached an agreement with federal authorities that allows the Massachusetts State Police to arrest immigrants who are in the state illegally, his spokesman said.

Currently, state troopers have no power to detain people for violations of their immigration status alone, said the spokesman, Eric Fehrnstrom. If troopers stop people who they suspect are illegal immigrants, they can call a US Immigration and Customs Enforcement office in Vermont to check on their status and detain them if federal officials request it, he said.

Under the deal, brokered after months of negotiations, troopers can detain people they determine are illegal immigrants during regular police duties, Fehrnstrom said. This authority will be given to two dozen or three dozen troopers who undergo 4

1/2 weeks of training in immigration laws, civil rights, and ways to avoid racial profiling, he said. The troopers will probably be members of special units that pursue violent fugitives or combat street gangs.

Ferhnstrom said the troopers would not go on patrols aimed at rounding up illegal immigrants. But they will be able to arrest, for example, a motorist they stop for a broken tail light if they determine the motorist has violated immigration law. Fehrnstrom, speaking Friday, said the pact would be announced publicly this week. He declined to provide more details yesterday.

Immigration advocates and civil libertarians blasted the agreement yesterday, saying it would lead to racial profiling and foster mistrust of the police in communities with large numbers of immigrants. The deal, reached in the final days of Romney's administration, also sets up a potential conflict with Governor-elect Deval L. Patrick, who has expressed strong opposition to granting the State Police such powers.

Through a spokesman, Patrick declined to say yesterday whether he might rescind the agreement when he takes office in January.

"This is another last-minute move by Governor Romney that is more about his presidential campaign than about sound public policy for the people of Massachusetts," said Richard Chacon, Patrick's spokesman. "The last election showed that people can tell the difference between the two."

During the campaign, Patrick dismissed as a political gimmick the idea of granting State Police such powers.

"I think the State Police has a lot to do already right now . . . and I think asking the State Police to take on a federal responsibility is not their job," Patrick said on WGBH-TV in June. In September, he told the Globe a "more constructive" approach would be to support federal legislation proposed by US senators John McCain and Edward M. Kennedy that would toughen border enforcement and allow some illegal immigrants to apply for legal status.

Romney's new agreement with Immigration and Customs Enforcement comes at a sensitive time for the governor, who has been sharpening his views on immigration as he prepares a probable run for the presidency in 2008. In September, Romney told Fox TV's "The O'Reilly Factor" that the border must be secured, and affirmed his support for the construction of a fence along the Mexican border.

Last week, however, the Globe reported that illegal immigrants had maintained the grounds around Romney's home in Belmont, as workers for a lawn service company Romney had employed. Romney said after the report that he had dealt only with the owner of the company, Ricardo Saenz, a legal immigrant from Colombia.

In approving the new powers for State Police troopers, Massachusetts joins a handful of states and localities that have entered into such pacts since they were first authorized in 1996. The list includes Florida, Alabama, and a few counties in California and North Carolina, where a limited number of officers have been trained to enforce immigration laws.

Ali Noorani , executive director of the Massachusetts Immigrant and Refugee Advocacy Coalition, yesterday called the pact a "gross mismanagement of public safety resources."

"Now, if you look or sound like an immigrant and are pulled over for any type of minor infraction, you're going to be profiled; there's no way around that," Noorani said. "This will have an incredibly chilling effect on the relationship between all law enforcement -- whether it's Boston police or State Police -- and the immigrant community. Most people don't see the difference between a state trooper and a local officer. A cop is a cop."

State Senator Jarrett T. Barrios , a Cambridge Democrat who is cochairman of the Public Safety and Homeland Security Committee, predicted the plan would add millions to the costs to train troopers and to jail detainees. He said the deal seemed calculated to help Romney's presidential ambitions.

In June, when Romney announced he was seeking the deal, he said it would give the State Police a way of "finding and detaining illegal aliens in the ordinary course of business."

Noorani made clear that Patrick would face pressure to rescind the pact. "Patrick was very strong and steadfast in his opposition to this," Noorani said. "We hope that one of his first actions as governor is to terminate this and restore the Commonwealth's public safety."

Fundraising Beat Goes On For Gov. (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Reelection is behind him, but Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is keeping his fundraising operation at full throttle, asking donors to pay for a stylish inauguration and seeing to it that he continues to fly private jets and stage public appearances worthy of a Hollywood celebrity.

The governor's political team has approached Chevron Corp., PG&E, Blue Cross of California, AT&T and other businesses, asking for tens of thousands of dollars to pay for a two-day celebration surrounding his Jan. 5 inauguration.

As a newly elected governor taking office in 2003 amid a fiscal crisis, Schwarzenegger staged a relatively modest inauguration. But with the economy improving, his aides said a more festive event is in order. The occasion even has its own "executive producer" — Carl Bendix, a friend of California First Lady Maria Shriver.

A copy of the invitation shows that for $50,000, donors can purchase a "gold" sponsorship that includes 10 tickets to a reception Jan. 4, four reserved seats for the inaugural ceremony the next day and a table for 10 at a legislative luncheon.

"Silver" sponsorship is $15,000 and buys a pair of tickets to the reception, two for the swearing-in and two for the luncheon, among other perks.

The money goes to a nonprofit committee that can take donations of any size.

At the same time, Schwarzenegger is taking advantage of a new fundraising law he signed three months ago meant for politicians like himself who, for the time being, don't have another race to run. His attorneys have set up a special "officeholder" account that allows him to collect up to $200,000 a year for assorted expenses (though not for a political campaign); donors can give $20,000 apiece per year.

As a lame duck, Schwarzenegger is barred from raising money through a reelection fund and wants the new account to underwrite the professional-quality lighting and sound, private air travel and satellite feeds that are fixtures of his operation, aides said. Contributions to the fund must be publicly disclosed.

Another political account is devoted to what Schwarzenegger's aides call "legislative advocacy." If the governor wants to travel around the state urging passage of a particular bill, he intends to use that fund to cover the costs, aides said. Donors must be disclosed.

The fund is not new; the governor has used it to wage ballot campaigns. But he sees less need for that in his second term and plans to use the fund to push his legislative agenda.

The fundraising drive comes as the Schwarzenegger administration is setting a second-term agenda being watched closely by some of the companies paying into the governor's accounts.

One of Schwarzenegger's priorities in the next term, for example, is implementing a new law meant to curb emissions that contribute to global warming. Chevron and other energy companies that must comply with the law have a stake in how it is put into effect.

Campaign watchdog groups said the officeholder account in particular, with its $200,000 threshold, amounts to another vehicle for donors to influence the governor.

"It's designed to enable officeholders to get money from people who want something from them," said Robert Stern, president of the nonpartisan Center for Governmental Studies in Los Angeles and former general counsel to the state's Fair Political Practices Commission.

"I have no problem with a limited officeholder account," Stern said. "But $200,000 is way too high. They are … taking advantage of people coming before them."

The bill authorizing such accounts languished in the Legislature for a year. At midnight in the final hours of the last legislative session, the measure, by Sen. Kevin Murray (D-Culver City), was revived and passed. The governor signed it Sept. 29.

As Schwarzenegger bolsters his fundraising, aides insist he wants to make campaign finance reform part of his 2007 agenda. One idea the governor is considering is a ban on fundraising in the months when state officials are negotiating a new budget, the aides said.

Schwarzenegger, who has raised a record-setting $114 million since jumping into the recall campaign in 2003, has not embraced proposals that would lower caps on what politicians can accept.

"The governor has always said that the issue is stopping the practice of money in, favors out," said Schwarzenegger's communications director, Adam Mendelsohn.

Organizers of the governor's inauguration say they do not yet know how much the events will cost; activities are still being planned. But the invitation that went to donors mentions a reception for sponsors at the California Museum for History, Women and the Arts; the legislative luncheon in the Capitol rotunda; and a party in the ballroom of the Sacramento Convention Center the night of the inauguration.

The centerpiece is the swearing-in, set for 11 a.m. at Sacramento's Memorial Auditorium.

Writing the governor's speech for the occasion is Landon Parvin, who also worked for President Reagan. Schwarzenegger will use the forum to lay out a long-term vision for the state, Mendelsohn said.

He will talk about "how he will spend his final term building the California for 20 years from now that he wants for the people of this state," according to Mendelsohn.

So far, Southern California Edison has pledged $15,000 for the inaugural events. PG&E, Chevron and AT&T have said they will probably help. Schwarzenegger aides said that although they're not required by law to reveal the names of donors, they will do so voluntarily on the governor's campaign website: http://www.joinarnold.com .

Other parts of the fundraising apparatus are murkier.

A nonprofit jobs commission that underwrites some of the governor's public events here and abroad also raises money from California businesses. The group last disclosed contributors more than a year ago.

Mark Mosher, acting executive director of the commission, said donors would be revealed at an unspecified date "in the future, on a timeline that works for our accountants."

Mosher is principal of a San Francisco consulting and lobbying firm, whose website says that "when you need a decision or vote to go your way, [the company] can get you direct access to the decision-makers."

A special nonprofit residence foundation pays for Schwarzenegger's 1,800-square-foot hotel suite at the Hyatt Regency, across the street from the Capitol. George Kieffer, president of the foundation, said the group has raised $90,500 over the last year from 14 individuals and companies. Donors' identities may remain secret by law.

Kieffer disclosed their names voluntarily. They include Lowe Enterprises, a Los Angeles real estate firm; Herzog Contracting Corp., a Missouri construction contractor with offices in California; and Mercury Air Group Inc., a Los Angeles aviation services firm. Kieffer's list did not say how much each donor gave.

With money coming in from so many sources, and with no uniform method for disclosing donations, it is hard for people to keep track of who is supporting Schwarzenegger and whether they're profiting from the relationship, watchdog groups said.

Sheila Krumholz, acting executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, D.C., said Schwarzenegger "should be credited with disclosing donors" to his inauguration fund.

But she added: "Providing lots of additional avenues for donors to seek access and influence makes it difficult for voters to understand the facts behind how policy is decided. It's important that this information be made available so that you can draw the most accurate conclusions about how policy is formed."

Md. GOP Urged To Stick Together (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. called for Republican unity yesterday at the state convention, where the selection of party chairman revealed divisions within the party after last month's widespread election defeats.

"The hard left is in firm control of the state, and we don't have the votes to stop them," Mr. Ehrlich told party leaders in a ballroom at the Doubletree Hotel in Annapolis. "That's not the fate of Maryland in the long term. It's just where we are today."

His remarks were more upbeat than those he made earlier in the day during his last appearance on the "Stateline" program on WBAL-AM radio in Baltimore.

"You just have to ask yourself a really frank, blunt question: Do your views really comport with the majority views in the state of Maryland?" he said. "In this case, clearly at this time, the answer is no, because we got fired."

Mr. Ehrlich also predicted that legislation to legalize slot-machine gambling -- one of his chief goals rejected by Democratic lawmakers -- will pass the General Assembly either next year or in 2008, but that it likely would be tied to a package of tax increases.

"We hear about a graduated income tax," he said. "Given the philosophical foundation of the folks coming into office, that would not surprise me at all. A cigarette tax, potentially a sales tax and, I guess, a gas tax is also being floated. It's various sin taxes wrapped with a slots bill."

Mr. Ehrlich also said party members should not "whine" or play "Monday-morning quarterback" about election losses that restored Democrats almost complete control of state government in Maryland, where they outnumber Republicans nearly 2 to 1.

Mr. Ehrlich, the state's first Republican governor in 36 years, said his party must continue to engage the Democrats in political debate and point out the successes of his administration, including turning an inherited $4 billion deficit into a $2 billion surplus without raising state sales or income taxes.

He lost re-election to Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley, a Democrat.

Mr. Ehrlich also urged party leaders to be "disciplined and loyal."

"Our party leaders must be respected and supported ... in order to accomplish what we need to accomplish over the next two years," he said.

The governor's remarks followed the election of a party chairman, in which Dr. Jim Pelura, an ally of outgoing Republican officials, beat political upstart John White, who blamed current party leaders for the election losses and advocated retooling the organization.

Mr. White, who last month lost the race for the 3rd Congressional District seat by a large margin to Democrat John P. Sarbanes, said the 70 votes he received for chairman out of the 204 votes cast by central committee members reflected "a desire for change within the party."

After the election, Dr. Pelura told the convention that it was "wonderful to see [different] opinions."

"We are a group now that will work together and see that we are back in the State House in 2011," said Dr. Pelura, a Davidsonville veterinarian who served as state chairman for President Bush's 2004 campaign and as the Anne Arundel County chairman for Mr. Ehrlich's 2006 campaign.

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican who lost the U.S. Senate race but is the early favorite of party leaders for a 2010 gubernatorial run, also addressed the convention.

"When I walk in this room, I don't see losers," he said. "I don't see quitters. I see the Maryland Republican Party: strong, viable, energized, excited and relevant, very relevant."

Mr. Steele, who actively supported Dr. Pelura in the chairman contest, said he was "excited to work with the new leadership."

Mr. Ehrlich told the convention that party members faced an uphill battle to regain political power and that fundraising would become more difficult.

However, the governor said, he has given the party a foothold by advancing an agenda that included policies not traditionally associated with Republicans, such as focusing on environmental protection, education and transportation. "That is progress at the policy level that people have paid attention to," he said.

On the radio, Mr. Ehrlich said the failure to legalize slots was one of the two biggest disappointments of his term. The other, he said, was "the failure to pass structural reform with respect to medical malpractice [insurance]." The General Assembly imposed a premium tax on HMOs to help reduce the cost of malpractice insurance in 2005, overriding Mr. Ehrlich's veto.

The Governor Cops a Role on 'The Wire'

Bob Ehrlich hasn't said yet what he'll do after he leaves the Maryland governor's mansion next month -- but we hear he looks hot in a state trooper's uniform.

See for yourself. Tonight, HBO will air an episode of the gritty Baltimore-based crime-and-politics drama "The Wire" with a mind-bending scene in which Ehrlich cameos as -- stay with us, here -- a trooper on security detail for the show's fictional governor of Maryland.

Even trippier: The scene -- filmed this summer, months before Ehrlich's reelection loss -- portrays the (fictional) suave young Democratic mayor of Baltimore, Tommy Carcetti, coming to Annapolis to beg for more school funding from the Republican governor whose job he hopes to steal one day. Sound familiar? Carcetti (played by Aiden Gillen) is kept waiting for hours until finally Trooper Ehrlich tells him the governor "will see you now."

When producers called offering a speaking role, Ehrlich jumped at the chance. "He's a huge fan of the show," said spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver.

Producer David Simon notes that he offered Ehrlich challenger Martin O'Malley an equal-time cameo, though the episodes were slated to run well after the election. But the Baltimore mayor declined. Whether that had anything to do with the assumption of many local fans that Carcetti is a stand-in for O'Malley -- well, Simon will entertain no such notions. "Carcetti is not O'Malley; I can't say it enough. Story editor Bill Zorzi covered politics in Maryland [for the Baltimore Sun] for 20 years. There are elements of lots of people in Carcetti."

Several other prominent folks have had parts in the series -- former mayor Kurt Schmoke as a city health commissioner, singer Steve Earle as an addiction counselor, convicted drug kingpin Melvin Williams as a church deacon -- a trick that Simon says enhances the distance between truth and fiction.

"Once you have Ehrlich play a state trooper on the security detail, then he is not the [show's] governor. Therefore, the governor is a fictional character."

Episcopalians Warned Against Leaving Diocese (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

Virginia Episcopal Bishop Peter J. Lee is threatening to sue conservative Episcopal churches that soon will vote on whether to leave his diocese, saying individual members of each congregation's governing board will be liable.

In a four-page letter released late Friday, the bishop of the country's largest diocese, with 90,000 members, sent a letter to parishes conducting a 40-day period of discernment on whether to leave the Episcopal Church.

Thousands of Episcopalians already have left the 2.2 million-member denomination over arguments about biblical authority and the 2003 consecration of New Hampshire Bishop V. Gene Robinson, an active homosexual.

"I believe your successors in the future will regret that decision and its destructive consequences to the whole church," the bishop wrote of congregations threatening to leave the diocese. Any congregation attempting to leave without a negotiated settlement with the diocese "will have repercussions and possible civil liability for individual vestry members."

The letter was aimed at a handful of Northern Virginia congregations sitting on millions of dollars' worth of real estate. The members of those congregations will vote starting Dec. 10 on whether to leave the church. Leaders of two of them -- Truro Episcopal Church in Fairfax and the Falls Church Episcopal in Falls Church -- met for about five hours yesterday in an emergency session.

Bishop Lee's decision to play hardball with dissenting churches didn't shock Bishop Martyn Minns, rector of Truro, whose governing board voted unanimously Nov. 11 to leave the denomination.

"I'm disappointed, but not surprised," Bishop Minns said yesterday. "This is bizarre because we are following a protocol we worked on with him and his leadership for over a year."

The "Protocol for Departing Congregations," posted on the diocese's Web site (www.thediocese.net), lists several steps a congregation must take, including a stipulation that at least 70 percent of the members agree to leave.

If they do, the diocese and parish must negotiate a sum for the church's property and assets. Truro's assets, including its property in downtown Fairfax, has been estimated at $10 million. The Falls Church's property and assets, which include two sanctuaries and a Colonial cemetery, has been estimated to be worth $17 million to $27 million.

However, Bishop Lee added a new provision in his letter -- that the 40-member executive board of Episcopal Church headquarters in New York could intervene to prevent a church from leaving with its property.

He also reminded conservatives that he has the power to relegate dissenting parishes to mission status, to declare their property "abandoned" and to take custody of it. Episcopal canon law mandates that departing parishes leave their property to the diocese, and with very few exceptions, U.S. courts have upheld it.

Bishop Minns, who expects that Truro will keep its property, said the matter will be discussed today at a parish meeting between morning services. A member of the diocese's standing committee, which advises the bishop, also will speak.

"We are operating in line with Virginia law," Bishop Minns said.

Packets containing the bishop's letter and other documents will be given out during today's services at the Falls Church Episcopal, whose governing board voted 15-2 on Nov. 13 to leave the diocese. Sentiment at the nearly 275-year-old church tilts toward leaving the denomination. Last Sunday, one of the classes listed in its bulletin was titled "Letting Go ... of the Episcopal Church?"

The Rev. Robert Watkin, an assistant priest at the church, urged members to cast their ballots Dec. 10.

"It'll be the most important vote you'll ever cast -- at least in church," he said.

Elsewhere in the country, a majority of the clergy and lay delegates at the annual meeting of the Diocese of San Joaquin in Central California voted yesterday to identify themselves as members of the worldwide Anglican Communion rather than as a diocese of the Episcopal Church. They stopped short of splitting from the denomination, which would have touched off a huge legal battle over millions of dollars in real estate.

Diocese Nears Break With Episcopal Church (AP)

FRESNO, California (AP) -- In a rebuke of the Episcopal Church, a conservative diocese voted Saturday to affirm its membership in the worldwide Anglican Communion after distancing itself from the national church over the ordination of gays and women.

San Joaquin, California, Bishop John-David Schofield called it a first step toward a formal break with the U.S. Anglican denomination, though the proposal makes just minor changes to the diocese's status.

"We have given a signal as to what direction we intend to take," Schofield said Saturday. "We are now in a position to take seriously any offer the archbishops around the world should come up with."

Delegates also approved rewriting the Diocese of San Joaquin's constitution to bring its trust fund under the bishop's control, a move immediately questioned by Episcopal leaders.

The denomination's canons don't give local dioceses sole ownership of church property, said Robert Williams, a spokesman for the Episcopal Church.

"The hope of many is that reconciling dialogue will continue," he said.

Divisions erupted in 2003 when the Episcopal Church, the U.S. wing of the 77 million-member Anglican family, consecrated the first openly gay bishop, V. Gene Robinson of New Hampshire. Traditionalists contend that gay partnerships violate Scripture.

Schofield, who refuses to ordain women and gays, has publicly accused the church's first female leader, Presiding Bishop Katharine Jefferts Schori, of promoting heresy. Under his leadership, the Fresno-based diocese has cut back funds sent to the national church and considered a plan to affiliate with an Anglican diocese in Argentina.

The San Joaquin diocese's proposal to distance itself from the American denomination was approved by a majority of the 204 clergy and lay delegates. It formalizes the diocese's identity as a member of the Anglican Communion, rather than a member of the Episcopal Church, but it and other resolutions approved Saturday won't become final unless they receive a two-thirds majority vote at a meeting at a diocesan convention next year.

The amendment was noticeably weaker than one pulled this week that proposed a formal split with the U.S. denomination, which would have set off a legal battle over the diocese's millions of dollars in real estate throughout central California.

National church leaders had been putting pressure on Schofield and other conservatives to ease off their threats to break with the denomination. They proposed creating a leadership position called a "primatial vicar," who would work with conservative dioceses, performing functions that normally fall to Jefferts Schori, including consecrating local bishops.

Schofield called that offer "absolutely inadequate," but suggested a truce was not off the table.

Six other conservative dioceses also have rejected Jefferts Schori's authority but have stopped short of secession. The 2.2 million-member Episcopal Church estimates that nearly 115,000 people left the church from 2003 to 2005. At least one-third of those departures stemmed from parish conflicts over Robinson.

Episcopal Diocese Votes To Secede From Church (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein, Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

An Episcopal diocese in California overwhelmingly passed a series of resolutions yesterday that position it to secede from the Episcopal Church and affiliate with conservatives in the global Anglican Communion.

If the Diocese of San Joaquin affirms the move in a second vote next year, the small diocese, with 48 parishes and 7,000 members, would be the first to try to break from the Episcopal Church, which has been torn by conflict since the consecration of a gay bishop in 2003. Until now, only individual parishes have severed ties.

The vote by the diocese is one more step in a carefully planned strategy by conservative Episcopalians in the United States and primates of Anglican provinces, many in the developing world, to unite the conservatives, claim the mantle of Anglicanism and isolate the Episcopal Church, the 2.3-million-member American branch in the Anglican communion, which claims 77 million members worldwide.

The San Joaquin diocese, which does not ordain women, has long been one of the most conservative of the church's 110 dioceses. It is among seven dioceses that were so disturbed by the church's decision to consecrate a gay bishop that they have refused to accept the authority of the church and its presiding bishop. They have also appealed for "alternative oversight" to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who as head of the Church of England is considered the "first among equals" among the Anglican primates.

"This is the separation," said Craig Petz, a lay delegate to the diocese's convention in Fresno, Calif., where the vote took place. "It's done. There's no equivocating."

Mr. Petz, from St. Mary's Church in Manteca, Calif., said he was delighted by the resolutions, but an active caucus of clergy members and laity who strongly oppose separation from the church were despondent.

"There is a schism, and it's a sin," said the Rev. Rick Matters, a co-founder of Remain Episcopal, the caucus favoring unity. "To secede, we are like one of the Southern states that led to the Civil War."

The step is likely to provoke legal battles in civil and ecclesiastical courts over whether the diocese has the right to divorce itself from the denomination and over who owns the diocese's assets. Another pressing issue is what will happen to parishes and clergy members in the diocese who do not want to disassociate from the church.

"This is unprecedented territory and will take the careful consideration of all parties involved," a spokesman for the Episcopal Church, Bob Williams, said yesterday.

Mr. Williams said one possibility was that the church's presiding bishop, Katharine Jefferts Schori, could declare the diocese vacant, and have it elect a new bishop and other leaders.

One resolution passed yesterday changes the diocese's constitution, removing a line about membership in the Episcopal Church and replacing it with, "The diocese shall be a constituent member of the Anglican Communion and in full communion with the See of Canterbury."

Other references to the church throughout the diocese's constitution are removed, and replaced with "the Anglican Communion."

The Bishop of San Joaquin, John-David Schofield, told the convention on Thursday, "This amending process is the first step in the removal from our constitution of any reference to the Episcopal Church because, in our opinion, they have decided to walk apart from the Anglican Communion."

The wording of the resolutions was changed at the last minute, leading to widespread confusion among the delegates. But Bishop Schofield told the convention that the wording was changed after a recent meeting in Virginia between conservative American bishops and other leaders and conservative primates from other provinces in the Anglican Communion. The global primates advised the Americans to "remain flexible and allow them to provide the necessary leadership for us," by holding off on specifying what structure, or bishop or province, would replace the church's relationship with the diocese.

One crucial amendment effectively erases the borders of the diocese so that it could eventually absorb parishes in other parts of the state or elsewhere in the country that wish to break with the church, Mr. Petz said.

Another amendment says that if the bishop and his coadjutor bishop are absent, unable to act or removed, the standing committee, a lay group, would become the "ecclesiastical authority." The thinking behind this provision, Mr. Petz said, is that it could prevent the church from taking over the diocese by removing the bishop and coadjutor.

Last week, before the vote, the church offered a compromise for "alternative primatial oversight" to the seven disaffected dioceses. After lengthy talks, a committee of bishops proposed that these dioceses could answer to a "primatial vicar," and not the presiding bishop, but that vicar would be appointed by and answerable to the presiding bishop.

The conservatives, however, immediately rejected the proposal and called it a ploy by Presiding Bishop Jefferts Schori to give them an offer they would have to refuse.

"It's dead on arrival," said the Rev. Canon David Anderson, president of the American Anglican Council. "It's a nonstarter. First of all, who picks the primatial vicar? She does.

"She holds onto all the power, all the authority, and the people who are finding her ministry impossible to remain under are left still under her total thumb."

But the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Most Rev. Rowan Williams, greeted the proposal for alternative oversight with cautious enthusiasm, saying it represents "a very significant development" and that he would give it "careful consideration."

Mideast Allies Near A State Of Panic (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his top advisors fanned out across the troubled Middle East over the last week to showcase their diplomatic initiatives to restore strained relationships with traditional allies and forge new ones with leaders in Iraq.

But instead of flaunting stronger ties and steadfast American influence, the president's journey found friends both old and new near a state of panic. Mideast leaders expressed soaring concern over upheavals across the region that the United States helped ignite through its invasion of Iraq and push for democracy — and fear that the Bush administration may make things worse.

President Bush's summit in Jordan with the Iraqi prime minister proved an awkward encounter that deepened doubts about the relationship. Vice President Dick Cheney's stop in Riyadh, the Saudi capital, yielded a blunt warning from the kingdom's leaders. And Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's swing through the West Bank and Israel, intended to build Arab support by showing a new U.S. push for peace, found little to work with.

In all, visits designed to show the American team in charge ended instead in diplomatic embarrassment and disappointment, with U.S. leaders rebuked and lectured by Arab counterparts. The trips demonstrated that U.S. allies in the region were struggling to understand what to make of the difficult relationship, and to figure whether, with a new Democratic majority taking over Congress, Bush even had control over his nation's Mideast policy.

The allies' predicament was described by Jordan's King Abdullah II last week, before Bush arrived in Amman, the capital. Abdullah, one of America's steadiest friends in the region, warned that the Mideast faced the threat of three simultaneous civil wars — in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. And he made clear that the burden of dealing with it rested largely with the United States.

"Something dramatic" needed to come out of Bush's meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to defuse the three-way threat, Abdullah said, because "I don't think we're in a position where we can come back and visit the problem in early 2007."

The only regional leader to voice unqualified support for the Bush administration has been Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who has gone so far as to say that the Iraq invasion contributed to regional stability.

To Middle East observers, Bush can no longer speak for the United States as he did before because of the domestic pressure for a change of course in Iraq, said Nathan Brown, a specialist on Arab politics at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

"He can talk all he wants about 'staying until the job is done,' but these leaders can read about the American political scene and see that he may not be able to deliver that," Brown said.

The Bush-Maliki meeting Thursday, closely watched around the world in anticipation of a possible change in U.S. strategy, produced no shift in declared aims. Rather, it resulted in diplomatic stumbles that seemed to belie the leaders' claims that their relationship was intact.

On the eve of the summit, a leaked memo written by Bush's national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, showed that U.S. officials questioned Maliki's abilities. But the memo also was a reminder of dwindling U.S. influence over Iraq. Some of the steps that Hadley said the Iraqis should take, such as providing public services to Sunni Arabs as well as Shiites, were moves that the Americans had demanded for many months, without success.

The leak of the memo cast a shadow over the summit, and Maliki abruptly canceled the first scheduled meeting, a conversation among Bush, Maliki and Abdullah. White House aides insisted that the cancellation was not a snub.

One Middle East diplomat said later in an interview that Maliki had canceled the meeting to put distance between him and Bush at a time when Iraq's Shiite lawmakers and Cabinet ministers with ties to militant cleric Muqtada Sadr had halted their participation in the government to protest the summit.

On Saturday, in his regular radio address, Bush said that his relationship with Maliki was, in fact, improving.

"With each meeting, I'm coming to know him better, and I'm becoming more impressed by his desire to make the difficult choices that will put his country on a better path," Bush said.

During the trip, Bush was unable to distance himself from the fierce debate about Iraq policy back home. The president felt the need to respond to news accounts saying that an advisory panel on Iraq would urge a gradual withdrawal of combat troops from the region. He insisted that suggestions for such a "graceful exit" were not realistic.

Despite this, Bush repeated in his radio address that he intended to look for a bipartisan solution to the war, and would listen to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, which is scheduled to present its findings Wednesday.

He also said that his own internal review, coming from Pentagon and White House officials, among others, was near completion, suggesting that he may be discussing the options before him over the next several days.

"I want to hear all advice before I make any decisions about adjustments to our strategy in Iraq," Bush said.

Cheney's trip to talk to Saudi King Abdullah was far less visible than Bush's mission, but helped to make painfully clear the gap between U.S. goals and those of its Arab allies.

U.S. officials said Cheney initiated the trip. But foreign diplomats said that Saudi leaders sought the visit to express their concern about the region, including fears of a U.S. departure and what they see as excessive American support for the Shiite faction in Iraq.

After the meeting with Cheney, Saudi officials released an unusual statement pointedly highlighting American responsibility for deterioration of stability in the region.

The Saudi officials cited "the direct influence of … the United States on the issues of the region" and said it was important for U.S. influence "to be in accord with the region's actual condition and its historical equilibrium," an apparent reference to the Sunni-Shiite balance.

The Saudi statement also said the U.S. in the Middle East should "pursue equitable means that contribute to ending its conflicts," pointing to the Israeli-Palestinian situation.

The statement "came pretty close to a rebuke, by Saudi standards," said Charles W. Freeman Jr., a former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia. "It said, in effect, that the United States needs to behave responsibly."

There have been other signals of Saudi anxiety recently.

On Wednesday, an advisor to the Saudi government wrote in the Washington Post that if the United States pulled out of Iraq, "massive Saudi intervention" would ensue to protect Sunnis from Shiite militias.

The Saudi ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al Faisal, warned in a speech in October against an American withdrawal, saying that "since the United States came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited."

Rice encountered the limits of U.S. influence when she visited Jerusalem and the West Bank town of Jericho last week, trying to entice Arab confidence by displaying a renewed interest in Israeli-Palestinian peace.

But Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was gloomy about the prospects for a deal between his Fatah party and the militant group Hamas that would allow formation of a nonsectarian government and open the way for increased aid and, potentially, peace talks with Israel.

Rice said afterward that the administration "cannot create the circumstances" for peace.

"This is the kind of thing that takes time," she said. "You don't expect great leaps forward."

Expressing deeper unhappiness with the United States, leaders from Jordan, Egypt and Persian Gulf countries told Rice during her trip to an economic development conference in Jordan on Friday that the U.S. had a responsibility to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which they and many analysts viewed as the key to regional stability.

Amr Moussa, secretary-general of the Arab League, urged greater U.S. action, warning that the Middle East was becoming "an abyss…. The region is facing real failure."

Massive Anti-government Protests Continue In Lebanon (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy Newspapers, December 3, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - A siege on Lebanon's American-backed government continued Saturday with tens of thousands of demonstrators sympathetic to the Shiite Muslim Hezbollah militia and its allies packing downtown Beirut and calling for the resignation of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and his cabinet.

The demonstrators filled the roads surrounding the center of Beirut, where the prime minister's office is located, effectively shutting down the capital. Hezbollah gave every indication that it is prepared for the long haul: setting up long rows of tents, portable bathrooms and handing out cups of water and sandwiches. Groups of men tended charcoal pits to keep a regular supply for their hookah pipes.

"We have a target, ending the government, and we must achieve it," said Mohammed Khalil, a Hezbollah representative who was sitting with a group of men, all monitoring their walkie-talkies.

Asked if he expected the crowd to turn to violence, Khalil shrugged his shoulders and said, "it is up to them (Lebanese government troops), we want to demonstrate peacefully."

Saniora's government, mostly Christians and Sunni Muslims, has showed no sign of acquiescing.

While Lebanon is a sliver of a nation with a relatively small population of about 4 million, it has long been a battlefield for competing powers in the region. Between Beirut's glittering office buildings, there are still walls pocked by mortar shells, a reminder of the civil war that lasted from 1975 to 1990.

As is true in many other parts of the Middle East, there is in Lebanon an underlying friction: Will the country follow the American model of governance - preferred by Saniora - in which secular administrations pursue free market economies and work toward accommodation with Israel, or will it pursue something closer to Syria and Iran - preferred by Hezbollah - nations that resist U.S. influence and actively oppose Israel.

It is a question that shaped the comments of most Lebanese interviewed Saturday.

Many of those at the demonstration spoke not only about ending Saniora's government, but also of countering U.S. influence. And pro-Saniora officials interviewed Saturday said that they are trying to resist Syrian and Iranian influence.

Both sides agreed that there is potential for violence.

"I don't think the government will resign. I think we are going to see hard times in this country," said Mohammed Kabani, a Sunni Muslim parliament member who backs Saniora. "Whenever you have people in the streets, you cannot disregard the possibility of violence."

Leaning against a tent, and wearing a green ball cap, demonstration organizer Mohammed Marji said that the sooner the government resigns, the better.

"Our prime minister is doing the bidding of the Americans . . . he should leave as soon as possible," said Marji, a member of Amal, a Shiite organization aligned with Hezbollah. "If he doesn't, he will destroy this country, things will deteriorate badly."

The protests are the latest in a round of standoffs between Lebanon's U.S.-backed government and Hezbollah and other supporters of the Syrian government.

Syria was forced to withdraw its troops from Lebanon in 2005 after former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri was killed in a massive bombing downtown. Anti-Syrian factions in Lebanon immediately blamed Syria for the killing and called for an international inquiry.

More assassinations of anti-Syrian figures followed.

Hezbollah's hand was strengthened in the Shiite community after a 34-day war with Israel this summer that ended in something of stalemate - counted by Hezbollah as a victory because it was able, with less advanced weaponry, to withstand Israel's missile and bombing strikes.

Saniora, on the other hand, appeared ineffectual during the combat, pleading on TV - weeping at one point - for both sides to stop.

Early last month, a White House spokesman said there was evidence that Syria and Iran were planning to overthrow Saniora's government.

Hezbollah cabinet members and their allies had been protesting against Lebanese government plans to approve a United Nations tribunal to investigate Hariri's death. They also agitated for more cabinet seats, wanting the power to veto government action.

When it became apparent they were not going to have their way, all five Hezbollah and Amal cabinet members resigned on Nov. 11, and about a week later, Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, called for street protests to bring down the government.

After Nasrallah's call to action, Pierre Gemayel, a high-profile cabinet member who opposed Syria, was killed in a hail of gunfire in broad daylight.

A protest of hundreds of thousands of Christians and Sunni Muslims followed, and late last month, the remaining 18 cabinet members of the original 24 approved the United Nations measure.

On Friday, Hezbollah and its allies responded in kind, flooding Beirut's downtown streets and bringing the government and businesses to a standstill.

At the demonstration Saturday, a set of loud speakers played recorded speeches by Hezbollah officials and their allies, and thousands of people waved their Lebanese flags and cheered. When Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah's voice boomed out, "we will stand side by side," a roar went through the crowd that shook the air.

Wandering through the crowd, a McClatchy reporter was approached by young men dressed in black who seemed very eager to discuss Hezbollah's merits.

One of them, Fouad Assaf, explained: "During the war we fled our house and Hezbollah gave us food and money"

Lebanese troops stood nearby, behind two rows of concertina wire and flanked by armored personnel carriers.

Interviewed by phone later in the evening, Hezbollah parliament member Ali Mokdad said the demonstrations were only the beginning.

"We have many plans for the future," Mokdad said. "This is just our first step. It has been planned out, day-by-day."

Shiite Sit-in Brings A New Flavor To Beirut (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

The poor demonstrators are not the usual denizens of the capital's glitzy downtown.

BEIRUT — The massive sit-in staged by Hezbollah supporters so far has done little to dislodge the U.S.-backed government, but it has managed to turn the Lebanese capital inside out — literally.

Some of the poorest and most marginalized people in the country, Shiite Muslims, have abandoned their homes in suburban slums to camp out on the nation's priciest bit of real estate. Though they often have trudged through Lebanese history as war refugees, now they have managed to displace Lebanon's wealthiest shop owners. They also have surrounded Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, barricaded in his office.

The demonstrators are not the usual frequenters of Beirut's glitzy and freewheeling downtown. Their clothes are scruffier; their food is cheaper; out of modesty, virtually all women melt away before midnight. The men link arms and dance in the streets, wave Lebanese flags in a round-the-clock rally and hunch over backgammon boards.

Mostly, they sit around and wait for the government to fall; they have vowed to stage escalating protests until Siniora and his ministers resign.

The scene is a snapshot of Lebanon's internal contradictions, and a scrambled glimpse of the two distinct groups that coexist in a single nation. The message of Hezbollah and allies of the powerful Shiite organization is clear: We are here. We are Lebanese too. And we are numerous enough to demand political change.

"My parents are sleeping in a tent in the south, and I'm sleeping here in a tent," said Issa Fallah, a 38-year-old Hezbollah supporter who said his family home was destroyed during the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah. "This land is for all Lebanese. We have paid for it with our blood."

Flooded by tens of thousands of Hezbollah followers and their allies, downtown Beirut has acquired the trappings of a shabby, pious neighborhood. Near shuttered French bistros, vendors hawk kaak, cheap slabs of bread. Young men roast tomatoes over fires built from garbage.

Shops selling Cuban cigars, Rolex watches and Gucci dresses stand dark and deserted, metal grates tugged down over the windows. Stained tents clutter the parking lots where luxury cars usually sit. Men pray near the locked door of the Buddha Bar, a high-end nightclub where, on an ordinary weekend, scantily dressed women drink champagne and dance the night away.

"This place is usually where the rich are," said Ali Rida, a 20-year-old supermarket employee from the southern city of Sidon. "Beirut symbolizes everything for the Lebanese."

That symbolism cuts deep: This neighborhood was razed by religious fighting during Lebanon's 15-year civil war. When Prime Minister Rafik Hariri led the stone-by-stone reconstruction of the crushed downtown, it was a deliberate metaphor for the country — an expression of optimism that Lebanon could leave its bloody past behind.

After the 2005 assassination of Hariri, widely blamed on Syria, it was here that hundreds of thousands of Lebanese flocked to demand independence from the military and political influence of the government in Damascus. The demonstrators were rewarded with the collapse of the Syria-backed government and the withdrawal of Syrian troops.

Hezbollah and its followers were not really a part of that history. The Shiites were the gaping contradiction, undercutting the heady talk of religious unity that bubbled in these streets during the anti-Syria protests.

Shiites have languished for generations in the impoverished east and south of the country. Even when they poured into the capital to escape poverty and war, they ended up squatting on the fringes of the city.

Neglect of their plight provided the fertile ground in which Hezbollah took root, not only as a band of fighters that stood up to Israel, but also as an efficient welfare network. The group built schools, founded clinics and helped squatters win the right to stay in their homes.

Now Hezbollah has led its masses into the center of the capital, and it has pledged to stay there, crippling the economic life of downtown, until the government resigns.

To Siniora and his allies, the open-ended campaign of civil disobedience is an attempted coup.

"This part of town is for the French, for the Americans, for the rich," said Ali Hamdan, 30, a member of the Shiite Amal party. "It's not for us anymore. It's not really Lebanon. This is only on a map."

In a mockery of the nightclubs around them, a band of young men from the southern suburbs pitched an enormous tent of clear plastic on the sidewalk. Inside, they pounded on a drum and pranced to the beats. Outside, wistful would-be partyers were turned away by stern bouncers.

"We want to stay here only to sing, dance, have fun," said Bilal Khazen, a 20-year-old student who had tied a Hezbollah flag over his shoulders like a cape. "This place will help us overthrow the government."

Jad Salim, an 18-year-old engineering student, huddled in a hooded sweatshirt near the razor wire, soldiers and tanks blocking off the hill leading to the prime minister's office.

"We were all attacked by Israel, and this government didn't do anything. If it weren't for Hezbollah, Israel might be here now," Salim said. "Now they are the ones responsible for what might happen tomorrow."

Beirut Protest Blocks Office Of Premier For A 2nd Day (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 2 — The center of this city remained paralyzed and shuttered on Saturday as thousands of pro-Hezbollah protesters entered the second day of a sit-in aimed at forcing the Western-backed government to resign.

The atmosphere remained festive, almost joyous, though, as protesters emerged from tents pitched in empty lots and chanted slogans, banged drums and appeared to dig in for a long stay.

A small group of mostly young men pressed close to the swirls of razor wire that blocked the entrance to the Grand Serail, the offices of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. On the other side were a large number of soldiers and armored vehicles.

“Siniora must go,” the protesters yelled.

A day earlier, on Friday, hundreds of thousands of protesters from around the country poured into two areas of the city center, one south of Martyrs Square and the other in a square near the Grand Serail, in a great show of defiance to the government. But most left after sundown.

On Saturday, many returned to join the thousands who had camped out. Still, the city center was calmer than on Friday.

The sit-in is happening as Hezbollah and its allies, which are aligned with Syria and Iran, struggle to wrest control of the government from a collection of Sunni, Druse and Christian parties aligned with the United States and France. The government has said that it will not resign and that Hezbollah and its allies are trying to carry out what amounts to a coup.

On Saturday, rumors abounded about what Hezbollah and its alliance, which includes the Christian Free Patriotic Movement, might be planning to escalate the conflict further. There has been talk about blocking roads and members of Parliament resigning en masse.

While the protest had a clear political goal, it also appeared to be making a sharp social statement, highlighting a class conflict that also fuels this political showdown. A majority of the protesters appeared to be Hezbollah supporters from the south — poor, religious Shiites — who seemed delighted to be occupying the wealthy center of the capital, more closely associated with the Sunni Muslims. Groups of people chanted, “Shiites are in Beirut.”

The battle in Lebanon for control of the government reverberates far beyond this nation’s borders as well, with the outcome determining whether Lebanon will tilt toward Iran and Syria or toward the United States and Europe. Words of support for the government came in from some regional leaders in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan, leaders who themselves are desperate to preserve the status quo as a way to hold back Iran’s growing influence.

At Barricades In Downtown Beirut, Lebanon's Fault Lines Grow Deeper (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

BEIRUT, Dec. 2 -- In a city of frontiers, Beirut built another border Saturday.

On one side of coiled barbed wire and metal barricades were armored personnel carriers manned by soldiers in red berets toting U.S.-made M-16 rifles and guarding the colonnaded, stone government headquarters where Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and other ministers have taken up residence. On the other were the fervent young men of Hezbollah and its allies, who have turned a downtown tailored for the rich into the site of an open-ended protest to force the government's fall.

"This is the point of confrontation between us and them," said Khodr Hassan, who walked 12 hours from his southern village to the protest with 30 other youths. He pointed at his friends at the barricade, some surging forward, others lolling about.

"This is the line of separation," said one of them, Ali Aitawi.

Long divided by the Christian east and largely Muslim west of its 15-year civil war, Beirut is a city snarled today by far more numerous boundaries of sect, perspective and ideology, intersecting and tangling across a capital and country wrestling with a question still unanswered since independence more than 60 years ago: What is Lebanon's identity?

In today's crisis, those fault lines tell the story of the struggle underway between the country's two camps, divided by past and present, with vastly different visions of Lebanon's future: on one side Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria, and on the other the government, backed by the United States and France. The fault lines tell, too, of an impasse that perhaps can't be broken.

The borders are drawn by color, flag, portrait and symbol, a claustrophobic contest to lay claim to identity never solely Lebanese. They are defined by ideology: the culture of resistance to Israel celebrated by the Shiite Muslim movement of Hezbollah, for instance, or the Christian separatism of civil war-era militias with fascist roots. They follow the contours of leaders who command loyalty through personality over politics. And they offer protection in a country where survival can feel precarious.

In downtown Beirut, Hezbollah's protest, with its backers vowing to stay in the streets until the government is brought down, is subsumed in a broader story of the empowerment of Lebanon's Shiite community, the country's largest. Along an axis stretching from downtown, across tense borders between Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods, are the ingredients of another civil war whose prospect comes up almost casually in conversation. Segregated neighborhoods themselves exude an identity of politics, history and faith so suffocating that even someone living a few blocks away can feel a stranger within them.

"The fault lines are in the minds of the people. It's much more than just the geography of Beirut," said Robert Saliba, a 56-year-old architect and urban planner. "I think the mental geography is more important than what happens on the ground."A Proliferation of Borders

Saliba grabbed a piece of bread filled with spice and made his way Saturday from a trendy cafe to nearby downtown, where thousands had pitched tents as part of the protest. Chants erupted every so often: "Siniora out!" At the barricade, boisterous men held up the front page of the daily as-Safir newspaper: "With its masses, the opposition besieges the government in crisis." Cheers erupted when recordings of speeches by Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, were played.

"People here are boiling," Saliba said, surveying the scene. He gestured back at the cafe. "And over there, they are drinking coffee?" The words were sharp, even surprised, a divergence from the sometimes abstract language of his academic training. A Greek Orthodox Christian, he was more observer than partisan. "Just across the road? It's awful."

He looked out at the barbed wire that coiled along the city's sleek, rebuilt downtown.

"You have a fault line again," he said. "When you cross it, you get an electric shock."

In a day, Beirut's downtown was transformed from a hub of half-million-dollar apartments and designer stores into a far more humble and modest place. Vendors sold bread with melted cheese for 65 cents from rickety wooden stands propped up on rusting bicycles. "Tastiest cheese," one promised. From a battered orange van, popcorn went for half that. "That's the price for Sayyid Hasan," the vendor shouted, using an honorific for the Hezbollah leader. Men hung out in circles, sitting in plastic chairs, tugging listlessly on water pipes.

Portable toilets went up in the streets, next to the fashionable Buddha Bar. Alongside them were white canvas tents where wool blankets were still spread for the protesters, their sandals and shoes left outside. In a carnival-like atmosphere, men from the Shiite-dominated southern suburbs shouted fealty to Hezbollah's leader. "God, Nasrallah and all the suburbs!" Others ridiculed Siniora, calling him "tanoura," Arabic for skirt. Some held signs that read, "Until victory." A few chatted with stern-faced soldiers. "You should leave and let us go in," one suggested, pointing to the government headquarters a shout away.

At a construction site along the street, an advertisement read, "Beirut Gate: The New Heart of the City."

As he walked, Saliba recalled the vision for the downtown of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, who was assassinated in 2005. His detractors were plenty, seeing corruption and questioning whom the downtown was serving. But Hariri viewed it as a crossroads for Beirut's east and west, entertainment and commerce bringing them together. Instead, Saliba said, downtown has become contested space, another border: in March 2005, when Hezbollah's supporters and foes organized mass demonstrations over the Syrian presence here and, in this crisis, as both have mobilized their loyalists in a show of strength.

"It has become a place where power is proven," he said. "It has become the place where things are stated."

He watched crowds barrel down the streets, waving Lebanese flags and Hezbollah banners. Before him was probably the Shiite community's greatest assertion of political power in Lebanese history: seizing the downtown of a capital, in a country where Shiites have historically been disenfranchised. The chants cascaded, uttered with the authority that comes with confidence in numbers and the strength delivered by Hezbollah's organization, its discipline and, unsettling to many other Lebanese, its weapons.

The community's moment? Saliba shrugged.

"This will decide," he said. "It's definitely something that says, 'We are here and for good.' "

"We have this fake notion of coexistence. Now it's being tested the hard way. It's popping up," he said. "Now, in a very decisive way, because they're asking for power. If you want to coexist, then give us power."

He walked past the St. George Cathedral, a Maronite Catholic church, past the sprawling blue-domed mosque built by Hariri, a Sunni Muslim. The face of Nasrallah, a Shiite cleric by training, peered from posters on the walls and in the streets.

"I always say to my students, you have this segregation everywhere. It's part of any geography," he said, as troops lined the boundary between the protest and the rest of downtown. "It becomes a problem through politics and power struggles."Fears of Neighbors' Intentions

A 15-minute drive away, Saad Fakhran sat in his Internet cafe, a button with Hariri's face pinned to his lapel. Around the corner were posters of Hariri and his son and successor, Saad. "Your words are commands," one banner read. On Fakhran's door was another picture of the former prime minister. "They destroyed the country," it read. "Where are you, Rafiq Hariri?"

Fakhran took a break from a crossword puzzle in a pro-Hariri newspaper that compared Hezbollah's protests to a coup attempt. Sharply dressed in a suit, his hair graying and his moustache trimmed, he raised his hand and pointed toward the borders that delimit his Sunni Muslim neighborhood of Tariq Jdideh, one of the tenser these days in Beirut. You go to the Khashaqji Mosque, he said, then the Qasqas Highway, a traffic circle, the Martyrs' Cemetery ("For us") and the Cemetery of the Two Martyrs ("For them"). "Who are the two martyrs? Only God knows what they mean," Fakhran said.

Shiite neighborhoods, he said, were in both directions.

"And in the middle is Tariq Jdideh, and we're afraid they'll enter," he said. "We're ready. We're ready by all means."

At 42, Fakhran is too young to remember Beirut's earlier incarnation, as a sleepy Mediterranean port dominated by the country's Sunni and Greek Orthodox communities. As he came of age, a far larger city was undergoing another transformation, as Israeli invasions, economic opportunity and civil war drove Shiites from southern Lebanon toward Beirut. For a time, their settlements on the capital's outskirts were known as "the belt of misery." Today, the southern suburbs, known as the Dahiya in Arabic, represent one of Hezbollah's strongholds -- its name uttered in chants -- and a distinctly Shiite part of the city.

Where these suburbs intersect with the Sunni parts of town, trouble has broken out during the month-long crisis. Several clashes erupted after the funeral last month of Pierre Gemayel, a pro-government minister assassinated in an ambush. Sometimes, gangs of youth incite each other; other times, it starts over the placement of banners, posters or flags of the wrong faction. Slogans shouted too loud caused a fight with Shiites in the traditionally Sunni neighborhood of Museitbeh last week. On Thursday night, Fakhran recalled, a few dozen Shiite residents entered Tariq Jdideh on mopeds, flying flags, and yet another fight broke out.

"More of them were hurt," he said with a nod.

Even in the Christian neighborhood of Ashrafiyeh, scores of supporters and opponents of Michel Aoun, a former general allied with Hezbollah, clashed Monday in Sassin Square over putting up his poster. The police and army intervened.

Beirut was never simply divided between east and west, but the surge of trouble along so many fault lines in the city -- fraying, tense and multiplying as they are -- has worried residents old enough to recall the civil war's start in two local ambushes in 1975 that soon spiraled into chaos. A columnist, Darine Helwe, compared the streets, with police posted every so often, to "a military barracks."

"I'm not a little scared," Fakhran said. "I'm scared a lot, a lot, a lot, a lot, a lot."

His fear is not violence, though. It is more existential, he said: worry about his neighbors' intentions. In complaints that echo nearly 1,400 years of history, he wondered why Shiites insulted successors of the prophet Muhammad whom Sunnis revere. He worried about Hezbollah's arsenal. "Who are the missiles for?" he asked. He suggested Hezbollah is more loyal to Iran than Lebanon: "If Iran told them to sit, they would sit." And he is sure Nasrallah has in mind a Shiite Islamic republic.

"In my heart, I think they want to wreck the country," he said. "They don't want to rule it -- they want to wreck it.

"How else could you see it?" he asked.

He talked a little longer, then offered advice: Don't go past the Two Martyrs' Cemetery, the border with the Dahiya.

"Go to Tariq Jdideh, all over the place. But don't go over there. No, no," he said, shaking his head. "Trust me."What About Being Lebanese?

A little before dusk, Zeina el-Zein, a slight, smartly dressed 26-year-old Shiite with long dark hair, walked through the Christian neighborhood of Ashrafiyeh. She lives a short drive away, her neighborhood and the next partitioned by their catalogue of colors, banners and portraits. There is the yellow of Hezbollah, its flags and pictures marking Shiite territory. Hariri's portraits stake his family's claim. In Ashrafiyeh, there are other markers: the green and brown of the Phalangist Party, the red of the Lebanese Forces, the orange of Aoun. Each of the leaders has a nickname. Samir Geagea, a Christian, is "the Doctor," Aoun "the General," Nasrallah "the Sayyid."

"We need to remind you this is our neighborhood, our territory," Zein said. She shook her head in disgust. "We do whatever we feel like. This is our territory. If you don't like it, then leave."

"Any wall they can find, anywhere in Beirut, you'll find a poster or a message," she said.

She walked along Monot Street, a fashionable nightspot district.

"Here is a cedar," she said, the symbol of the right-wing Phalangist Party that commanded the largest Christian militia in the civil war. "This is, you know, Bashir," she said, pointing to a picture of Bashir Gemayel, the militia's leader who was elected president after the 1982 Israeli invasion, then assassinated. "We're here to stay in Lebanon," it read.

She walked a little father, past a church, then the neighborhood's sole mosque, as the muezzin's call to prayer drifted across the narrow, winding streets. It reminded her of her days at St. Joseph University, when the mosque's call to prayer and the church's bells would pour through the window of her sociology class, each time forcing the lecturer to stop.

"We were laughing," she recalled. "This is Lebanon."

A little farther were pro-government portraits of anti-Syrian figures assassinated since last year.

"We will never forget," they read.

"You keep nurturing memory," she said. "Everything works in this country so that you cannot forget any single detail of Lebanese history. They don't want us to forget. They really don't, or at least they're not working to let us forget."

Zein is insistently secular, and in a country where being Maronite, Greek Orthodox, Sunni, Shiite or Druze almost immediately imposes a notion of perspective, outlook and politics, she feels alienated.

At the university, she was expected to defend her community's politics. With Christians, she sometimes has to explain why she might hew to a more socially liberal lifestyle.

What about being Lebanese? she asked.

"I could stay up all night, eating and drinking with them, spending a beautiful evening, and in the end, I'm still Zeina el-Zein, a Muslim Shiite who's from the south," she said. "I will always have this identity, whatever I do."

She sat in a cafe in Sassin Square, drinking coffee. The waiter greeted her in French. Draped over the wall of one building was the flag of Geagea's Lebanese Forces. There was a banner for Aoun across the street. Another sign hung nearby: "Ashrafiyeh is the heart of the Lebanese Forces." More pictures were on light poles: Bashir Gemayel, Pierre Gemayel.

"It has never changed, and I don't think it's ever going to change," she said.

She thought for a moment. "They use, they really use the vulnerability of the people here," she said. "I'm disgusted. Really, I am. I cannot even think about the option of civil war. It was one of the most horrible civil wars, the Lebanese one. It was disgusting, really. Really. I cannot believe after all we've seen, read and lived, we can even think about another civil war."

"Shame on us," she said.

She looked at the posters, the men's portraits peering at the traffic, claiming their territory.

She shook her head. "They're not giving us a choice."

Cabinet Shuns Pro-Syria Groups' Call To Quit (WT/AFP)

By Nayla Razzouk

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

BEIRUT -- Lebanon's Western-backed Cabinet yesterday vowed not to cave in to calls to resign after a massive demonstration led by the pro-Syrian group Hezbollah, as protesters camped outside government offices.

The show of force in central Beirut Friday and smaller demonstrations yesterday tightened the political deadlock in the country, which has been nearly paralyzed because of a fierce struggle for supremacy between pro- and anti-Syrian camps within the power-sharing regime.

Nearly 1 million, or one in four Lebanese, thronged the streets of the capital on Friday, calling for the ouster of the "corrupt" leadership and temporarily blocking access to Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's government headquarters.

"The massive demonstration ... has given Lebanon one of the most difficult tests that the country has known in a long while," warned the pro-Syrian newspaper Al-Akhbar yesterday.

The Siniora government, which has received strong public backing from Western and some Arab states, pledged not to bow to the opposition led by the Syrian- and Iranian-backed Hezbollah.

"The Syrian-Iranian camp, led by Hezbollah, has begun to implement a plot for a coup" in Lebanon, said the pro-government Al-Mustqabal daily, echoing charges made by the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton.

The newspaper is owned by the family of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, whose 2005 murder, blamed on Syrian officials and their Lebanese allies, led to massive street protests that forced Damascus to end a three-decade military presence in Lebanon last year.

Parliamentary Majority Leader Saad Hariri, the slain prime minister's son, vowed that "the Siniora government will not fall because of pressure from the street. However long they continue their protest, it will not fall."

Hezbollah-led demonstrators set up tents and several thousand protesters were still camping yesterday on at least two main roads leading to Mr. Siniora's offices, after the blockade was eased to allow access from side streets.

The rally continued into last night, as mainly Shi'ite demonstrators waved Lebanese flags to the tune of Hezbollah war hymns and most Christian protesters lingered around a camp a short distance away on Martyrs Square.

The Syrian government daily Tishrin called the rally a "message from the Lebanese people to the individual who is monopolizing power and carrying out the orders of the ambassadors of superpowers, whose only concern is to make Israel an unwieldy power capable of defeating all Arab states combined."

The prime minister appealed yesterday for renewed talks with the opposition over a deadlock that threatens to block the government's legislative program, including its centerpiece plans for an international tribunal to try the suspects in Mr. Hariri's slaying.

Only the pro-Syrian parliament speaker Nabih Berri, whose supporters joined the opposition protest, has the authority to present draft legislation to parliament.

"The sole way of resolving our problems is by sitting down together," Mr. Siniora said. "I appeal to Mr. Berri to call for a resumption of dialogue."

Palestinian Prime Minister Won't Resign (AP)

By Karin Laub, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh on Saturday rejected demands that his Hamas-led government resign and called for the resumption of talks to form a national unity government with the Fatah Party.

Tensions between the two parties have grown in recent days, with President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah saying that coalition talks — aimed at ending a crippling foreign aid boycott against the Hamas-led government — had reached a "dead end."

On Friday, the PLO's Executive Committee, which is dominated by Fatah, called on Haniyeh to step down to make way for a new premier who could resume talks with Abbas.

Speaking at a news conference during a trip to Qatar, Haniyeh said that demand was "only creating chaos in the street."

"(Abbas) cannot make any decision regarding this without consulting Hamas, because Hamas is the main party in parliament," he said.

Hamas spokesman Fawzi Barhoum said the call for Haniyeh's resignation amounted to "a coup."

The militant Islamic group won an overwhelming majority in parliamentary elections in January, while Abbas was elected separately last year, setting up government paralysis and leading to tensions in the street.

DOJ_NMG_0101412

Hamas denied coalition talks had collapsed, and said Abbas was simply trying to pressure them into making concessions.

"Anyone who is saying that the dialogue among the Palestinian factions is over should take full responsibility for the consequences," Haniyeh said.

On Saturday, Abbas met with top European diplomats in Gaza to brief them on the domestic disagreements.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana said the collapse of the talks killed hopes of ending the international economic sanctions on the Palestinian government, adding that Hamas missed its opportunity.

"Very sadly, I have to say the chance has been lost," he said after meeting with Abbas.

Abbas' choices for breaking the impasse with Hamas are limited. He has the authority to fire the government, but would not win confirmation for a replacement Cabinet from the Hamas-dominated parliament.

Palestinian law does not allow the president to call early elections, though there could be a referendum on whether such elections should be held, Abbas aides said.

A member of a panel Abbas appointed to guide him in the impasse said its members were leaning toward recommending early elections, both for president and parliament.

"This choice, the early election, will be much better than the current situation, even if Fatah lost both the presidential and parliament elections," said Azzam al-Ahmed, leader of the Fatah bloc in parliament.

Pro-government Sunnis Win In Bahrain (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

Islamic hardliners dominated the Sunni supporters of Bahrain's government who defeated an opposition led by the kingdom's majority Shiites in parliamentary elections, according to official results broadcast Sunday on state television.

The election Saturday for the lower house of parliament reinforced sectarian divisions between Shiites and Sunnis and witnessed a deepening Islamic conservatism in the U.S. ally, considered among the most liberal of Gulf Arab states.

The majority Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of Bahrain's 700,000 residents, have long complained they are squeezed out of power by the Sunni monarchy, which dominates government.

Even though they lost, the vote was hailed as a major step forward for democracy and Bahrain's Shiites. It was the first in which the opposition made a strong run in parliament after boycotting 2002 elections — the first after 26 years of direct rule by the al-Khalifa royal family.

The Shiite al-Wefaq party won 16 of the house's 40 seats in the first round of voting a week ago. It needed five of the 11 seats up for grabs Saturday for a majority but gained only two, giving it a total of 18, state-run Bahrain TV, citing official results.

Conservative Sunni Muslim candidates allied with the government took 13 seats in the first round and nine in the runoff, for a total of 22.

The voting gave a sweeping victory to hard-liners from both of Islam's chief branches who bulldozed challenges by progressive candidates and women. Twelve of the 22 pro-government winners were hardliners.

Ali Fakhro, a political scientist and former government minister, said the liberals were hurt by an ideological association with the United States. The Bush administration's deep unpopularity in the Gulf has strengthened the religious right, he said.

"This is part of the reason the Islamists are heading for control of Bahrain's parliament," Fakhro said before the official results were announced. "The Americans say they are encouraging democratic politicians in the region, but the truth is they are harming them."

Regardless of who controls the lower house, the key levers to power in Bahrain lie with King Hamad bin Isa Al Khalifa, a Sunni who appoints parliament's upper chamber and can veto any legislation.

Officials reported high turnout on Saturday. But the campaign and election were marred by widespread allegations of fraud, and the government did not allow international observers to monitor the vote.

Though several women ran in the elections, only Latifa al-Gaoud, a pro-government female candidate who ran unopposed, was able to win a seat during the election's first round. She became the first-ever female parliamentarian in any Arab Gulf country.

Ukraine PM Aims To Mend Fences With U.S. (AP)

By Mara D. Bellaby, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

He was cast by critics as the Russian-backed bad guy during Ukraine's Orange Revolution two years ago, the burly politician who almost stole the presidential election from the pro-Western leader Viktor Yushchenko. But Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych, scheduled to arrive in Washington Sunday for a four-day visit, says he hopes to renovate his image in the West during his meetings with U.S. officials.

DOJ_NMG_0101413

According to his Web site, Yanukovych will meet Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman. He also plans to meet with business leaders in New York.

As for all the news reports that portray him as a tool of the Kremlin, a foe of reform? Spin, Yanukovych said. "As for my party and my myself, we adhere and will adhere to policies that are pro-Ukrainian, and will always defend the national interests of Ukraine," he said.

The Orange Revolution began hours after polls closed in the Nov. 21, 2004, presidential election between Yanukovych, the Kremlin's favorite, and Yushchenko, who called for closer ties to the West. As the Central Election Commission began churning out fraudulent vote counts in favor of Yanukovych, Yushchenko summoned his supporters to Independence Square for night after night of protests.

Twelve days later, the Supreme Court declared the vote count fraudulent and ordered a rerun, which Yushchenko won.

Yanukovych and his supporters complained bitterly that the mass protests, supported by many political leaders in Europe and the U.S., robbed him of the presidency.

But now Yanukovych praises the demonstrators. "On the question of democracy and freedom of speech, no one can deny the country changed for the better," he said. "There is more freedom of speech, more democracy, more freedom."

His political resurrection began in March, when he was the top vote-getter in a parliamentary vote described as Ukraine's freest and fairest. It climaxed in August, when he was named prime minister in a political deal with his former foes.

Yushchenko and Yanukovych share power in the awkward arrangement that was initially billed as an effort to unite Ukraine but instead has turned into a tug-of-war for influence, with the president largely on the losing end.

In the latest battle, lawmakers on Friday fired a key ally of the president, the pro-Western Foreign Minister Borys Tarasyuk, along with Interior Minister Yuriy Lutsenko, one of the leaders of the Orange Revolution. Yushchenko said Tarasyuk's dismissal will be challenged before the nation's Constitutional Court.

Yanukovych is still regarded as the Kremlin's friend in Ukraine — and it has paid off for him. He helped strike a deal on gas prices for next year that, while still a significant increase for the ex-Soviet republic, is lower than what Russia proposed to neighboring states.

Of late, Yanukovych has tried not to overtly antagonize the West. For instance, while delaying Ukraine's membership bid into NATO, he does support continuing cooperation with the alliance. On Tuesday, he called the U.S. "a strategic partner of Ukraine."

The prime minister is trying to improve his soft powers along with his hard-nosed political moves. Before the Orange Revolution, he came across as stiff and grumpy when he met journalists, and when interviews ended, he simply stood up and left.

Now, he smiles and mingles. Meeting with reporters on Tuesday, he loitered long enough to autograph copies of a book celebrating his first 100 days in office. Heading out the door, Yanukovych stopped suddenly, as if remembering something, and spun around to say goodbye.

Political analyst Mykhailo Pohrebinsky said that Yanukovych clearly had changed his presentation.

"We see that he says democratic things and poses himself as a protector of the freedom of speech," Pohrebinsky said. "Whether this is sincere, I can't say."

Who Succeeds Putin? Ask Putin (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

MOSCOW — By showing up together at a Deep Purple concert here this fall, First Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev and Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov presumably were reliving more carefree days.

Ivanov was a teenager and Medvedev just a child when the British hard-rock group burst onto the international scene, a time when a clutch of Western bands gained near-iconic status among Soviet youths as symbols of social freedom.

The buzz here is that the two men are the leading contestants in a competition to be President Vladimir V. Putin's anointed successor when his second term expires in 2008.

So these were not just any two high-ranking officials, and their shared enthusiasm for "Smoke on the Water" may signal that they want to be viewed as friends and allies, not competitors.

They could, after all, end up as partners in a new power structure, with one serving as president and the other as prime minister.

"I am, of course, saddened by the fact that I have been made a contestant in some race, but it does not in any way affect my relations with Sergei Borisovich Ivanov," Medvedev told an interviewer for Russia's NTV news channel the day after the concert. The interviewer asked whether the two men had joined in the dancing.

"Well, we just applauded," the 41-year-old Medvedev replied.

What a missed opportunity, mused a columnist for the newspaper Nezavisimaya Gazeta. "You must be thinking that shaking to Deep Purple is no big deal," the columnist wrote. "Yes, it is a big deal, sirs, if the problem of 2008 could be resolved quite easily by such a dance. The one who dances better becomes president."

With Putin enjoying popularity ratings above 70% and holding ever greater centralized power, a presidential endorsement is widely seen here as key to succeeding him. That means the current contest among Medvedev, Ivanov and other potential candidates for the big man's nod may well prove more crucial than the 2008 election in determining Russia's course.

The personality and goals of the winner could nudge the country toward greater authoritarianism or toward a more decentralized and democratic political system.

Russia's constitution bars the president from a third consecutive term, and Putin has repeatedly said he does not favor revising it to allow him to continue in office past 2008. But in nationally televised comments in October, he suggested he might continue to wield influence after he leaves the job.

That comment was taken by some as an indication that Putin might seek to exercise power from another position, such as prime minister, or that he envisioned a role like that played by Deng Xiaoping after the late Chinese leader retired from his official positions.

Putin, 54, has support from more than two-thirds of parliament, so speculation remains that a way may be found for him to stay on as president. One scenario has him giving in to a groundswell of public opinion and allowing the constitution to be revised.

But if he does step down, as most observers think he will, it is clear that whomever he backs as successor will stand a very good chance of being elected. A July survey by the respected Levada Center polling agency found that 40% of respondents said they would vote for a candidate proposed by Putin, compared with 14% who would favor someone else.

As long as the Kremlin elite stays united around one candidate, that person can expect strongly favorable coverage on all nationwide TV channels, which are either state-run or owned by state-controlled businesses. Few observers think an opposition candidate would have much chance of overcoming that advantage.

"If Putin names a successor and backs him, his chances of winning the presidency will be extremely high provided there are no huge surprises," said Sergei Markov, director of the Institute of Political Studies, a Moscow think tank with ties to the Kremlin. "Practically, we are talking about 99% probability here."

Markov said he believed Medvedev and Ivanov had the inside track.

Other possible candidates, he said, include Russian Railways President Vladimir Yakunin; parliamentary speaker Boris Gryzlov; Georgy Poltavchenko and Dmitry Kozak, influential presidential representatives to the southern and central federal districts; Mikhail Prusak, governor of the Novgorod region; and presidential Chief of Staff Sergei Sobyanin.

Markov also suggested the two presumed leading contenders might work as a team: Ivanov, 53, running for president with the understanding that Medvedev would be prime minister.

"This question has not been resolved yet, and this is just one of the possible options," Markov said.

Medvedev and Ivanov were thrust into the limelight as potential successors when they were appointed deputy prime ministers in November 2005. Medvedev was previously Putin's chief of staff, and Ivanov added the new title and broader responsibilities to his job as defense minister.

Ivanov, like Putin, worked for the KGB for many years. An early career with Soviet intelligence has generally been a plus for ambitious officials since Putin became president in 2000.

Medvedev began his career as a St. Petersburg law professor and legal affairs advisor.

"Medvedev's strength is that he is a pro-Western manager," Markov said.

"His weak side is that he is not connected with the people from the security apparatus, and so far he hasn't shown himself to be a strong leader able to make strong decisions. So far he appears too soft for the job."

Some skeptics question whether all the attention paid to Medvedev and Ivanov since their promotions is just a sideshow, with Putin's real pick likely to be someone with a lower profile.

"I am quite confident that neither Medvedev nor Ivanov will be chosen as a successor," said Dmitry Oreshkin, an analyst at the Russian Academy of Science's Institute of Geography. "The fuss around them is nothing but, to use the KGB terminology, the Kremlin's 'cover operation' to hide the preparation of the real plans.

"If a real successor gets appointed, he will appear some six months before the election like a rabbit from a hat or a devil from a box," Oreshkin said. "The real successor will immediately commit some heroic deed, like defeating Georgia in a lightning military operation, for example, or something on that scale, and thus will get elected by a landslide."

Oreshkin suggested that Yakunin, the railways president, who is considered personally close to Putin, may be a strong contender for that scenario.

Although Yakunin's official biography makes no mention of ties to the KGB, his early career path, which included a stint with the Soviet mission to the United Nations, suggests such links.

Yakunin "can be quite reasonable and demanding as a manager, and he is also a strong proponent of a powerful state," Oreshkin said. "In some ways he may become an even harder and tougher president than Putin himself."

Mikhail G. Delyagin, chairman of the Institute of Globalization Studies, a Moscow think tank, cited the common analysis that the Kremlin is broadly divided into two competing groups: the siloviki, or "powerful ones," and the liberals, with that label used in its classic free-market sense, not in its political-left meaning.

The siloviki have KGB backgrounds or are otherwise associated with security and defense, and are typically more politically hard-line. The liberals are composed largely of economic technocrats who do not have security backgrounds.

Medvedev is widely viewed as the standard-bearer of the liberal camp within the Kremlin, while Putin's deputy chief of staff, Igor Sechin, 46, is seen as leader of the siloviki.

Delyagin noted that most analysts do not consider Sechin a candidate for successor. But he argued that precisely because Sechin is not included on such lists, his chances may be quite good.

"He is the second in command in the country now," Delyagin said. "He is very smart and very influential. Moscow intellectuals like to laugh at him, but that only shows how shortsighted Moscow intellectuals are."

Delyagin, a prominent Putin critic, also offered another scenario for the election.

Putin can yield the throne, but the anointed successor "can quickly get sick after the election," he said, noting that the constitution bars Putin not from a third term, but from a third consecutive term.

Putin, he suggested, could allow "Comrade Medvedev" to be elected president — but with an understanding that he will resign almost immediately, claiming ill health.

In that case, he said, "new elections will be held and Putin will be able to take part in them."

Russian Ex-Spy Lived In A World Of Deceptions (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

LONDON, Dec. 2 — The tangled tale of Alexander V. Litvinenko, the maverick Russian K.G.B. agent turned dissident who died of radiation poisoning last week, has seized the headlines recently, but its roots can be traced to a late spring evening in Moscow in 1994.

At just after 5 p.m. on June 7, Boris A. Berezovsky, one of Russia's most powerful oligarchs, was leaving the offices of his car dealership in a chauffeured Mercedes 600. According to Russian news accounts at the time, he and his bodyguard were sitting in the rear seat behind the driver. As the car drove by a parked vehicle, a remote-controlled bomb detonated, decapitating the driver but somehow leaving Mr. Berezovsky unscathed.

As a high-ranking officer in the organized crime unit of the F.S.B., the successor to the K.G.B., Mr. Litvinenko "was the investigating officer of the assassination attempt," said Alex Goldfarb, a Berezovsky associate and a spokesman for the Litvinenko family, in an interview conducted, fittingly, in the rear seat of a parked Mercedes in central London with a heavyset driver at the wheel. "They became friends."

It was a friendship that was to shape Mr. Litvinenko's career, which began in the roller-coaster politics and self-enrichment of post-Soviet Russia, spanned his desperate flight from Russia through Turkey and then on to Britain to seek asylum. It ended spectacularly and mysteriously, with the British police saying the only thing they knew for sure was that he was dead, poisoned after ingesting an obscure radioactive isotope called polonium 210.

After Mr. Litvinenko's death, sketchy facts and abundant speculation unfolded like some lost chapter of the cold war. But unlike those days of East-West division and the half-light of shadowy, underground conflicts, this saga played out in the bright glare of newspaper headlines and 24-hour news channels.

Although the precise circumstances of his death remain hidden, Mr. Litvinenko lived the last years of his life as a public critic of President Vladimir V. Putin and the Russian government. Assigned to investigate the assassination attempt on Mr. Berezovsky, he ended up accusing the F.S.B. of involvement in a later conspiracy, a charge that severed his ties with the agency. Once in exile in London, his contacts with Mr. Berezovsky and a circle of other Russian émigrés and former agents flourished, even as his criticism of Mr. Putin grew more vigorous. In the weeks before his death, he had begun looking into the shooting death in Moscow of the journalist Anna Politkovskaya, a fierce critic of Mr. Putin and his policies in Chechnya.

Mr. Litvinenko began his lingering decline on Nov. 1, when he met an Italian academic, Mario Scaramella, in a sushi bar and linked up with former K.G.B. colleagues in a five-star hotel. Then he fell ill, wasting away over 22 excruciating days from a muscular, almost boyish figure to a gaunt shadow. Investigators followed a radioactive trail around London and, through British Airways planes found to have traces of radiation, to Moscow. British Airways said 221 flights, carrying 33,000 people, might have been affected. In a bizarre sideshow, a former Russian prime minister, Yegor Gaidar, a quiet critic of the Kremlin, fell ill with symptoms of poisoning.

The episode left Britain's relations with Russia strained: no matter how much Mr. Putin denied it, British officials faced a barrage of newspaper speculation that a supposedly friendly power, or its disaffected agents, had reached onto the streets of London for nefarious purposes.

From his deathbed, Mr. Litvinenko accused Mr. Putin of responsibility for his plight, but that conclusion was far from certain. One thing, though, was abundantly clear: Mr. Litvinenko's death matched his life in a world of conspiracy and betrayal as a former spy.

Links to a Tycoon

Mr. Litvinenko's role in the investigation of the assassination attempt against Mr. Berezovsky, who fled into exile in London in 2000, is not widely chronicled, although it was alluded to in an Associated Press report in 1998, which said the case was never solved.

Nonetheless, it appears to have provided the starting point for an association between Mr. Berezovsky, then one of Russia's richest men and most influential power brokers, and Mr. Litvinenko, who was rapidly acquiring a reputation at the Russian spy agency as a rebel and whistleblower.

Mr. Berezovsky declined to be interviewed for this article, saying through a spokesman that he was not prepared to offer further comment until after the police investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's death.Iin a book he published in 2004, "Lubyanka Criminal Group," Mr. Litvinenko referred to a turning point in his life as an agent. In December 1997, he said his superior in the F.S.B. called him into his office with staggering orders: "You, Litvinenko, you know Berezovsky? You have to liquidate him," he said his superior told him.

That claim resurfaced sensationally in the public eye in November 1998, after Mr. Berezovsky accused the F.S.B. of plotting to assassinate him. Mr. Litvinenko and other disaffected agents called a news conference to confirm Mr. Berezovsky's allegations. It was a bizarre spectacle, even by the conspiratorial standards of the time: one dissident F.S.B. officer appeared in a ski mask, another in dark glasses. Mr. Litvinenko did not conceal his identity.

Mr. Putin, who led the agency at the time, reacted angrily, threatening to dismiss Mr. Litvinenko and the other officers who had spoken out.

According to a transcript published by the Kremlin International News Broadcast, Mr. Litvinenko began with a forthright attack on corruption within the agency. He said some of its units "have been used by certain officials not for constitutional purposes of state and personal security but for their own private political and material purposes, to settle accounts with undesirable persons, to carry out private political and criminal orders for a fee and sometimes simply as an instrument to earn money."

The remarks led to Mr. Litvinenko's suspension from the F.S.B. and a series of criminal court cases on five counts of abuse of power and other charges. In 1999, he spent eight months in pretrial detention in Lefortovo Prison in Moscow. When charges were dropped in November 1999 for lack of evidence, he was rearrested the instant the acquittal was read out, according to an account in Izvestia in 2001. He was released again in December 1999 and ordered not to leave town.

But the weeks and months went by with no indication that the investigations against him would be dropped.

Mr. Litvinenko, his wife, Marina, and son, Anatoly, fled Moscow in October 2000. According to accounts by Mr. Litvinenko at the time, and by others including Mr. Goldfarb and Viktor Suvorov, a former Soviet military intelligence officer and defector, his trail led from Russia to the town of Antalya in southern Turkey, possibly via Ukraine.

But once in Turkey, no one, it seemed, wanted to deal with a renegade Russian agent.

"I brought him to the U.S. Embassy at the end of October in Ankara," said Mr. Goldfarb, by his own account an American citizen who fled the Soviet Union 31 years ago and spent many years in exile working for, among others, the financier George Soros. "We just walked in and said here's the F.S.B. colonel, and they are not interested."

Finally, Mr. Litvinenko left Turkey using a ticket allowing him to transit, but not stay, in London. In November 2000, he arrived at Heathrow airport, surrendered to the British police and claimed asylum, according to accounts by Mr. Litvinenko and in the British press. But he was still not treated as a high-level defector.

Mr. Suvorov, an agent from Russian military intelligence, G.R.U., who defected in 1978, said: "I raised the question, 'Look, there's a man who has lots of information about organized crime' — no one else had so much information — but no one questioned him about it, British, French, Americans. He had incredible knowledge." Neither Turkish nor American officials confirmed this account.

But, to judge from what happened later, Mr. Litvinenko was determined to put his knowledge of Russia's intelligence networks to use.

Émigrés in London

DOJ_NMG_0101417

From the minute he landed in Britain, Mr. Litvinenko resumed his association with Mr. Berezovsky, who had arrived some months earlier also seeking asylum. From a modest row house in white-collar Muswell Hill in north London, he appears to have moved easily in security and former espionage circles, frequently visiting Mr. Berezovsky's offices in Mayfair — one of London's most upscale districts.

He was part, too, of a population of an estimated 300,000 Russians in London, including political émigrés, old-time defectors and wealthy tycoons who spend their time in nightclubs and boutiques and buying up real estate and soccer clubs. He was granted British citizenship earlier this year.

But he also maintained contact with his former F.S.B. colleagues, like Mikhail Trepashkin, who was jailed in October 2003 for betraying state secrets while investigating apartment bombings in Moscow and elsewhere in 1999 that killed scores of people. Those bombings formed the basis of a book published in English the same year by Mr. Litvinenko accusing Russia's security services of staging the bombings as a pretext for the second Chechen war.

In a letter released Friday and dated Nov. 23, Mr. Trepashkin said in a reference to the F.S.B., "Back in 2002, I warned Alexander Litvinenko that they set up a special team to kill him."

But Mr. Litvinenko also registered increasing concerns about his safety. "A secret service is designed to fight another secret service," he told The New York Times in a telephone interview in 2004 during the inquiry into the poisoning of Viktor A. Yushchenko, then a Ukrainian presidential candidate. "When a secret service goes after an individual, they have no chance."

Mr. Litvinenko said his supporters arranged for him to address British legislators, whom he told that members of the Russian secret services were "getting more aggressive, threatening my relatives." He said he knew of 32 Russian spies working in England. "They follow us and prepare provocations and our liquidation," he said.

In September 2004, two weeks after his appeal to Parliament, Mr. Litvinenko said in the interview, bottles containing burning liquid were thrown at his apartment at 1 a.m.

Some of his associates bridled at the idea that he was Mr. Berezovsky's personal agent or go-between. "He was not just someone who came from Russia and said to Berezovsky: give me some money," said Mr. Suvorov, the former G.R.U. agent.

But Mr. Litvinenko nonetheless displayed a knack for confidential business. According to a report in The Times of London in November, he traveled to Israel weeks before he died to hand over a dossier on the Yukos oil affair — in which the company's former chairman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, has been imprisoned for tax evasion — to Leonid Nevzlin, an exiled oil tycoon. Mr. Nevzlin was quoted as confirming the article. On the fateful day when he first took ill, the radiation trail of his movement led to the offices of Erinys, an international security company in Mayfair.

It was in that upscale district on Nov. 1 that he met his former Russian security service colleagues, Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitri Kovtun, in the Millennium Mayfair hotel, and Mr. Scaramella, the Italian consultant and academic, in the sushi bar on nearby Piccadilly. All three men have denied poisoning him.

A Mystery Deepens

But the saga was not over. One week after the police reported that Mr. Litvinenko had been poisoned, Mr. Scaramella himself was hospitalized when concentrations of the isotope were found in his body. Traces were also found on a member of Mr. Litvinenko's family.

The mystery seemed as deep as ever: the police had traced Mr. Litvinenko's movements and his contacts on Nov. 1. Detectives had spent 20 hours interviewing him in the hospital, according to associates. Yet the trail to Moscow seemed elusive and was impossible to confirm. Speculation swirled inconclusively about Kremlin plots and counterplots and efforts by rogue operatives to pursue their own feuds or discredit President Putin. But no one could say where the poison came from or how it entered Mr. Litvinenko's body.

Indeed, Mr. Lugovoi, the former K.G.B. agent, said in a Russian newspaper interview published on Saturday that Mr. Litvinenko might have, in fact, ingested the poison weeks earlier than anyone realized. If true, that would upend some of the most basic assumptions of the investigation — at least as far as it has been made public — and explain why radiation was found on a British Airways plane that flew between Moscow and London on Oct. 25.

"Alexander Litvinenko, my business partner Dmitri Kovtun and I were in London on Oct. 17 at a meeting in the office of Erinys," the private security company, Mr. Lugovoi told the Russian newspaper Kommersant. "Traces of radiation could have been left there after this visit."

Some of Mr. Litvinenko's associates said his position might have been made more precarious when he began to gather information about the death of Ms. Politkovskaya, the Russian investigative reporter shot to death in Moscow in October. "He was a very good investigator himself," said Mr. Suvorov, the former G.R.U. agent. "That made him very dangerous and vulnerable: if anyone called him and said, 'I know who killed Politkovskaya,' he just arranged a meeting. So, definitely, he was very vulnerable."

There's A Reason Russians Are Paranoid (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

BEING prone to conspiracy theories, as Russians certainly are, doesn't mean that someone is not conspiring against them.

That, in essence, has been the response here to the poisoning of Aleksandr V. Litvinenko, the secret agent turned exile in London who died on Nov. 23 — a case that only grew murkier last week with the discovery of radioactive traces aboard three British airplanes and another mysterious illness in Moscow.

Mr. Litvinenko's slow end, the intrigue of his final healthy days, his deathbed statement accusing President Vladimir V. Putin of culpability (in English, some Russians noted suspiciously) — have nurtured a widely held view here that it was all indeed a conspiracy, only not the one embraced by Mr. Putin's critics.

It was, from this point of view, not a plot by the Kremlin to silence a critic, but one by its enemies to discredit the Kremlin, the obvious suspects being Mr. Putin's critics in exile or, of course, President Bush, the Central Intelligence Agency or the West (generally).

Or it could have been a plot by a faction inside the Kremlin to make it look as if a competing faction inside the Kremlin had done it.

"There is too much evidence" to think otherwise, said Stanislav A. Belkovsky, a political scientist here with ties to Mr. Putin's Kremlin.

Actually, there is not much evidence at all, only questions and suspicions — which is, by the way, equally true of the accusations against Mr. Putin, no matter how fervently his critics believe them.

Every country has its conspiracy theories, of course, and the Spy vs. Spy dramas of the cold war and Hollywood have given life to a fair number of them. But they thrive here in the fertile ground of the Russian imagination as they do in few other places.

The Soviet Union's leaders obsessed over conspiracies, real and imagined. They also rewrote history so regularly, fabricated so many economic reports extolling progress, covered up so many embarrassments like the Chernobyl disaster that few here ever believed they knew the whole truth about anything. And the absence of truth is where conspiracy theories take root.

This remains so, and Mr. Putin is at least partly to blame. He has stifled the news media, and the day-to-day operation of the Kremlin is again as opaque as it was in Soviet times. And there is the inconvenient fact that the Kremlin's critics — including a number of journalists — keep dying in circumstances that investigators have yet to solve.

Mr. Putin's entire presidency has been wrapped up in conspiracy theories, starting with his abrupt rise to power as Boris Yeltsin's successor in 1999. That fall, a series of apartment bombings killed 243 people, fanning popular support for the second war in Chechnya, Russia's separatist region. From the start, the bombings were viewed with suspicion, especially after the discovery of federal agents planting what turned out to be explosives in the basement of another building. (A training exercise, officials finally said.) In Russian politics, the violence clearly played to the advantage of hard-liners like Mr. Putin.

A vocal adherent of the theory that Russian secret services conspired to bomb their own citizens to bolster the Chechen war effort was Mr. Litvinenko, a former agent of the secret service he accused in a book he jointly wrote, "Blowing Up Russia: Terror From Within." The book was published with the help of Boris A. Berezovsky, the self-exiled tycoon who lives in London and has become Mr. Putin's fiercest critic (the feeling is, evidently, mutual).

Aleksei A. Venediktov, a radio host and executive editor of Ekho Moskvy, said the failure of the government to investigate the bombings thoroughly has nurtured distrust. In the same way, there are those who believe the authorities know more than they have told about the terrorist school siege in Beslan, in which 332 hostages and rescuers were killed in 2004.

"As long as the public is not informed, conspiracy theories will multiply and grow," Mr. Venediktov said. "This does not mean there is no conspiracy."

His theory? It was neither Mr. Putin nor the secret services. In fact, few here believe Russia's leaders would have been so obvious as to use a radioactive isotope; it was used, instead, so people would think so!

Mr. Venediktov said a death squad working outside of government control killed Mr. Litvinenko to frighten the political elite into insisting that Mr. Putin, stay on for a third term whether he wants to or not. By law he must step down in 2008.

"The people who are behind this murder want to lay the responsibility in the future on Putin," he said, in order to make him afraid to leave office lest he be prosecuted.

In the Russian press, where objectivity is as elusive as ever, even darker theories abound, almost always pointing the blame away from Mr. Putin's Kremlin and back toward his accusers. Izvestia offered four on Thursday. According to one, Mr.

Litvinenko was selling radioactive materials on the black market. Another: he and Mr. Berezovsky were making a nuclear bomb to help Chechnya's separatists.

These theories about Mr. Litvinenko are not just ideas on the fringe. The chairman of the upper house of Parliament, Sergei M. Mironov, noted that the deaths of Mr. Litvinenko and Anna Politkovskaya, the journalist who was murdered in October, took place on the eve of trips by Mr. Putin to Europe. "I do not think the coincidence was accidental," he said.

When news emerged last week that Yegor T. Gaidar, a former prime minister and critic of Mr. Putin's, had fallen ill a day after Mr. Litvinenko died, an ally of Mr. Gaidar's, Anatoly B. Chubais, linked it to the deaths of Mr. Litvinenko and Ms. Politkovskaya, but not to Mr. Putin. Mr. Chubais, the head of Russia's electric company, offered a grand conspiracy theory involving an attempted coup against Mr. Putin.

The logic behind the conspiracies — let alone the facts — can sometimes be hard to fathom, but a Kremlin spokesman, Dmitry S. Peskov, said that many people in London, exiles and their supporters, were all too ready to believe anything that reflected poorly on Russia. "It is a negative heritage of the old times," he said.

Pressed, he suggested that "commercial interests" lay behind Mr. Litvinenko's charges.

Even Mr. Putin himself struck a conspiratorial tone, questioning the origins of Mr. Litvinenko's last statement. "If such a note really appeared before Mr. Litvinenko's death, then a question arises: why this note was not made public when he was still alive?"

British Cabinet Told Of Russian Espionage (WT)

By Sean Rayment

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

LONDON -- The Russian intelligence services, prime suspects in the death of Alexander Litvinenko, have a network of more than 30 spies operating in Britain.

The sophisticated ring represents the greatest espionage threat facing Britain, government and law-enforcement sources told the London Sunday Telegraph.

The startling intelligence was presented last week to Cabinet ministers at a meeting of Cobra, the anti-terrorist task force.

The spies, equivalent in number to one in five of Moscow government officials based in Britain, are known to be monitoring the movements and activities of Russian emigres and opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

But they also are involved in a widespread operation targeting businessmen, members of Parliament and scientists in an attempt to steal commercial and state secrets.

Only the United States has more Russian agents operating on its soil.

Government sources claim that the agents are as active today as they were at the height of the Cold War, despite the fact that the Kremlin is now one of Britain's major allies in the war on terrorism.

They were also told that Mr. Litvinenko, a former KGB agent who died Nov. 23, was "most probably" slain by "state-sponsored" assassins with the radioactive poison polonium 210 and that suspicion centered firmly on Moscow.

"The Russian intelligence services are highly bureaucratic and legalistic. There isn't a great deal of room for personal initiative. Everything has to be officially authorized and signed off. And this murder would have been a highly complex operation involving many people, not one or two acting in isolation," one source told the Telegraph.

The revelations came as the Italian investigator Mario Scaramella, a friend of Mr. Litvinenko, was still being treated in a hospital after also being contaminated with polonium 210 after their meeting at a sushi restaurant.

Last night he was showing "no evidence of radiation toxicity," but doctors said they were continuing to monitor his condition and further tests were expected.

"The results may seem to suggest that Scaramella was an accidental victim, but it is still possible that the perpetrators simply failed to do their job properly, or that Scaramella himself might have had another role," a police source said.

Mr. Scaramella flew to Britain on an Easyjet flight from Naples, Italy, to Stansted Airport on Oct. 31 and flew back on Nov. 3.

Mr. Scaramella's name was one of five on a supposed "hit list" of people targeted for assassination by the Russian intelligence services and a shadowy group of KGB veterans called Dignity and Honor, which is run by a Col. Velentin Velichko.

During the Cobra meeting, government officials and the police were told that Russia is being ruled by a "brutal regime" that regards dissidents such as Mr. Litvinenko and Boris Berezovsky -- a Russian businessman living in exile in Britain -- as terrorists. The Russian state is suspected of ordering the killings of five persons in the past two decades.

Government sources said that Russia continues to spy on Britain because of its "insatiable" appetite for other countries' state secrets. The main areas of interest include finance, the energy industry, defense and electronics.

The threat is so severe that senior businessmen in companies such as BP and Centrica have been warned by MI5, a British intelligence service, that they may be targeted.

Government officials said that the Russian spies target unsuspecting businessmen at trade fairs and functions at the Russian Embassy.

Meetings usually follow the exchange of business cards, during which a favor is asked and may be rewarded with cash or other "inducements."

Officials said that in a "throwback" to the Cold War, agents communicate by "live letter boxes," in which secret material is carried by one spy to another, or by "dead letter boxes," where the material is left in a covert location.

Raul Castro Asserts Leadership At Big Brother Fidel's Birthday Party (MCT)

By Frances Robles

McClatchy Newspapers, December 3, 2006

In a clear signal that Cuba's post-Castro era has begun, an ailing Fidel Castro failed to appear at a massive military parade in his honor Saturday while his brother and designated successor delivered an inaugural speech of sorts.

Without explaining his brothers' absence, Raul renewed his willingness to negotiate an end to the almost 50 years of animosity between Washington and Havana. But on his own terms.

"We want to reaffirm our disposition to resolve at the negotiating table the prolonged dispute between the United States and Cuba, if and when they accept our country's condition that it will not tolerate any shadows over its independence," Raul said.

Many Cuba-watchers had expected Fidel to make his first public appearance at the parade since undergoing surgery in July and "temporarily" surrendering the presidency to Raul. At that time, Fidel asked that celebrations for his 80th birthday on Aug. 13 be postponed until Saturday.

But Fidel's absence was certain to fuel U.S. reports that he suffers from terminal cancer and likely will not live past 2007. The Cuban government has refused to detail his ailment, only repeating incessantly that he is "recuperating."

Cuba's media said 300,000 soldiers, students and workers marched along the Plaza of the Revolution as Russian-built MiG jets soared overhead, tanks rolled, and the nation's elite watched from the perch of bleachers.

Many of the marchers chanted, "We love you Fidel" and "Viva Raul," and some carried signs praising the revolution, launched Dec. 2, 1956 when the yacht Granma landed in eastern Cuba carrying the Castro brothers and 80 other fighters.

But in other parts of Havana, the capital seemed largely quiet and almost lifeless on a Saturday morning, with only a dampened sense of the celebrations of the birthdays of Fidel or the revolution.

Some Havana residents interviewed by The Miami Herald Saturday seemed to accept that Fidel is on his last legs yet - at least in public and before strangers - insisted that his ideology would survive his death.

"His death will not change anything. It will not mean they can come in and take over," said 83-year-old Sergio, referring to Cuban exiles abroad.

Leading the military display was Raul, still referred to by the Cuban media as defense minister rather than acting president. After a brief introduction by a teenager, Raul gave the only address of the parade.

It was the second time in Raul's rare recent public statements that he mentioned a willingness to work with Washington. But his calls are likely to fall flat for the time being since Bush administration policy is to push for democracy in Cuba - and oppose the kind of succession from one Castro to another that Raul's speech signaled.

"The absence of Fidel at this parade means that Dec. 2 marks the start of the post-Fidel era," said National War College professor Frank Mora. "The eulogies have begun, history and legacy will inform everything, but the message is clear . . . a new era and model of governance has begun."

Raul led the parade aboard a Soviet-era military vehicle, accompanied by three original commanders of the revolution: Ramiro Valdes, Juan Almeida and Guillermo Garcia.

"We are convinced that the way out of the distressing conflicts that humanity faces is not through war but through political solutions," Raul said.

The Bush administration reacted to Raul's speech by reiterating its previous position: The communist government must first initiate a democratic opening - an option long rejected by the Cubans as interference in their internal affairs.

"The dialogue that needs to take place is one between the Cuban regime and the Cuban people about the democratic future of their island," said State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus, reading from a prepared statement. "As we have repeatedly stated, any deepening of our engagement with Cuba depends on that dialogue and the Cuban regime's willingness to take concrete steps toward a political opening and a transition toward democracy."

Assistant Secretary of State for the Western Hemisphere Thomas Shannon in August specified some of the U.S. conditions: freeing political prisoners, respecting human rights, permitting the creation of independent organizations such as political parties and trade unions, and "creating a pathway" towards elections.

The olive branch that Raul extended toward Washington was not without barbs, however.

"After almost half a century, we are willing to wait patiently for the moment when common sense prevails in the behavior of the circles of power in Washington," he said.

"Three years and seven months after the euphoric and hasty declaration of `mission accomplished' in Iraq by President Bush aboard an aircraft carrier, the cadavers of young American soldiers continue to arrive in the United States," he added. "The government of the United States finds itself at a crossroads with no way out."

Underlining the importance of Raul's speech, the Cuban government swiftly posted translations into English, French, Italian, Portuguese, German, Arabic and Russian in its web site.

Many observers say Raul would be a more pragmatic leader, committed to communist rule but open to reforms away from Cuba's centrally controlled economy. The Revolutionary Armed Forces that Raul Castro leads now runs most of the island's commercial enterprises, such as its tourist industry.

Since Fidel announced plans for Saturday's event four months ago, he has appeared only in sporadic videos and photographs that showed him shrunken and weak, sometimes in pajamas or a loose-fitting tracksuit.

But those weren't the images shown Saturday on Cuban television, which broadcast hours of historic clips of a younger, stronger, triumphant Castro.

Miami Herald Washington correspondent Pablo Bachelet and translator Renato Perez contributed to this report. The name of the correspondent in Havana who also contributed was withheld because the Miami Herald lacks Cuban government authorization to report from there.

Castro A No-show At 80th Birthday Bash (AP)

By Anita Snow, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

Fidel Castro was a no-show Saturday at a major military parade that doubled as his 80th birthday celebration, raising questions about whether the ailing leader will ever return to power as his public absence begins taking on a tone of permanence.

Many Cubans had hoped for at least a glimpse of Castro before dozens of olive-camouflaged tanks rumbled through the Plaza of the Revolution and jet fighters soared above the capital to mark the 50th anniversary of the formation of Cuba's Revolutionary Armed Forces.

Castro hasn't been seen in public since July 26, before he underwent secretive intestinal surgery and temporarily ceded power to his younger brother, Raul. He delayed his 80th birthday celebration from Aug. 13 to this week in order to give himself time to recover, and speculation had been rife whether he would appear.

The military event, which lasted about two hours, culminated five days of events to celebrate Castro's birthday — none of which he attended.

Instead, it was Raul Castro, the island's defense minister, who stood at the mahogany lectern reviewing the troops during Saturday's parade.

The parade's most obvious purpose was to warn the U.S. against taking advantage of Fidel Castro's illness to attack the island. In the last 15 years the Cuban military has taken on a purely defensive role, and is trained to repel invaders.

In a speech that lacked his brother's rhetorical flourishes, Raul Castro reached out to the U.S. government, which has a decades-old trade and travel embargo against the communist-run island. He did not explain the absence of his brother.

"We take this opportunity to once again state that we are willing to resolve at the negotiating table the long-standing dispute between the United States and Cuba," as long as the U.S. respects Cuba's sovereignty, said Raul Castro, who turned 75 in June.

"After almost half a century, we are willing to wait patiently until the moment when common sense prevails in Washington power circles," he added.

U.S. State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus said Saturday that "the dialogue that needs to take place is one between the Cuban regime and the Cuban people about the democratic future of the island.

"Any deepening of our engagement with Cuba depends on that dialogue and the Cuban regime's willingness to take concrete steps toward a political opening and a transition to democracy," she added.

Raul Castro used the event to underscore cohesion among the Cuban people, the armed forces and the Communist Party — a recurring theme among officials in recent days.

"This unity is our main strategic weapon, which has made it possible for this small island to resist and overcome so many aggressions from imperialism and its allies," he said.

Cuban officials insist Fidel Castro is recovering, but U.S. officials say they believe he suffers from some kind of inoperable cancer and will not live through the end of 2007. He has appeared thin and pale in photographs and videos released by the government in recent months.

Some U.S. doctors have speculated he could have diverticulosis, a condition relatively common among older people that is caused when weak spots form along the colon and intersect with an artery.

Fidel Castro purportedly sent a message to those celebrating his birthday earlier this week, telling a crowd of 5,000 supporters at the opening event Tuesday at a Havana theater that he was too sick to meet with them.

"I direct myself to you, intellectuals and prestigious personalities of the world, with a dilemma," said a note read at the event. "I could not meet with you in a small locale, only in the Karl Marx Theater where all the visitors would fit, and I was not yet in condition, according to the doctors, to face such a colossal encounter."

Magda Avila, a 70-year-old army veteran, said she was not disappointed the elder Castro did not appear at the parade. "It is fine that he didn't come, so that he can recuperate," she said.

In Miami, Alfredo Mesa, executive director of the anti-Castro Cuban-American National Foundation, said the leader's failure to appear was unimportant.

"For us, Fidel Castro is part of the past," Mesa said. "The pressure is on those who did appear, for them to let Cubans in Cuba decide for themselves what kind of future they want."

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said in Caracas that Castro, his good friend and ally, was still "alive and kicking" and that Cuba's communist revolution will live on. Chavez could not attend the parade because he faces re-election Sunday.

Among those at the parade were Bolivian President Evo Morales, Haitian President Rene Preval, Nicaraguan President-elect Daniel Ortega and Colombian Nobel laureate Gabriel Garcia Marquez, as well as hundreds of elderly former combatants from Cuba's revolutionary struggle.

In the first major military parade held in Havana in a decade, tens of thousands of Cubans marched behind anti-aircraft missiles, tanks and other armored vehicles while MiG fighter jets and helicopter gunships flew overhead. The crowd of loyalists was more subdued than in other mass events presided over by Fidel Castro.

Thousands of soldiers led the parade, including special forces in red berets, militiamen in blue uniforms and horseback riders wearing the white dress uniform of 19th century Cuban independence fighters.

Cuba's Revolutionary Armed Forces, which replaced the military that existed before the Cuban Revolution, traces its roots to Dec. 2, 1956, when 82 rebels landed on the island on a yacht — the Granma — that sailed from Mexico.

Only 12 survived the landing and initial skirmishes with President Fulgencio Batista's forces in December 1956. Among the survivors were the two Castro brothers and Ernesto "Che" Guevara, who headed for the hills to build a command post for the revolution that drove Batista out of Cuba on Jan. 1, 1959.

A Rare Silence Reverberates In Castro's Long Goodbye (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

HAVANA, Dec. 2 — In his day, Fidel Castro could not stop talking. He was Cuba's talk show host as well as its president, with his frequent long speeches broadcast into homes on radio and television serving as something akin to background music in Cubans' lives.

Anything that popped into his head was material, whether it was his reflections on Cuban history, his outrage at Washington or a meandering story that left audiences scratching their heads.

Now, though, Mr. Castro, Cuba's ailing leader, is silent, leaving a gap on state-run broadcasts and confused audiences.

On Saturday, the final day of a weeklong belated birthday celebration for the 80-year-old Mr. Castro, Cubans expected one last discourse. But he was a no-show at a flashy military parade that capped the week of festivities. That left many Cubans convinced that their leader of nearly half a century had delivered his final speech.

"The old man is as weak as me," said a man in his 70s who sells copies of the Communist Party newspaper from the wheelchair he has used since losing a leg to gangrene. "I will outlast him."

Mr. Castro last addressed Cubans on July 26, then slipped out of view for several days. On July 31, he announced in a statement that he had had abdominal surgery several days before and that his 75-year-old brother, Raúl, would take over as president while he recuperated.

Mr. Castro's illness, details of which are still regarded as a state secret, has awakened Cubans to the notion of life without the only leader most of them have ever known. Life, defenders and critics of his rule agree, is likely to continue largely as it has, only with a new Castro, a more taciturn one, at the top of the Communist Party organizational chart.

"Nothing has changed for us," said José, 38, a mechanic who opened the refrigerator in his tiny, rundown apartment this week to show three shriveled tomatoes, three pieces of garlic and little else. "Every day will continue to be a struggle."

Mr. Castro's Cuba is very much a work in progress. Its education and health care systems are universal, but socialism has not wiped out classism or racism, freedom to speak out is clearly restricted and life for most people is humble, at best.

Mr. Castro's popularity stems in large part from his long standoff with the United States; he has been an irritant for presidents dating back to Eisenhower.

A variety of concerts, conferences and other tributes in the past week have had the feeling of a long goodbye. Mr. Castro's death, which opponents in the United States had predicted for years was imminent, is now widely assumed among Cubans to be looming.

At Saturday's parade, Raúl was the only Castro to speak. In a 20-minute address, he railed at the American government, condemning the war in Iraq and suggesting that Cuba would negotiate with Washington only on equal terms.

"After almost half a century, we are willing to wait patiently until the moment when common sense prevails in the Washington power circles," he said.

The parade, which featured Soviet-made tanks rumbling by and jets streaking overhead, drew onlookers from around the world, including such notables as Gabriel García Márquez, the Nobel prize-winning author from Colombia; Daniel Ortega, the president-elect of Nicaragua; Evo Morales, the president of Bolivia; René Préval, the president of of Haiti; and the French actor Gérard Depardieu.

Expectations were high that Mr. Castro would attend, but when he did not, his supporters made the most of the celebration. "He's not physically here, but he's still here with us," said Deysi Francis, 42, a journalist with the state-run newspaper Granma.

Antonio Jiménez, 70, a retired teacher, held up a photograph of a young, cigar-smoking Mr. Castro and expressed optimism that he would recover. "His doctors are trying to preserve him," Mr. Jimenez said.

When he does die, Fidel Castro's illness has already shown that he will not disappear altogether.

Billboards of his likeness and his words have been erected around Cuba, posted after the country learned he was sick. Television has been showing biographical sketches of him and snippets of speeches from the past.

Mr. Castro even continues to speak in the pages of Granma, which is churning out a serialized version of several long interviews he gave a French academic in recent years.

"The enemies of the Cuban revolution are counting the minutes waiting and hoping that he dies, without understanding that Fidel no longer is Fidel," Foreign Minister Felipe Pérez Roque said Thursday at an academic conference devoted to Mr. Castro, the bearded former guerrilla fighter.

"Now, he is the people, and he is every man and woman prepared to fight for the idea that a better world is possible," said Mr. Pérez Roque, who was for years Mr. Castro's personal secretary.

While insisting that Mr. Castro would recover, Mr. Pérez Roque described a post-Castro Cuba in which the ideals he spoke of in his many long addresses over the years would endure. "When he and the men of his generation are no longer with us, we have the conviction that our people will have made those ideas and principles theirs forever," he said.

But Mr. Castro's long-winded days are almost surely in the past. Brian Latell, a former C.I.A. analyst who specialized in Cuba, describes in his book "After Fidel" one speech from 1968, during a political purge on the island, that went on for 12 hours.

"Probably no other human in any line of work has ever been recorded uttering such avalanches of words," wrote Mr. Latell, who sifted through many of Mr. Castro's thousands of speeches over the years in search of clues on his thinking.

On the streets, people speak of him fondly one minute, then whisper criticism of his rule. Saying his name is not necessary — they sometimes stroke an imaginary beard. Opinions are often a jumble of contradictions.

"I don't have a bad opinion of him, but he has us like we're in jail," said Mario Gutiérrez, 19, a rap singer.

José, the mechanic, who provided only his first name out of fear his comments could run afoul of the authorities, said Mr. Castro had become a father figure to Cubans — even those who are dissatisfied with their everyday lives and blame him. "Our father is dying, and that's sad," he said, "even though we want him to go."

No Castro, But Lots Of Speculation (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

HAVANA, Dec. 2 -- Cubans woke before dawn Saturday and walked miles for a chance to be near Fidel Castro.

DOJ_NMG_0101424

There were no guarantees that the Cuban president, who had been absent from public view for more than four months since undergoing stomach surgery, would surface. Just rumors and whispers, whispers and rumors.

The sounds of Havana wrestling with its greatest modern mystery trickled out of faded doorways and clattered off the chipped facades of this gracefully decaying capital.

"He's getting better."

"He's dead."

"Nobody knows."

It went like that all morning, as hundreds of thousands of Cubans ringed the concrete Plaza de la Revolucion for this country's largest military parade in decades. And it went like that long after the last missile launchers and tanks cut smoky paths down the 20th of May Avenue.

The man they had all come to see never showed up. Castro remained hidden away, his illness shrouded in mystery, his whereabouts a jealously guarded state secret.

"We're all wondering what's happening; it's all we talk about," said Angel Gutierrez, a graphic artist who watched the event on television in his home along the parade route, as a half-dozen police officers crowded his doorway to catch a glimpse of the coverage. "Whatever it is, it's bad."

Those in the crowd, waving thousands of Cuban flags attached to splintery poles, got no clues from Castro's handpicked interim successor, his younger brother Raul. Appearing in a green military uniform and a cap, Raul Castro, 75, said Cuba was willing to use "the negotiating table" to improve relations with the United States. But he said little about his brother, other than "Viva Fidel!" -- Long live Fidel!

Many Cubans expected the uncertainty about Fidel Castro to be cleared up Saturday. But the day ended with more confusion.

The president temporarily relinquished power for the first time in 47 years after his surgery on July 31. The Cuban government canceled a blowout party planned for Aug. 13, his 80th birthday, but set Dec. 2 as the date for his triumphant return. It was to have been both a commemoration of the Cuban revolution's 50th anniversary and a belated birthday celebration.

Stars of Latin America's populist movements -- heirs to Castro's legacy -- poured into Havana. There was Daniel Ortega, the onetime rebel who recently recaptured Nicaragua's presidency, and there was Evo Morales, the plain-spoken indigenous leader who holds Bolivia's presidency.

In absentia, Castro was praised in a series of events over the past three days, and honored by political leaders and intellectuals, such as Gabriel Garcia Marquez, a Nobel Prize-winning author and Castro's friend.

Each event was accompanied by a tingle of anticipation, a buzz in the corridors about whether Castro would appear. On Tuesday night, a spokesman read a rambling statement to a concert audience in which Castro said his doctors advised him against showing up at such a large event.

Diplomats and analysts parsed the statement, searching for meaning. Many foreign officials have concluded that Castro does not have long to live, that he is dying of cancer or some other terminal disease.

The possible demise of the dominant figure in modern Cuban history has sparked an endless conversation here about what comes next. Cubans seem to be accepting Raul Castro's legitimacy as Fidel Castro's heir to power, but they wonder and sometimes fear what the younger brother will do.

Cubans often praise the country's 100 percent literacy rate and its system of free schools and medical treatment. But many, speaking cautiously and almost always anonymously, say they hope a new government might allow more personal freedom, sanction private enterprise and lift travel restrictions that keep most Cubans on the island their entire lives.

"I like a lot of what I have," said Pablo, a state worker. "But so much has to change; it just has to."

Change here is associated with the end of Fidel Castro's reign, or more specifically, the end of his life. But the Cuban government says its "supreme leader" will lead again.

On Friday, at the gala closing of Castro's birthday celebration, Vice President Carlos Lage emphatically declared that Castro would recover and return to power.

"He is not a man," Lage shouted into the microphone. "He is a force of nature!"

Yet Lage also seemed to ponder Castro's demise.

"When Fidel is not here, his works and his thoughts will remain," he said.

But at the military parade Saturday, there was no such talk. An announcer shouted "Viva Fidel! Viva Raul!" as a replica of the Granma, the yacht the Castro brothers sailed from Mexico to start their revolution, eased past the reviewing stand.

The elite crowd of invited guests in the plaza yelled back, "Viva Fidel! Viva Raul !"

But the crowd in Gutierrez's living room, and the even bigger one peering through his window and lining the street, watched in silence.

Fidel's Final Victory (FA)

By Julia E. Sweig

Foreign Affairs, January 1, 2007

From Foreign Affairs, January/February 2007

Summary: The smooth transfer of power from Fidel Castro to his successors is exposing the willful ignorance and wishful thinking of U.S. policy toward Cuba. The post-Fidel transition is already well under way, and change in Cuba will come only gradually from here on out. With or without Fidel, renewed U.S. efforts to topple the revolutionary regime in Havana can do no good -- and have the potential to do considerable harm.

Julia E. Sweig is Nelson and David Rockefeller Senior Fellow and Director of Latin America Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations. She is the author of Inside the Cuban Revolution: Fidel Castro and the Urban Underground and Friendly fire: Losing Friends and Making Enemies in the Anti-American Century.

CUBA AFTER CASTRO?

Ever since Fidel Castro gained power in 1959, Washington and the Cuban exile community have been eagerly awaiting the moment when he would lose it -- at which point, the thinking went, they would have carte blanche to remake Cuba in their own image. Without Fidel's iron fist to keep Cubans in their place, the island would erupt into a collective demand for rapid change. The long-oppressed population would overthrow Fidel's revolutionary cronies and clamor for capital, expertise, and leadership from the north to transform Cuba into a market democracy with strong ties to the United States.

But that moment has come and gone -- and none of what Washington and the exiles anticipated has come to pass. Even as Cuba-watchers speculate about how much longer the ailing Fidel will survive, the post-Fidel transition is already well under way. Power has been successfully transferred to a new set of leaders, whose priority is to preserve the system while permitting only very gradual reform. Cubans have not revolted, and their national identity remains tied to the defense of the homeland against U.S. attacks on its sovereignty. As the post-Fidel regime responds to pent-up demands for more democratic participation and economic opportunity, Cuba will undoubtedly change -- but the pace and nature of that change will be mostly imperceptible to the naked American eye.

Fidel's almost five decades in power came to a close last summer not with the expected bang, or even really a whimper, but in slow motion, with Fidel himself orchestrating the transition. The transfer of authority from Fidel to his younger brother, Raúl, and half a dozen loyalists -- who have been running the country under Fidel's watch for decades -- has been notably smooth and stable. Not one violent episode in Cuban streets. No massive exodus of refugees. And despite an initial wave of euphoria in Miami, not one boat leaving a florida port for the 90-mile trip. Within Cuba, whether Fidel himself survives for weeks, months, or years is now in many ways beside the point.

In Washington, however, Cuba policy -- aimed essentially at regime change -- has long been dominated by wishful thinking ever more disconnected from the reality on the island. Thanks to the votes and campaign contributions of the 1.5 million Cuban Americans who live in florida and New Jersey, domestic politics has driven policymaking. That tendency has been indulged by a U.S. intelligence community hamstrung by a breathtaking and largely self-imposed isolation from Cuba and reinforced by a political environment that rewards feeding the White House whatever it wants to hear. Why alter the status quo when it is so familiar, so well funded, and so rhetorically pleasing to politicians in both parties?

But if consigning Cuba to domestic politics has been the path of least resistance so far, it will begin to have real costs as the post-Fidel transition continues -- for Cuba and the United States alike. Fidel's death, especially if it comes in the run-up to a presidential election, could bring instability precisely because of the perception in the United States that Cuba will be vulnerable to meddling from abroad. Some exiles may try to draw the United States into direct conflict with Havana, whether by egging on potential Cuban refugees to take to the florida Straits or by appealing to Congress, the White House, and the Pentagon to attempt to strangle the post-Fidel government.

Washington must finally wake up to the reality of how and why the Castro regime has proved so durable -- and recognize that, as a result of its willful ignorance, it has few tools with which to effectively influence Cuba after Fidel is gone. With U.S. credibility in Latin America and the rest of the world at an all-time low, it is time to put to rest a policy that Fidel's handover of power has already so clearly exposed as a complete failure.

CHANGE IN THE WEATHER

On July 31, 2006, Fidel Castro's staff secretary made an announcement: Fidel, just days away from his 80th birthday, had undergone major surgery and turned over "provisional power" to his 75-year-old brother, Raúl, and six senior officials. The gravity of Fidel's illness (rumored to be either terminal intestinal cancer or severe diverticulitis with complications) was immediately clear, both from photographs of the clearly weakened figure and from Fidel's own dire-sounding statements beseeching Cubans to prepare for his demise. Across the island, an air of resignation and anticipation took hold.

DOJ_NMG_0101426

The dead of August, with its intense heat and humidity, is a nerve-racking time in Cuba, but as rumors sped from home to home, there was a stunning display of orderliness and seriousness in the streets. Life continued: people went to work and took vacations, watched telenovelas and bootlegged dvds and programs from the Discovery and History channels, waited in lines for buses and weekly rations, made their daily black-market purchases -- repeating the rituals that have etched a deep mark in the Cuban psyche. Only in Miami were some Cubans partying, hoping that Fidel's illness would soon turn to death, not only of a man but also of a half century of divided families and mutual hatred.

Raúl quickly assumed Fidel's duties as first secretary of the Communist Party, head of the Politburo, and president of the Council of State (and retained control of the armed forces and intelligence services). The other deputies -- two of whom had worked closely with the Castro brothers since the revolution and four of whom had emerged as major players in the 1990s -- took over the other key departments. Ranging in age from their mid-40s through their 70s, they had been preparing for this transition to collective leadership for years. José Ramón Balaguer, a doctor who fought as a guerrilla in the Sierra Maestra during the revolution, assumed authority over public health. José Ramón Machado Ventura, another doctor who fought in the Sierra, and Esteban Lazo Hernández now share power over education. Carlos Lage Dávila -- a key architect of the economic reforms of the 1990s, including efforts to bring in foreign investment -- took charge of the energy sector. Francisco Soberón Valdés, president of the Central Bank of Cuba, and Felipe Pérez Roque, minister of foreign affairs, took over finances in those areas.

At first, U.S. officials simply admitted that they had almost no information about Fidel's illness or plans for succession. President George W. Bush said little beyond soberly (and surprisingly) pointing out that the next leader of Cuba would come from Cuba -- a much-needed warning to the small yet influential group of hard-line exiles (Republican florida Congressman Lincoln Diaz-Balart, a nephew of Fidel's, prominent among them) with aspirations to post-Fidel presidential politics.

A few weeks into the Fidel deathwatch, Raúl gave an interview clearly meant for U.S. consumption. Cuba, he said, "has always been ready to normalize relations on the basis of equality. But we will not accept the arrogant and interventionist policies of this administration," nor will the United States win concessions on Cuba's domestic political model. A few days later, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs Thomas Shannon responded in kind. Washington, he said, would consider lifting its embargo -- but only if Cuba established a route to multiparty democracy, released all political prisoners, and allowed independent civil-society organizations. With or without Fidel, the two governments were stuck where they have been for years: Havana ready to talk about everything except the one condition on which Washington will not budge, Washington offering something Havana does not unconditionally want in exchange for something it is not willing to give.

From Washington's perspective, this paralysis may seem only temporary. Shannon compared post-Fidel Cuba to a helicopter with a broken rotor -- the implication being that a crash is imminent. But that view, pervasive among U.S. policymakers, ignores the uncomfortable truth about Cuba under the Castro regime. Despite Fidel's overwhelming personal authority and Raúl's critical institution-building abilities, the government rests on far more than just the charisma, authority, and legend of these two figures.

POLITICALLY INCORRECT

Cuba is far from a multiparty democracy, but it is a functioning country with highly opinionated citizens where locally elected officials (albeit all from one party) worry about issues such as garbage collection, public transportation, employment, education, health care, and safety. Although plagued by worsening corruption, Cuban institutions are staffed by an educated civil service, battle-tested military officers, a capable diplomatic corps, and a skilled work force. Cuban citizens are highly literate, cosmopolitan, endlessly entrepreneurial, and by global standards quite healthy.

Critics of the Castro regime cringe at such depictions and have worked hard to focus Washington and the world's attention on human rights abuses, political prisoners, and economic and political deprivations. Although those concerns are legitimate, they do not make up for an unwillingness to understand the sources of Fidel's legitimacy -- or the features of the status quo that will sustain Raúl and the collective leadership now in place. On a trip to Cuba in November, I spoke with a host of senior officials, foreign diplomats, intellectuals, and regime critics to get a sense of how those on the ground see the island's future. (I have traveled to Cuba nearly 30 times since 1984 and met with everyone from Fidel himself to human rights activists and political prisoners.) People at all levels of the Cuban government and the Communist Party were enormously confident of the regime's ability to survive Fidel's passing. In and out of government circles, critics and supporters alike -- including in the state-run press -- readily acknowledge major problems with productivity and the delivery of goods and services. But the regime's still-viable entitlement programs and a widespread sense that Raúl is the right man to confront corruption and bring accountable governance give the current leadership more legitimacy than it could possibly derive from repression alone (the usual explanation foreigners give for the regime's staying power).

The regime's continued defiance of the United States also helps. In Cuba's national narrative, outside powers -- whether Spain in the nineteenth century or the United States in the twentieth -- have preyed on Cuba's internal division to dominate Cuban politics. Revolutionary ideology emphasizes this history of thwarted independence and imperialist meddling, from the Spanish-American War to the Bay of Pigs, to sustain a national consensus. Unity at home, the message goes, is the best defense against the only external power Cuba still regards as a threat -- the United States.

To give Cubans a stake in this tradeoff between an open society and sovereign nationhood, the revolution built social, educational, and health programs that remain the envy of the developing world. Public education became accessible to the entire population, allowing older generations of illiterate peasants to watch their children and grandchildren become doctors and scientists; by 1979, Cuba's literacy rates had risen above 90 percent. Life expectancy went from under 60 years at the time of the revolution to almost 80 today (virtually identical to life expectancy in the United States). Although infectious disease levels have been historically lower in Cuba than in many parts of Latin America, the revolutionary government's public vaccination programs completely eliminated polio, diphtheria, tetanus, meningitis, and measles. In these ways, the Cuban state truly has served the poor underclass rather than catering to the domestic elite and its American allies.

Foreign policy, meanwhile, put the island on the map geopolitically. The Cubans used the Soviets (who regarded the brash young revolutionaries as reckless) for money, weapons, and insulation from their implacable enemy to the north. Although the government's repression of dissent and tight control over the economy drove many out of the country and turned many others against the Castro regime, most Cubans came to expect the state to guarantee their welfare, deliver the international standing they regard as their cultural and historical destiny, and keep the United States at a healthy distance.

The end of the Cold War seriously threatened this status quo. The Soviet Union withdrew its $4 billion annual subsidy, and the economy contracted by 35 percent overnight. Cuba's political elite recognized that without Soviet support, the survival of the revolutionary regime was in peril -- and, with Fidel's reluctant acquiescence, fashioned a pragmatic response to save it. Cuban officials traveling abroad started using once-anathema terms, such as "civil society." Proposals were circulated to include multiple candidates (although all from the Communist Party) in National Assembly elections and to permit small private businesses. The government legalized self-employment in some 200 service trades, converted state farms to collectively owned cooperatives, and allowed the opening of small farmers' markets. At Raúl's instigation, state enterprises adopted capitalist accounting and business practices; some managers were sent to European business schools. As the notion of a "socialist enterprise" became increasingly unsustainable, words like "market," "efficiency," "ownership," "property," and "competition" began to crop up with ever more frequency in the state-controlled press and in public-policy debates. Foreign investment from Europe, Latin America, Canada, China, and Israel gave a boost to agriculture and the tourism, mining, telecommunications, pharmaceutical, biotechnology, and oil industries.

These changes rendered Cuba almost unrecognizable compared with the Cuba of the Soviet era, but they also allowed Fidel's government to regain its footing. The economy began to recover, and health and educational programs started to deliver again. By the end of the 1990s, Cuba's infant mortality rate (approximately six deaths per 100,000 births) had dropped below that of the United States, and close to 100 percent of children were enrolled in school full time through ninth grade. Housing, although deteriorating and in desperate need of modernization, remained virtually free. And a cosmopolitan society -- albeit one controlled in many ways by the state -- grew increasingly connected to the world through cultural exchanges, sporting events, scientific cooperation, health programs, technology, trade, and diplomacy. Moreover, by 2002, total remittance inflows reached $1 billion, and nearly half of the Cuban population had access to dollars from family abroad.

In 2004, a process of "recentralization" began: the state replaced the dollar with a convertible currency, stepped up tax collection from the self-employed sector, and imposed stricter controls on revenue expenditures by state enterprises. But even with these controls over economic activity, the black market is everywhere. Official salaries are never enough to make ends meet, and the economy has become a hybrid of control, chaos, and free-for-all. The rules of the game are established and broken at every turn, and most Cubans have to violate some law to get by. The administrators of state enterprises steal and then sell the inputs they get from the government, forcing workers to purchase themselves the supplies they need to do their jobs -- rubber for the shoemaker, drinking glasses for the bartender, cooking oil for the chef -- in order to fill production quotas.

At the same time, the revolution's investment in human capital has made Cuba uniquely well positioned to take advantage of the global economy. In fact, the island faces an overcapacity of professional and scientific talent, since it lacks the industrial base and foreign investment necessary to create a large number of productive skilled jobs. With 10,000 students in its science and technology university and already successful joint pharmaceutical ventures with China and Malaysia, Cuba is poised to compete with the upper ranks of developing nations.

STRAITS JACKET

The last potential turning point in U.S.-Cuban relations came with the end of the Cold War. Cubans greeted the fall of the Berlin Wall with a collective sigh of relief; it was, they thought, an opportunity to explore the kind of society Cuba might become once it could no longer depend on the Soviet Union. But over the next decade and a half, U.S. policymakers -- hobbled by domestic politics and a fundamental misunderstanding of the reality on the island -- missed opportunity after opportunity to bring decades of enmity to a close.

Instead of allowing debates about reform to take their natural course in Cuba, Washington jumped on the chance to, as Bill Clinton put it in the 1992 presidential campaign, "bring the hammer down" on Fidel. Congress passed and Clinton signed the Cuban Democracy Act, which, among other things, barred foreign subsidiaries of U.S. companies from trading with Cuba and ships traveling from Cuban ports from docking in the United States. Havana reacted with predictable outrage, condemning U.S. imperial designs in dramatic public protests. More important, some reform proposals were put on hold -- lest the slightest crack in Cuba's armor open the way to U.S.-backed counterrevolution. National security trumped everything else.

The next decade saw a series of half steps forward followed by large steps back. Hoping to learn more about the island while driving a wedge between its people and its government, the Clinton administration began to allow licensed travel to Cuba for academic purposes and for the sake of lending "support to the Cuban people." It also embraced a policy of "calibrated response": as Cuba changed, U.S. policy would as well. Without ever relating them to U.S. gestures, Cuba did undertake some important (and largely unreciprocated) reforms, loosening restrictions on family and some professional travel, relaxing residency requirements for writers and artists, and continuing the economic openings. And when 40,000 rafters left for U.S. shores in 1994, after a summer of brutal heat and electricity and food shortages in Havana, U.S. and Cuban officials began secret negotiations in Canada. The result was unprecedented cooperation on migration issues -- Washington would provide 20,000 visas to Cubans a year, and the U.S. Coast Guard would send Cubans picked up at sea to the U.S. naval base at Guantánamo Bay -- and a degree of official and people-to-people contact unknown since a brief opening under Jimmy Carter.

But these tentative steps, bitterly resisted by exiles who feared a slippery slope toward full-blown U.S.-Cuban relations, were soon thwarted. In February 1996, the Cuban air force shot down two planes being flown in the area by an exile group called Brothers to the Rescue. Led by a Bay of Pigs veteran, the group would make surveillance flights over the florida Straits (to inform the U.S. Coast Guard of rafters) and occasionally drop anti-Castro pamphlets over Havana from Cessnas bought at Pentagon tag sales. Sometimes, U.S. officials would join the flights. Havana had repeatedly warned Washington that the flights would not be tolerated, but the shootdown nonetheless resulted in swift congressional retaliation -- in the form of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidary Act, better known as Helms-Burton.

Helms-Burton took the U.S. embargo to new extremes. It attempted to halt all foreign investment in Cuba by allowing investors to be sued in U.S. courts. It mandated that future presidents could lift the embargo only if Cuba complied with a number of conditions, including holding multiparty elections, recognizing private property, and releasing all political prisoners. And it stipulated that any future change in U.S. policy would depend on Fidel and Raúl Castro -- along, implicitly, with other senior officials in the military and the Communist Party -- leaving politics altogether.

The Cuban regime responded with its own hard line. Raúl, although a leading advocate of economic reform domestically, was an absolutist when it came to confronting the United States. Even as some liberalization continued, and a new Cuban constitution opened the way for a religious revival by allowing Communist Party members to practice openly, there was a government-wide purge of academics and intellectuals -- many of them party loyalists -- thought to be associated with the United States or U.S.-backed reforms. The message was chillingly clear: given a choice between national security and a more open society, the revolution would pick security every time.

In the wake of Helms-Burton, the Clinton administration worked to revive a series of goodwill initiatives. When Pope John Paul II visited Havana's jam-packed Revolution Square in 1999, he asked "the world to open to Cuba and Cuba to open to the world." His entreaty gave both Washington and Havana political cover to revive some momentum on improving relations. The countries' coast guards worked together on antidrug operations, and retired U.S. military commanders met with Fidel and Raúl. The Baltimore Orioles and the Cuban national baseball team played each other -- once in Baltimore, once in Havana -- and after the musicologist Ry Cooder released an album of traditional Cuban ballads, there was a "Buena Vista Social Club effect," with American artists, musicians, clergy, academics, students, businesspeople, and politicians flocking to Cuba in record numbers. Cuban Americans who had not returned to the island since leaving as small children visited for the first time, and then returned over and over, reconnecting with long-lost family members. A number of prominent Republicans, including former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and George Shultz, called for a bipartisan commission to undertake a full-scale review of U.S. policy toward Cuba.

But the day after Thanksgiving in 2000, progress was undermined once again -- this time by the arrival in southern florida of a six-year-old boy named Elián González. Elián had left Cuba with his mother, but she had died on the trip to the United States. At first, the Clinton administration was slow to take Elián from the custody of his relatives in florida and return him to his father in Cuba -- inflaming Cuban nationalism and inciting mass anti-U.S. protests in Havana. Then, when Attorney General Janet Reno ordered federal agents to seize Elián in a predawn raid and return him to his father, the exile community erupted. The incident not only ended the prospect of a further thawing in U.S.-Cuban relations; it also (at least absent a recount) helped tip the presidential election to George W. Bush, who defeated Al Gore in florida by a few hundred votes.

Like most aspiring presidents casting around for votes, candidate Bush had promised to end the Castro regime. But it was not until the September 11 attacks, and the administration's newfound attention to democracy promotion and rogue regimes, that U.S. Cuba policy took a decidedly more aggressive turn. Bush's first-term Latin America team (many of whose members had either helped write or lobbied for Helms-Burton) rejected any business or security cooperation with Havana and encouraged speculation that Cuba was developing bioweapons for export to rogue regimes or use against the United States. (Those allegations, not surprisingly, withered under closer scrutiny.) By the end of its first term, the Bush administration had upended virtually all initiatives, official and unofficial, for improving relations. It ended the bilateral talks on migration. It stopped approving most medical sales, made legal travel to Cuba difficult for all but faith-based groups and some academics, and cut off visas for Cuban academics and artists. And it almost entirely barred Cuban Americans, who lean strongly Republican, from visiting or sending money to Cuba. Only sales of U.S. agricultural products, because they were explicitly allowed by Congress, escaped the crackdown.

INFIDELITY

Although the George H. W. Bush administration ended covert efforts to topple Fidel, the United States today spends about $35 million a year on initiatives described by some as "democracy promotion" and by others as "destabilization." Radio Martí and tv Martí broadcast from florida to Cuba; other U.S. government programs are intended to support dissidents, the families of political prisoners, human rights activists, and independent journalists. Although some Cubans do listen to Radio Martí, the Cuban government blocks the tv Martí signal, and without open ties between the countries, only a fraction of the support actually reaches Cubans living on the island; the lion's share is distributed through no-bid contracts to the anti-Castro cottage industry that has sprung up in Miami, Madrid, and a few Latin American and eastern European capitals. The recipients of such federal largess -- along with the Cuban intelligence agents that routinely penetrate the groups they form -- have become the primary stakeholders in Washington's well-funded, if obviously ineffective, policy toward Cuba.

On the ground in Cuba, moreover, these efforts are generally counterproductive. U.S. economic sanctions have given Cuba's leaders justification for controlling the pace of the island's insertion into the world economy. The perception, pervasive in Cuba, that the United States and the Cuban diaspora are plotting regime change further strengthens domestic hard-liners who argue that only a closed political model with minimal market openings can insulate the island from domination by a foreign power allied with old-money elites. Dissidents who openly associate with U.S. policy and its advocates in Miami or the U.S. Congress mark themselves as stooges of the United States, even if they are not. Moreover, the Cuban government has successfully undermined both the domestic and the international legitimacy of dissidents by "outing" some as sources, assets, or agents of the United States (or of Cuba's own intelligence services). The 2003 arrest and incarceration of 75 dissidents was intended to demonstrate that Cuba could and would preempt outside efforts at regime change regardless of the consequent international outcry and U.S. congressional rebuke.

There are some genuine dissidents in Cuba untainted by either government and not weakened by infighting. One, Oswaldo Payá, is a devout Catholic who heads the Varela Project, which collected more than 11,000 signatures in 2002 for a petition calling on the Cuban government to hold a referendum on open elections, free speech, free enterprise, and the release of political prisoners. Yet it is only by resisting the embrace of the international community, and of the United States in particular, that Payá has maintained his credibility and autonomy. Meanwhile, below the radar screen (and throughout officially sanctioned Cuban institutions), there are scores of thoughtful nationalists, communists, socialists, social democrats, and progressives who may not yet have the political space to air their views publicly but who express dissent in terms that U.S. policymakers either do not recognize or do not support.

The upshot of a half century of hostility -- especially now with ties severed almost entirely -- is that Washington has virtually no leverage over events in Cuba. With no other way to make good on its campaign commitments to Cuban Americans short of a full-scale invasion, the Bush administration established the Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba in 2003 and appointed a "Cuba transition coordinator" in 2004. To date, the commission, the membership and deliberations of which have been kept secret, has issued two reports, totaling over 600 pages, on what kind of assistance the U.S. government could, "if requested," provide to a transitional government in Cuba.

The basic assumption behind the commission's planning is that with outside assistance, Cuba's transition will be a hybrid of those in eastern Europe, South Africa, and Chile. Those analogies and the policy prescriptions derived from them do not hold up. Unlike Eastern Europeans in the 1980s, Cubans, though enthusiasts of American culture and dynamism, regard Washington not as a beacon of freedom against tyranny but as an imperialist oppressor that has helped justify domestic repression. (Moreover, the United States had actively promoted travel, commerce, and cultural ties with the Soviet bloc before the transitions there began.) In the case of South Africa, the sanctions that helped topple the apartheid regime were successful because they were, in contrast to the unilateral U.S. embargo on Cuba, international in scope. And in Chile, the U.S. government was able to ease Augusto Pinochet out of power only because it had staunchly supported him for so long.

The second feature of Washington's vision for post-Fidel Cuba is more dangerous than a bad analogy. The Bush administration has made clear that its top priority is to interrupt the Castro regime's succession plans. The Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba report released just before Fidel underwent intestinal surgery in July states, "The only acceptable result of Fidel Castro's incapacitation, death, or ouster is a genuine democratic transition. ... In order to undermine the regime's succession strategy, it is critical that the U.S. government maintain economic pressure on the regime."

Since the 2003 war in Iraq, Cubans have closely observed the effects of de-Baathification there. Like membership in Iraq's Baath Party under Saddam Hussein, membership in the Cuban Communist Party is a ticket to professional advancement for devout believers and agnostic opportunists alike. Party members include sophisticated intellectuals, reform-minded economists, clergy, brash up-and-coming youth leaders, scientists, professors, military officers, bureaucrats, police officers, and businesspeople in the "revenue-earning sectors" of the economy. In short, it is impossible to know who among the roughly million party members (and 500,000 members of the Union of Communist Youth) is a real fidelista or raulista. Purging party members would leave the country without the skilled individuals it will need after Fidel, whatever the pace of change. And should the United States, or a government that Washington deems adequately transitional, ever be in a position to orchestrate such a purge, it would then face an insurgency of highly trained militias galvanized by anti-American nationalism.

One encouraging development is that the Cuban American community is no longer of one mind with respect to Cuba's future and its role in it. For decades, a vocal minority of hard-line exiles -- some of whom have directly or indirectly advocated violence or terrorism to overthrow Fidel -- have had a lock on Washington's Cuba policy. But Cuban Americans who came to the United States as young children are less passionate and single-minded as voters than their parents and grandparents, and the almost 300,000 migrants who have arrived since 1994 are generally most concerned with paying bills and supporting their families on the island. Now, the majority of Cuban Americans, although still anti-Castro, recognize that the embargo has failed and want to sustain family and humanitarian ties without completely eliminating sanctions. Overall, many want reconciliation rather than revenge.

The State Department is starting to recognize these changes, and many members of Congress must now answer to constituents from other Latin American countries who resent the outsized influence of Cuban Americans. But the hard-liners and their allies in Washington will continue to fight any proposed policy overhaul. They worry that if Washington adopts a more realistic approach to the island, the policy train will bypass Miami and head straight for Havana -- and they will have lost their influence at the moment when it matters most.

WASHINGTON'S MOVE

Even with the economy growing and new public-sector investment in transportation, energy, education, health care, and housing, Cubans today are deeply frustrated by the rigors of just making ends meet. They are eager for more democratic participation and economic opportunity. But they also recognize that Cuba's social, economic, and political models will change only gradually, and that such reform will be orchestrated by those whom Fidel has long been grooming to replace him. Washington, too, must accept that there is no alternative to those already running post-Fidel Cuba.

From the perspective of Fidel's chosen successors, the transition comes in a particularly favorable international context. Despite Washington's assiduous efforts, Cuba is far from isolated: it has diplomatic relations with more than 160 countries, students from nearly 100 studying in its schools, and its doctors stationed in 69. The resurgence of Latin America's left, along with the recent rise in anti-American sentiment around the globe, makes Cuba's defiance of the United States even more compelling and less anomalous than it was just after the Cold War. The Cuban-Venezuelan relationship, based on a shared critique of U.S. power, imperialism, and "savage capitalism," has particular symbolic power. Although this alliance is hardly permanent, and American observers often make too much of Venezuela's influence as a power broker, it does deliver Cuba some $2 billion in subsidized oil a year and provide an export market for Cuba's surfeit of doctors and technical advisers. (By providing the backbone for Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's social programs and assistance in building functional organizations, Havana exercises more influence in Venezuela than Caracas does in Cuba.) Havana, without ceding any authority to Chávez, will optimize this relationship as long as it remains beneficial.

Nor is Venezuela the only country that will resist U.S. efforts to dominate post-Fidel Cuba and purge the country of Fidel's revolutionary legacy. Latin Americans, still deeply nationalistic, have long viewed Fidel as a force for social justice and a necessary check on U.S. influence. As attendance at his funeral will demonstrate, he remains an icon. Latin Americans of diverse ideological stripes, most of them deeply committed to democracy in their own countries, want to see a soft landing in Cuba -- not the violence and chaos that they believe U.S. policy will bring. Given their own failures in the 1990s to translate engagement with Cuba into democratization, and the United States' current credibility problems on this score, it is unlikely that U.S. allies in Latin America or Europe will help Washington use some sort of international initiative to advance its desires for radical change in Cuba.

When Fidel dies, various actors in the United States and the international community will rush to issue and, if they get their way, enforce a series of demands: hold a referendum and multiparty elections, immediately release all political prisoners, return nationalized property and compensate former owners, rewrite the constitution, allow a free press, privatize state companies -- in short, become a country Cuba has never been, even before the revolution. Many of those goals would be desirable if you were inventing a country from scratch. Few of them are now realistic.

After Fidel's funeral, a "transition" government of the sort Washington is hoping for will not occupy the presidential palace in Havana. This means that the White House cannot responsibly wait for the happy day when the outlines of its commission reports can be put to the test. Instead, the current administration should immediately start talking to the senior Cuban leadership. Recognizing that Cuba and the United States share an interest in stability on both sides of the florida Straits, the first priority is to coordinate efforts to prevent a refugee crisis or unforeseen provocations by U.S.-based exile groups eager to exploit a moment of change on the island. Beyond crisis management, Washington and Havana can cooperate on a host of other concerns in the Caribbean Basin, including drug trafficking, migration, customs and port security, terrorism, and the environmental consequences of offshore drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. The two countries have successfully worked on some of these issues in the past: each has bureaucracies staffed by professionals who know the issues, and even know one another. An end to Washington's travel ban, a move already backed by bipartisan majorities in the House of Representatives, would further open the way to a new dynamic between the United States and Cuba. Just as the first Bush White House formally ended covert operations on the island, this Bush administration or its successor should also affirmatively take regime change, long the centerpiece of Washington's policy toward Cuba, off the table.

By continuing the current course and making threats about what kind of change is and is not acceptable after Fidel, Washington will only slow the pace of liberalization and political reform in Cuba and guarantee many more years of hostility between the two countries. By proposing bilateral crisis management and confidence-building measures, ending economic sanctions, stepping out of the way of Cuban Americans and other Americans who wish to travel freely to Cuba, and giving Cuba the space to chart its own course after Fidel, Washington would help end the siege mentality that has long pervaded the Cuban body politic and, with the applause of U.S. allies, perhaps help accelerate reform. Cubans on and off the island have always battled over its fate -- and attempted to draw American might into their conflicts, directly or indirectly. Lest the next 50 years bring more of the same, the wisest course for Washington is to get out of the way, removing itself from Cuba's domestic politics altogether.

Fidel's successors are already at work. Behind Raúl are a number of other figures with the capacity and the authority to take the reins and continue the transition, even after Raúl is gone. Fortunately for them, Fidel has taught them well: they are working to consolidate the new government, deliver on bread-and-butter issues, devise a model of reform with Cuban characteristics, sustain Cuba's position in Latin America and internationally, and manage the predictable policies of the United States. That these achievements will endure past Fidel's death is one final victory for the ultimate Latin American survivor.

Gen. Pinochet Suffers Heart Attack (AP)

By Eduardo Gallardo, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

Former dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was hospitalized early Sunday after suffering a heart attack and is in serious but stable condition, the Santiago Military Hospital said.

The 91-year-old retired general, who has been under house arrest, was rushed to the hospital after suffering "an acute" heart attack, the hospital said in a statement. "His condition is serious but stable."

The brief statement said Pinochet was at the hospital's emergency room undergoing treatment.

Pinochet, who ruled from 1973 until 1990, was taken to the hospital from his suburban Santiago residence.

Pinochet's spokesman, retired Gen. Guilleremo Garin, said the former strongman was undergoing "thorough medical tests. It's a heart condition. That's all we know now."

Pinochet's health has deteriorated gradually in recent years. He has used a pacemaker for several years and was diagnosed with mild dementia caused by several strokes. He also suffers from diabetes and arthritis.

The former dictator's failing health has helped him escape punishment for human rights abuses committed during his regime, with courts ruling his condition prevented from standing trail in at least two cases in recent years.

But last week, Pinochet was indicted and ordered to remain under house arrest for the execution of two bodyguards of Salvador Allende, the freely elected Marxist president who was toppled in the 1973 coup.

The indictment came after Pinochet's 91st birthday on Nov. 25, which he marked by issuing a statement for the first time taking full political — though not explicitly legal — responsibility for abuses committed by his regime.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all and that I take political responsibility for everything that was done which had no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration," he said at the time.

The recent house arrest is the fifth such action taken against Pinochet on charges stemming from human rights violations during his dictatorship.

The indictment alleges kidnapping and homicide in connection with the deaths of two Allende bodyguards who were arrested the day of the coup, Sept. 11, 1973. Both were executed by firing squad four weeks later, the military regime announced at the time.

Pinochet faces two other indictments — another in connection to human rights abuses and one on tax charges.

According to an official report prepared by an independent commission appointed by the first civilian government after Pinochet's rule, 3,197 people were killed for political reasons during his regime and more than 1,000 of them were "disappeared."

Venezuela's Economic Boom Buoys Chávez's Campaign (NYT)

By Simon Romero

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 2 — To understand why Hugo Chávez seems set for victory in Sunday's presidential election and a strengthened mandate for what he calls a socialist revolution, consider the vigor here of that most capitalist of institutions: the stock exchange.

Housed in El Rosal, an upscale district with new skyscrapers and hotels, the 59-year-old Caracas stock exchange was the site of frenzied trading this week. Its main index climbed to a record high of 46,741, topping off a 129.2 percent rise this year that has made it one of the best performing markets in the world. On Friday, the index climbed 8 percent for its biggest daily gain in four years.

"For all of Chávez's faults, his government has been extremely pragmatic in economic terms," said José Guerra, a former chief of economic research at Venezuela's central bank. "State-supported capitalism isn't just surviving under Chávez," he said. "It is thriving."

Often lost in the campaigning between Mr. Chávez and his electoral challenger, Manuel Rosales, is that Venezuela, with the largest conventional petroleum reserves outside the Middle East, is having one of the most significant oil booms in its history. Economic growth this year is set to pass 10 percent, making Venezuela the fastest-growing economy in the Americas.

The Chávez government, while wrapping itself in socialist imagery — like red clothing — and deepening its alliance with Fidel Castro's Cuba, has made this expansion possible by quietly working with Venezuela's banking system. The rush of petrodollars into the economy has led bank deposits to climb 84 percent in the past 12 months, according to Softline Consultores, a financial consulting business here.

The boom is evident in an economy that has put financial speculation and conspicuous consumption ahead of domestic manufacturing. For instance, foreign automobile companies Ford and General Motors will sell 300,000 cars in the country this year. Economists describe Venezuela as a "harbor economy" because of its lust for imported goods.

"Many people say we're in a profound political and social crisis," said Michael Penfold-Becerra, an economist at the Institute of Higher Administrative Studies, a Caracas business school. "On the contrary, we've returned to a temporary period of harmony. Oil is buying us a certain social peace and stability."

Neither candidate in Sunday's election seems to acknowledge the growing consumerism in rich and poor households as one of the main reasons Mr. Chávez has resilient popularity ratings after eight years as president. Most opinion polls give him a double-digit lead over Mr. Rosales, governor of the oil-producing Zulia State in the west.

Mr. Chávez makes frequent exhortations in favor of socialism, sometimes describing Jesus Christ as the first socialist and Judas as the first capitalist. Mr. Rosales said in an interview that Mr. Chávez, who has deepened ties with Cuba by bringing thousands of Cuban doctors to Venezuela in exchange for subsidized oil, was "implementing a Castro-style system of autocratic rule in Venezuela."

While Mr. Chávez promises socialism, historians say that in effect he is delivering old-fashioned populism. He is often compared to Carlos Andrés Pérez, the populist president who oversaw economic expansion in the 1970s when Venezuela also benefited from higher oil prices.

"Chávez has a problem in that what he calls his socialist revolution never involved the overthrow of a dictator like Batista or Somoza," said Alberto Barrera Tyszka, who co-wrote an acclaimed biography of Mr. Chávez. "He's redefining socialism as a concept that could exist only in Venezuela, where it is characterized by hatred of George Bush and an excess of BMWs and Audis."

Some Chávez economic policies draw inspiration from formulas used with mixed results by countries in the developing and industrialized worlds the 1960s and 1970s. These include price controls for food and gasoline, strict limits on buying and selling foreign currency and caps on everything from lending rates at banks to hourly fees at parking lots.

At the same time, the government has channeled billions of dollars in oil revenues into social welfare programs and small cooperatives intended to produce goods to replace imports on the domestic market. The government says these efforts are moving Venezuela toward a vaguely defined "21st-century socialism."

Oil is at the heart of this development model. Venezuela, in contrast to oil-exporting countries like Mexico or Saudi Arabia that tightly circumscribe the operations of foreign oil companies, still produces oil in ventures with some of the largest private energy companies, including Chevron and Royal Dutch Shell. And the government works closely with Venezuelan and foreign banks to maintain economic stability.

Unlike Rafael Correa, the newly elected president of Ecuador, who plans to renegotiate the foreign debt, Mr. Chávez has made every effort to meet Venezuela's obligations with foreign lenders. As a result, markets still consider Venezuelan bonds about as safe an investment as bonds issued by Brazil, a neighboring industrial powerhouse.

The Finance Ministry, meanwhile, has tolerated loopholes for the moneyed classes to circumvent foreign exchange controls by allowing them to buy stocks and bonds that can be exchanged for securities denominated in dollars. Critics of this system say it has allowed a new elite to emerge through opaque dealings with the government.

Fernando Coronil, a Venezuelan historian at the University of Michigan, said Mr. Chávez's policies were reminiscent of the heady years after World War II when Democratic Action, a social democratic party, swept into power on a platform that emphasized distributing oil wealth to the poor. Leaders even called their movement the October Revolution, though populist rule in Venezuela eventually became characterized by a lack of transparency in the distribution of favors through the state.

While earlier booms revolved around huge investments in industrial projects like aluminum smelters, analysts say the latest expansion is especially risky because it focuses mainly on consumption.

Despite boasting of some of South America's most fertile land in an area the size of Texas and Oklahoma combined, Venezuela still imports more than half its food, largely from the United States and Colombia. An overvalued currency, meanwhile, has been disastrous for Venezuelan industry with the number of manufacturing companies falling to about 8,000 today from 17,000 in 1998, according to Mr. Guerra, the former economist at the central bank.

With Chavez, Some Venezuelan Entrepreneurs See Opportunity (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 2 -- Venezuela's business establishment often warns that if President Hugo Chavez wins reelection Sunday, it won't take long before the populist firebrand transforms Venezuela into a communist state, dooming its oil-rich economy. Alejandro Uscategui, an industrialist here, couldn't disagree more.

Overseeing a variety of companies, Uscategui is among a growing number of business leaders who reject the doom-and-gloom scenario and see something else entirely in Venezuela's free-spending government: opportunity.

"We think President Hugo Chavez has done a very good job," said Uscategui, president of an association, Entrepreneurs for Venezuela, that is closely allied with the government. "Here there has been incredible growth in companies. There are businesses that close, sure, but they don't close because of Ch?vez."

Eight years into what Chavez calls "21st century socialism," Venezuela's economy has evolved into one marked by contradictions: the highest growth rate in the Americas and grinding underemployment, out-of-control consumerism and a lack of investment, troubling uncertainty and golden prospects.

The economy is expected to expand by more than 8 percent this year, the highest rate in South America. Gross domestic product has shot up from about $92 billion in 2002 to a projected $170 billion this year. The torrent of oil revenue filters down to companies and consumers, who are on a buying binge for luxury cars, penthouse apartments and 48-inch plasma television sets.

It is also a country where foreign investment has collapsed, falling from $5.6 billion in 1997 to a projected negative outflow of $2.7 billion this year, according to calculations by Tamara Herrera, an economist with LatinSource, a New York-based group of Latin American economists. The economy is unable to create enough jobs for those entering the workforce, and inflation, at 15 percent, is among the highest in Latin America.

In a foreshadowing of possible trouble, the price of oil has experienced a four-month slide that recently dropped the Venezuelan barrel below $50, about as low as the government wants to go.

"The data continues to shine, but behind it in our opinion are serious problems of sustainability, and of the possibility of stagnation," said Herrera, also chief economist of Sintesis Financiera, a consulting firm in Caracas. "Behind these numbers are a huge dependence on oil, more than we've ever seen."

The question now is where Chavez will take this country of 26 million should he win another six-year term, as the majority of public opinion polls predict. His promise to further consolidate his revolution would surely mean more state control over the private sector, the creation of hundreds, if not thousands, of state cooperatives and the founding of more state-owned companies. If the price of oil holds, billions more would be funneled into social programs.

"Socialism is the only path that will permit us to save the human being, the human species," Chavez said in a recent speech. "Capitalism is the path to the destruction of the world, the destruction of the human being. Capitalism is the path to the destruction of life."

Capitalism, though, along with Venezuela's state spending, seems to have been very good to a new class of entrepreneurs in Venezuela who have either allied themselves with the government or found a way to have a cordial relationship. Many of them have secured lucrative government contracts, and the opposition has dubbed them the Boliburguesia, short for the Bolivarian bourgeoisie.

"Ninety percent of those businessmen are there because they give them the money to be businessmen," said Flavio Fridegotto, owner of a national chain of hardware stores and a leader in Fedecamaras, the nation's largest business association. "They are there because they are opportunists."

Fridegotto is referring to such people as Majed Khalil, a son of Lebanese immigrants who runs a variety of companies. Eveba cans tuna. Hardwell sells and services computers and software and has a contract to provide schools with technology. His companies provide equipment such as taxiway lights to airports, and he now has a contract to work on the construction of an electrical plant.

"With the government opening up, you see offers and opportunities where you can do business," Khalil said in an interview in his office. "Past governments have never invested like this government."

Uscategui, the head of Entrepreneurs for Venezuela, or Empreven, said he and other business leaders close to the government want to replace Fedecamaras as the main business chamber. Those allied with Chavez will never forget that it was the president of Fedecamaras, Pedro Carmona, who in 2002 became interim president in what turned out to be an ill-fated effort to oust Ch?vez.

Sitting in his office, next to a table of pharmaceutical products he hopes to sell to government clinics, Uscategui talks of being committed to the "idea of social capitalism" and warns of business people who "want to exploit Venezuela's riches and go live elsewhere."

"We defend the private property, we defend businessmen, we defend credits," Uscategui said. "Our difference is we don't aspire to political power, we don't question Ch?vez."

Uscategui says altruism motivates him, but he exudes astute self-interest, crucial to survive in Venezuela's topsy-turvy economy. Unlike those who supported the failed coup, and a disastrous national oil strike that lasted two months, Uscategui stuck with the government.

He soon found himself invited to business gatherings, where he would be seated next to Ch?vez. "The business sector has advanced," he said with assurance. "It has not gone to elites."

Alberto Vollmer, 38, who runs Santa Teresa Rum, a distiller that is one of Venezuela's most storied companies, is among those who is admittedly from the traditional upper class. He lost a third of the 7,400 acres that made up his farm to land invaders, but he did not lash back.

He instead started working closely with the government to implement social programs in the poor barrios nearby. "There are mistakes this government has made and is making, but if you don't have a constructive attitude, you won't get anything done," he said. Vollmer has, to be sure, drawn the ire of some entrepreneurs for working with the government.

"For some of my friends, it's very hard to understand that I get along with Ch?vez," he said. "It doesn't mean I agree with 100 percent of their ideas."

Vollmer is far from being a confidant of the president. He rattles off deep concerns, such as that Venezuela is repeating a disastrous error from the 1970s -- spending oil revenue wildly without creating a climate for solid non-oil investment.

Many economists agree. Domingo Maza Zavala, a director of the Venezuelan Central Bank, said the economy needs to create 1.5 million jobs but cannot do so without huge private investments. "Private investment needs a stable climate, a climate of tranquility, a climate of institutional security," he said.

The government, though, appears intent on spending -- and confident that the price of oil will remain high.

The government's 2007 budget will be 32 percent higher than this year's, according to the National Assembly, which used a cautious projected average oil price of $29 a barrel. "Rather than cut spending, we're encouraged that capital investment is increasing, and that will boost the country's production," the planning minister, Jorge Giordani, said this week.

Alberto Cudemus, 62, who owns a hog butchering and packing company, said he agrees with much of what the government is doing.

On the surface, he is like many of his colleagues at Fedecamaras, where he heads a chamber representing pork producers. He wears a suit, is trim from daily exercise and speaks English and Dutch fluently.

But though he has some misgivings, he said government policies, such as making loans cheap and accessible, have helped reawaken the private sector.

"There are many positive things happening," he said. "I don't think everything is positive. But enough positive things are happening to give me confidence."

Adios Is Not In Chavez's Plans (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — The United States had better get used to its Latin American nemesis, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. If, as expected, he wins reelection to a new six-year term today, he says he will seek a change in the constitution that would enable him to serve indefinitely.

As many as 14 million Venezuelans will go to the polls to choose between Chavez and Manuel Rosales, the scrappy governor of Zulia state. Rosales started his campaign late, but has fared better than many expected in re-energizing a badly fragmented, dispirited opposition. Still, surveys show Chavez ahead by margins ranging from 4 to 22 percentage points.

Rosales' only hope of victory lies in capturing large numbers of undecided voters.

Many U.S. citizens know Chavez for his diatribes against President Bush. But the key to his support lies in the redistribution of Venezuela's immense oil windfall. He now is spending a third of Venezuela's annual $130 billion in economic output on social outreach, public works and food and housing subsidies, and he is expected to reap the electoral dividends.

Chavez says he has added 4 million people to the payrolls since he took office, the vast majority through social outreach programs called "missions," worker-owned cooperatives and public works programs.

Those government-supported jobs could vanish with a decline in the price of oil, critics say, adding that private investment, industrial output and the creation of skilled jobs all have declined under Chavez's socialist policies.

"What we are seeing is state-led growth, very vulnerable in the medium and long term to a downturn in oil prices," said Michael Penfold, a political scientist at a graduate studies college here known by its Spanish initials IESA. "We are far more dependent on oil than 12 to 15 years ago, and that's what worries me."

But for now, the good times are rolling.

Whiskey and new car sales are at record highs, and polls show most Venezuelans generally feeling optimistic and happy with Chavez's stewardship, according to Datanalysis, a polling firm in Caracas, the capital. Fueled by public spending, the Venezuelan economy has grown at an annual rate of 10% for the last three years, said economist Francisco Vivancos of the University of Central Venezuela.

The country has emerged from an economic crisis after a strike by oil workers starting in late 2002 nearly brought crude exports to a halt. The strike followed the unsuccessful effort to oust Chavez in April 2002.

Despite the political problems between the two countries, Venezuela is the fourth-largest exporter of oil to the U.S.

If Chavez has a weakness among his supporters, it's widespread dissatisfaction with his foreign policy, which has included giveaways of oil to Cuba and other Caribbean nations; discounted heating oil to poor people in the United States; medical subsidies in Mexico and Central America; bond purchases in Argentina; and foreign aid to Bolivia.

Rosales, 53, has argued in his campaign that charity should begin and end at home.

A career politician, Rosales has said he would give poor Venezuelans a cash withdrawal card to directly access the nation's oil wealth. He would also expand the "missions," making them available to everyone.

Chavez's anti-U.S. rhetoric also rubs some of his supporters the wrong way, given familial and cultural ties to the United States.

At a Thursday news conference, Chavez unapologetically repeated his description of Bush made before the U.N. General Assembly in September. "Someone has to call the devil the devil," Chavez said with a shrug.

He said Thursday that if he wins today, he will call an assembly to make revisions to the constitution that would allow him to serve an unlimited number of terms. Without that change, Chavez would have to leave office at the end of a new term.

Although more than four-fifths of Venezuelans polled by Datanalysis last month said they were better off under Chavez's leadership, almost as many said the president should do more to fight crime, now among the worst in the hemisphere.

Retired policeman Hector Ortega of Caracas' poor Vargas section is among those who seem ready to look past any misgivings about Chavez because of his commitment to alleviating Venezuela's inequalities. "He speaks our language," Ortega said.

Chavez came to power with high expectations as a reformer in 1999, preceded by a two-decade period in which Venezuela's economy was second-to-last in Latin America, said Francisco Monaldi, also an IESA professor.

The president's popularity started to increase after the missions were launched in 2003 with the Mission Barrio Adentro, which offers free medical help in poor neighborhoods.

Critics accuse Chavez of packing the Supreme Court and the National Electoral Commission with supporters. But the opposition has sometimes made it easy. Opposition candidates boycotted congressional elections last year in a dispute over the vote-counting machines.

Chavez is getting credit for making today's election more transparent than those in the past, agreeing to the auditing of half the ballot boxes and allowing more than 1,000 foreign and national electoral observers.

The biggest fear, expressed by both Chavez and opposition leaders, is that the vote will be so close that neither side will accept defeat, which could lead to turmoil similar to what occurred in Mexico after this summer's disputed election.

Red Cross: Asia Storm Toll May Hit 700 (AP)

PADANG, Philippines (AP) — Hopes virtually vanished Sunday for finding survivors of typhoon-triggered mudslides that engulfed entire villages in the eastern Philippines, with the Red Cross fearing the death toll could reach 700.

The government's National Disaster Coordinating Center reported 309 bodies have been retrieved and 298 people remained missing three days after Typhoon Durian struck, triggering mudslides in worst-hit Albay province.

Sen. Richard Gordon, who heads the local Red Cross, said the death toll could easily reach 700 "on the low side," based on official casualty figures and reports his group obtained from mayors of devastated villages.

"There are many unidentified bodies, there could be a lot more hidden below. Whole families may have been wiped out," Gordon told The Associated Press by phone.

No survivors are known to have been pulled from the swampy land since the first hours after Durian blasted ashore Thursday with winds gusting up to 165 mph.

The storm affected 800,000 people, officials said.

The first funerals took place Saturday evening as bodies rapidly decomposed in the tropical heat.

All but two dozen of the deaths occurred in worst-hit Albay province, including 165 in the town of Guinobatan, swamped by floodwaters in the Mayon volcano's foothills, southeast of the capital Manila. Four other provinces reported fatalities, but accurate casualty figures were hard to come by, with the disaster's devastation so widespread and power and phone lines down.

In some places, rescue workers found only body parts.

"We need food, tents, water, body bags," Philippine National Red Cross official Andrew Nocon told DZMM radio Saturday. "We sent initially 300 bags, but we need more."

Houses along the Yawa River in Padang, about 7 miles from Legazpi, the capital of Albay province, were buried under 5 feet of mud, with only roofs protruding.

In Padang village, 28 bodies were recovered, said Luis Bello, the mayor's aide. Some of the bodies had been washed out to sea, then swept by currents to the shores of an adjacent town.

For nearly three hours late Thursday afternoon, mudslides ripped through Mayon's gullies, uprooting trees, flattening houses and swallowing people.

"Every corner of this province has been hit. It is a total devastation," Albay Gov. Fernando Gonzalez said. "Never before in the history have we seen water like this. Almost every residential area was flooded."

Australia conveyed its condolences through Ambassador Tony Hely to President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo and made an initial pledge of $780,000 in immediate humanitarian relief. Canada earlier donated $876,000, while Japan said it would send $173,000.

From Competitors To Trading Partners (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

KANO, Nigeria -- The pasta factory that Umar Sani Marshall's family owns on the outskirts of this ancient city had not churned out so much as a single piece of macaroni in more than a year. The other former titans among Kano's once-mighty manufacturers were doing no better, producing mostly cobwebs as the city's markets overflowed with cheap imports from China.

So last month Marshall, 30, tall and wiry with rectangular, silver-framed glasses and a goatee, decided to forsake his legacy as scion of one of Nigeria's leading industrial families. He strapped $5,000 to his waist and flew off to Asia in search of a new kind of fortune, built not on making goods but trading them.

By the time he returned 12 days later, Marshall had started a new business dealing cars and auto parts, as a middleman between Chinese suppliers and Nigerian consumers. Along the way, he said, he found the kinds of profits that long have eluded Kano's manufacturers, and he learned a few lessons about how to work with Chinese businesses instead of competing against them.

"When you go there with the intention of buying socks, you will come back with a jacket and hat" as well, Marshall said, smiling as he pretended to place a top hat on his head.

His shift, from manufacturing to trading, mirrors a broader one across Nigeria and much of Africa. A 30-year experiment in building local factory capacity has faltered with declining trade barriers and rising global competition, most powerfully from China. African business leaders increasingly are staking their fortunes on old-fashioned extractive industries, such as oil production needed to fuel Asian industry, while also attempting to profit from the flood of finished goods coming in return.

Although the model stirs memories of the kind of economic relationships once common between European powers and their vassal states here, Africans say the Chinese at least treat them as equals and invest in infrastructure projects key to the continent's future.

At a recent trade summit in Beijing, officials from 48 African nations met with Chinese leaders, who promised to double aid to Africa while offering $5 billion in new loans. Already Chinese firms have built dams, roads, railways, port upgrades, mining facilities and telecommunication systems in Africa.

A Chinese company at the summit announced an $8.3 billion project to build a railway connecting Kano to the port city of Lagos. It will be paid for out of Nigeria's oil revenue, which is burgeoning in part because of rising Chinese demand. Overall, Africa's trade with China rose from $10.6 billon in 2000 to almost $40 billion last year. Projections are that it could reach $100 billion by 2010.

Signs of China's growing prominence on the continent are easy to spot in Kano, a bustling, thousand-year-old city of 3.5 million people that long was a regular stopover for trade flowing through the Sahara, whose sandy southern edge is nearby. Now the city's gaze has shifted to the Far East, with Chinese restaurants spreading across the city, Chinese goods filling shops and a Chinese-owned shoe factory employing more than 2,000 workers, more than any other private employer in northern Nigeria.

A decade ago, the Marshall family's shortcake factory had a similar number of workers and a powerful market position throughout northern Nigeria and into neighboring Cameroon, Niger and beyond. It is now closed, along with the family's pasta factory, victims not so much of competition as of government policies that made it difficult to import durum semolina, a key ingredient, Marshall said.

Business leaders here say the decline of Kano's manufacturers resulted from an influx of Chinese products as trade restrictions fell. Chinese companies had more modern machinery, more reliable sources of electricity and easier access to capital, said Saidu Dattijo Adhama, owner of a textile factory whose payroll has dropped from 335 workers to 24. The raw cotton produced by Chinese farmers, meanwhile, was stronger and yielded more fabric per pound.

"Without a little protection, if the Chinese bring their finished cotton to Nigeria, you cannot compete with them," Adhama said. "The gap is so wide that if you just allow them to come in, you are killing Nigerian companies."

Fifteen years ago, 500 factories hummed with work in Kano, but fewer than 100 remain operational today, most at far less than full capacity, according to the city's Chamber of Commerce. Tens of thousands of jobs have been lost. Meanwhile, Kano's Kwari textile market, the biggest in West Africa, has swelled with stall after stall of Chinese fabrics and clothing.

Liti Kulkul, former chairman of the textile traders association here, estimated that a decade ago, 80 percent of the fabric sold at Kwari was made in Nigeria, compared with 5 percent now. Asian products, mostly from China, make up the rest.

"We have taken this path of neocolonialism," Kulkul said. "They have virtually crippled all aspects of our economy."

Yet others see China not as the ruin of Kano business but as a transformative force pushing the city back to its roots in trading. Beyond Kulkul's stall, which specialized in the colorful Nigerian prints long produced by local textile mills, the market buzzed with dealmaking.

Rows of shops overflowed with Asian-made air conditioners, televisions and DVD players. Beyond them, Kano's noisy, smoggy streets were jammed from curb to curb with Chinese-made motorcycle taxis that largely have replaced the aging stock of Italian-made Vespas, which cost three times more.

Chinese business "revived the economy," said Ahmed Rabiu, deputy president of the Chamber of Commerce. "Trading improved. Manufacturing went down. That's it."

Not everyone in Kano applauds the change. The motorcycle taxi drivers earn less than factory workers once did. And the growth in trade has not absorbed most of the workers laid off in the past decade. There are more beggars and other visible signs of poverty than ever before, residents say.

"We are very bitter that the factory closed down," said Ibrahim Garba, 50, who worked for the Marshall family's pasta factory for 25 years, earning enough to support his two wives, six children and six grandchildren.

Now, instead of going to the factory, where he operated a generator, he farms five dusty acres of corn, beans and millet, most of which he uses to feed his family, not to earn money. His income has plunged from about $50 to about $15 a month, Garba said.

But Marshall, with the education, capital and savvy to adjust to Kano's shifting business climate, is not complaining.

He met with Chinese businessmen in Singapore and quickly spent the $5,000 he brought and $15,000 more he had kept in reserve in Nigeria. In return, he got four used Honda cars and 1 1/2 shipping containers full of car parts. Used automotive products here are known as "Belgium" for the traditional source of many of them, but now most Belgium comes from Asia.

Marshall calculates that he can sell the cars and auto parts for $34,000, a profit of 70 percent on his investment.

"I'm going back next month, inshallah!" Marshall said, using a common phrase in the Muslim world that means "God willing." "More opportunity is coming."

A Blame Game China Needs To Stop (WP)

By Elizabeth Economy

Last month the International Energy Agency announced that China would probably surpass the United States as the world's largest contributor of the greenhouse gas carbon dioxide by 2009, more than a full decade earlier than anticipated. This forecast could spur China to adopt tough new energy and environmental standards, but it probably won't. China has already embarked on a very different strategy to manage its environmental reputation: launching a political campaign that lays much of the blame for the country's mounting environmental problems squarely on the shoulders of foreigners and, in particular, multinational companies.

While still in its initial stages, the campaign has gained steam over the past month. Senior Chinese officials, the media and even some environmental activists have charged multinational firms and other countries with exporting pollution, lowering their environmental manufacturing standards and willfully ignoring China's environmental regulations. Faced with growing international and popular discontent over the country's environmental crisis, China's leaders are tapping into anti-foreign and nationalist sentiments to deflect attention from their own failures.

In late October a top environmental official, Pan Yue, accused the developed countries of "environmental colonialism": of transferring resource-intensive, polluting industries to China and bearing as little environmental responsibility as possible. At the same time, a leading member of China's National People's Congress claimed that foreign companies were not only exporting their waste but also underpaying Chinese workers. When a Chinese nongovernmental organization released a list of 2,700 companies cited for violations of China's water regulations in late October, the ensuing media frenzy focused exclusively on the 33 multinationals, including 3M, Panasonic, PepsiCo and DuPont, and ignored the more than 2,600 Chinese companies similarly cited. Not surprisingly, Chinese bloggers have taken up the call, discussing the "eco-colonialist" policies of multinationals and calling for "eco-compensation." Even environmental activists who have worked closely with multinationals have accused these corporations of not practicing what they preach.

The logic behind the campaign is simple, if misguided. The rapidly approaching Olympic Games have brought an unwelcome spotlight on China's environmental situation. Beijing won its Olympics bid with the promise of the world's first "green" games. Five years later, there is no talk of a green Olympics, only of how extensive a shutdown of industry and transportation will be needed in Beijing and surrounding provinces just to ensure that the athletes can breathe. Moreover, the climate issue has focused the world's attention not only on China's contribution to global warming but also on its role as the largest contributor to a range of other global environmental problems such as ozone depletion, the illegal timber trade and marine pollution.

Perhaps nothing is more troubling to China's leaders, however, than the environment's contribution to domestic social unrest. In May, China Daily reported that there were 50,000 environmental protests in China in 2005. Some of these demonstrations engaged upward of 30,000 people and resulted in serious injuries and even deaths. In such a climate, scapegoating foreigners can be an attractive policy option.

Certainly, as with most Chinese political campaigns, there is a kernel of truth in some of the accusations. The multinational companies listed should take greater care to ensure that their own factories and those of their suppliers operate under only the highest standards.

Yet, overwhelmingly, China's environmental crisis and its contribution to global pollution are of its own making. Most Chinese businesses are clearly unprepared to be environmental leaders. China's coal-based and largely state-owned power sector, for example, is the No. 1 source of China's air pollution. In a recent poll, only 18 percent of Chinese companies supported the idea that they could both thrive economically and do the right thing environmentally.

China's leaders need to educate and reform Chinese industry, but beyond this they must establish an incentive structure to make it easy for local officials and business leaders to do the right thing. They need to open the door to greater transparency, official accountability and the rule of law to ensure effective environmental governance -- a step they have avoided taking for fear of diminishing their political power.

The environment has been one of the most fruitful areas of cooperation between China and the rest of the world for almost two decades. Billions of dollars in environmental assistance have flowed to China from foreign governments and international organizations. In most cases, multinational firms have been at the forefront of raising China's environmental standards, transferring best practices and cutting-edge technologies, and supporting a range of broader environmental initiatives. China should not risk all this -- and its own environmental future -- for the short-term and largely illusory benefits of playing an environmental blame game.

Canada Liberals Pick New Leader In Upset (NYT)

By Ian Austen

MONTREAL, Dec. 2 _ In a surprising outcome, Stéphane Dion, a former professor at the University of Montreal, edged out Michael Ignatieff, a former official at Harvard, for the leadership of Canada's Liberal Party on Saturday.

Mr. Ignatieff, who is also a well-known author and broadcaster, returned to Canada just last year after spending three decades in Britain and the United States. His lack of connections both within the Liberal Party and Canada in general seemed to play a role in his defeat. He led for the first two of the four convention ballots. But unlike Mr. Dion, he was unable to attract endorsements from other significant candidates as they dropped from the race.

On the final ballot, Mr. Dion gathered 54.7 percent of the 4,605 delegates' votes compared with 45.3 percent for Mr. Ignatieff.

As Mr. Dion noted at the start of his victory speech, he will move back into campaign mode almost immediately and try to lead the party back to power through a general election that may come as early as spring. Success in that would make Mr. Dion prime minister.

The Liberals controlled the federal government for most of the last century, leading both supporters and critics to call it Canada's natural governing party. Although Canadians elected a minority Conservative government in January, partly because of a Liberal financing scandal in Quebec, and the Conservatives' hold on power is tenuous.

Canada's Liberal Leader A Surprise Pick (AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

A former environment minister who criticized the conservative prime minister for modeling himself after President Bush won leadership of Canada's Liberal Party on Saturday.

Stephane Dion pledged to unseat Prime Minister Stephen Harper after he scored a surprise defeat of the party front-runner, Michael Ignatieff.

"I am convinced that to beat Harper in the next election, it will not be enough to capitalize on his mistakes," Dion, 51, told the party convention after winning more than half the votes of the 5,000 delegates.

"It will not be enough to be a government-in-waiting. To win, we must offer our own project to Canadians, a generous and ambitious vision that is in stark contrast to Mr. Harper's selfish and narrow idea of Canada."

Dion was part of the team of Liberals under former Prime Minister Jean Chretien who opposed the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 and turned down Washington's request to join.

He also has attacked Harper for "blindly" committing Canadian Forces to Afghanistan until 2009. Some 2,300 Canadian troops are helping other NATO forces fight the Taliban in the south.

"Canada has a prime minister who thinks that the United States is not only our ally, but also our model," Dion said in his speech Friday night ahead of the party vote.

Opponents of Ignatieff, a scholar and human rights expert, had cited his early support the Iraq invasion, a highly unpopular war among Canadians. He initially argued the war was in the best interests of international security, but has since said President Bush made mistakes.

Ignatieff supported Canada's role in Afghanistan.

Dion came into the race in fourth place out of eight candidates. He won 54.7 percent in the fourth round of balloting Saturday after several of the losing candidates in previous rounds threw their support behind him.

In elections in January, Harper's Conservatives unseated the Liberals after nearly 13 years in power. The stunning defeat left the party flailing and delegates are now looking to the person who can rebuild the party and take back the House of Commons in the next elections, expected in 2007.

Ignatieff, 59, had only returned to Canada last year, leaving his position as director of Harvard's Carr Center of Human Rights Policy to win his first seat in Parliament and stake his claim to the leadership position.

After his defeat, called on Liberals to unanimously support Dion.

"This is a day in which every Liberal in this room can feel deeply proud of the party we love," he said. "We have chosen a great leader. We have chosen a principled man, a man with vision, a man with courage."

Dion was environment minister under former Prime Minister Paul Martin and he is a strong supporter of the Kyoto Protocol to cut greenhouse gas emissions — he even has a husky dog named Kyoto. Harper's government has effectively opted out of the global accord, a position that Dion railed against during his campaign. The U.S. has not signed the protocol.

Dion had emphasized his decade of political experience under former Liberal prime ministers Martin and Chretien, as opposed to Ignatieff's lack of time in Ottawa.

Dion is from the French-speaking province of Quebec and has taken some criticism for his heavily accented English.

Canada Liberals Spurn Ignatieff (BBC)

BBC.com, December 3, 2006

A former Canadian minister has beaten prominent writer Michael Ignatieff in a leadership election for the country's opposition Liberal party.

Mr Ignatieff had been favourite to win the race, but was defeated by ex-Environment Minister Stephane Dion.

Mr Dion's campaign focused on green issues, pledging to act on Canada's Kyoto protocol commitments.

The Liberals lost power last January to the Conservatives led by Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

The BBC's Mike Finnerty at the party convention in Montreal says the election was a nail-biter, as 5,000 delegates struggled to decide who was most likely to beat the Conservatives.

Mr Dion needed four rounds of voting to finally beat Mr Ignatieff, the front-runner.

Outsider

Mr Ignatieff is a prominent writer, broadcaster and former Harvard academic.

Despite Michael Ignatieff's fame as an author, his support waned. However his 30-year absence from Canada and his initial support for the US-led invasion of Iraq played against him, our correspondent says.

Mr Dion will lead a party that many have called the natural governing party of Canada because of its dominance in the country's politics.

But a corruption scandal after almost two decades in office meant the party has spent most of 2006 trying to rebuild.

Environmental issues dominated the Montreal convention.

In his victory speech, Mr Dion made clear he would make the Kyoto Protocol on curbing greenhouse gases a key part of the strategy to win the next elections - which analysts say are likely next year.

Prime Minister Harper has called the Kyoto protocol unrealistic and recently cancelled a meeting with European Union leaders where he was expected to be criticised for his stance.

Advocate For Environment To Head Canada's Liberals (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

MONTREAL, Dec. 2 -- In a convention that underscored the rising political weight of climate change issues, Canada's Liberal Party on Saturday chose St?phane Dion, a former environment minister, to lead the party and try to wrest power from the ruling Conservatives in the next national election.

Dion, 51, was elected head of the party over seven other candidates, including Michael Ignatieff, a renowned Harvard professor who returned to Canada last year and had quickly become a front-runner in the race to head the opposition against Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Ignatieff's drive for the post stumbled in the fourth and last ballot over his opinions on Iraq, Afghanistan and Israel. The fragmented delegations at the convention turned to Dion, whose environmental credentials overcame his thickly accented English and lackluster convention speech.

In his acceptance speech, Dion repeatedly emphasized his main goal: dealing with what he called "the greatest challenge we have today, sustainable development."

He was elected, he said, because "Canadians have a deep concern about the main issue of our time -- building a sustainable environment for our children."

It was a message the delegates embraced.

"We've recognized that global warming and Kyoto are agenda items we have to deal with. Canada has gotten the message," said a delegate on the convention floor, Paul Mulligan, 60, a retired cartographer.

Dion must regroup the Liberals, long the dominant party in Canada, to try to reverse the loss in January to Harper's Conservatives. The party hopes that disillusionment with Harper for cutting social programs, rising despair over Canadian military losses in Afghanistan and opposition to Harper's retreat from the Kyoto environmental accord will topple the Conservative minority government.

As visual evidence of the importance of environmental issues, the sea of green T-shirts worn by Dion's supporters grew as the balloting continued in Montreal's cavernous Palace of Congress. Each of the candidates had pledged to make aggressive strides on the environment, but Dion's long work to strengthen the Kyoto accord carried those who put the issue at the top of the agenda.

An academic and native of Quebec City, Dion entered Parliament a decade ago and has held a variety of cabinet posts under Liberal governments. But in his last post, as environment minister, he won credit for devoting enormous effort to extending the provisions of the Kyoto accord. He owns a husky named Kyoto.

But he is less well-liked in his home province of Quebec because of his opposition to the popular movement to make the French-speaking province an independent country. In the late 1990s, Dion carried on a long-running debate with supporters of separatism and eventually assisted in drafting a law that many Quebecers feel helps block their movement.

"Quebec people don't like St?phane Dion," said Jean Pierre Laine, 54, an alternate delegate from Montreal. "He is a federalist." Quebec newspaper cartoons at the time portrayed him as a rat; he was pilloried as a traitor to his province.

"It will be an uphill struggle for Dion in Quebec," agreed Charles Hubbard, a member of Parliament from New Brunswick, in the convention hall. "The people who question federalism see Dion as the arch devil."

That is a burden for the Liberal Party, which had hoped to strengthen its position in the province. Dion's speaking style, often wooden and stilted, also is seen as a detriment in any matchup with Harper, who is smooth and fluent in both English and French.

Dion "is a bit rigid," said David Carter, 58, a delegate from Medicine Hat, Alberta. But he is "highly principled. He's strong, intelligent and very committed to the country."

In Canada's Parliament and other public appearances, top officials are expected to switch between both official languages with ease. Dion's syntax is sometimes difficult to sort out in English.

"It's important to be bilingual. I think it's horrible to say, but his language skills are not good enough," said Lana Stermac, a party observer from Toronto.

Others disagreed.

"It didn't hurt Chr?tien," said delegate Garry Johnson, noting that former prime minister Jean Chr?tien, also a Quebec native, served for 10 years and spoke heavily accented English.

"If they keep sending our boys back in body bags from Afghanistan, that is what will do Harper in," he added.

The Afghanistan issue is a tricky one for Liberals, however. A Liberal Paul Martin government committed Canadian troops to Afghanistan. Harper expanded the mission and engineered a Parliament vote in May to keep the troops there until at least 2009. Many Liberal Parliament members voted for the extension.

Harper, described at the convention as a Canadian version of President Bush, has focused on a narrow agenda of conservative social and fiscal goals, and has cut programs that fall outside of that list. As head of a minority government, he has said he will call an election to try to win a majority. Political experts predict that an election called by Harper or forced by the opposition will come next year, possibly early in the year.

The Pope Without His Sting (NYT)

By Ian Fisher
The New York Times, December 3, 2006
HAS the pope gone wobbly?

The question might matter less if he weren't the man he is — and if the images of his facing Mecca in prayer on his trip to Turkey weren't fresh. Supporters have long depended on Benedict XVI for brave talk, even and maybe especially if it was unpleasant to hear. But his was never mere blunt confrontation. With his big brain and the heft of Roman Catholic tradition behind him, Benedict has stood for a remarkably clear idea: there is truth, and we won't retreat from it.

That penchant for truth-telling found its date with history two months ago in the pope's now-famous speech in Regensburg, Germany. Rare for a mainstream leader, he planted a steely marker in the struggle against terror and militant Islam, quoting a Byzantine emperor as saying Islam had brought only things "evil and inhuman." Islam, he seemed to say, was distant from reason and thus prone to violence.

But in his visit to Turkey last week, the face of confrontation, and perhaps the hold on certainty, seemed to soften. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan emerged happily from his meeting with Benedict, saying that the pope had endorsed Turkey's bid to join the European Union and so reversed his long-held personal opposition.

In the place of tough talk, Benedict suggested "dialogue" — a concept, with regard to Islam especially, that he had not seemed completely open to before.

And so a new and ever more interesting chapter in this young papacy, as well as in the larger issue of how to engage the Muslim world, including those elements of it that resort to violence, seemed to open on Benedict's four days in Turkey.

The questions are many, starting with whether or not Benedict, the doctrinal purist, has somehow gone soft. To some of his most hard-core supporters, that, indeed, may be the lesson of his visit to Turkey.

"He has signaled to Islam that there are concessions he can make, and reactions other than outrage in the face of intimidation and violence," one conservative blogger wrote in an emblematic posting that found echoes in the concerned Catholic blogosphere. "It is a shame. We needed Benedict, and his withdrawal from the debate is a considerable loss."

But other commentators, with varying views of the pope, put the question another way: can one's idea of truth be expressed differently, especially when reality gets in the way?

By many accounts, the Vatican was deeply shaken at the reaction to the pope's speech, which was at its heart a criticism of the West for being so beholden to reason that it had blocked out other values, like religion. The section on Islam was short, and Benedict made clear he was quoting others in his criticism of Islam.

But the reaction — and here the Vatican officially blames the news media — focused on the sharp, if brief, critique of Islam. And the Muslim world reacted with rage. Demonstrations broke out in many Muslim countries; firebombers attacked churches in the West Bank and Gaza; gunmen killed an Italian nun in Somalia. The pope himself was threatened, accounting for the heavy security on his trip to Turkey.

"This is a pope who hasn't really understood that what he says has consequences for Christians elsewhere," said Sergio Romano, a columnist for Corriere della Sera and the former Italian ambassador to NATO. "He can put them in danger. He has had to adopt a more diplomatic line."

This new phase in Benedict's papacy, then, is seen by many as a transformation from his understanding of his role primarily as a theologian, concerned with a specific truth, to a greater appreciation of his role as something of a diplomat, who seeks to balance various truths in the service of a greater interest; in this case, that of the church and its believers.

David Gibson, author of "The Rule of Benedict," published in September by HarperSanFranciso, described the pope's performance in Turkey as a crucial moment. With his silent prayer in the mosque and general warmth, he showed himself to be every bit as adept at politics as theology.

"We have seen to some degree the transformation of Joseph Ratzinger the cardinal and theologian to Benedict XVI, pope and statesman," Mr. Gibson said. "He said and did some things that obviously go against his personal grain."

But, he added: "It was really smart. And it cost him nothing."

Like any good politician, Benedict gave a bit to everyone and kept his words vague enough (he himself never came out and explicitly endorsed Turkey's entry into the E.U.) that people could read into them what they wanted. Indeed, the Catholic chattering class was working full time on whether he actually did endorse an E.U. entry or whether he said an actual prayer at the Blue Mosque in Istanbul.

The question for the many longtime supporters of the pope is whether this new Benedict is really the same man, whether the straight talk that distinguished him will be recognizable in a more political outfit.

Philip F. Lawler, editor of Catholic World News, an influential conservative Web site, says he believes that it will be. While he acknowledged that some of Benedict's supporters were not happy about the comments on the European Union or the mosque visit, Benedict continued to raise in Turkey the same issues he always has: concern for religious freedom; respect for religious minorities; denunciation of violence in the name of God.

"I haven't seen any backtracking since Regensburg," he said. "I've seen questions posed in a different manner. And I've seen a concern that he doesn't want to offend people by the way in which he poses the questions. But he's still determined to have those questions posed."

The Rev. Thomas V. Berg, executive director of the Westchester Institute for Ethics, a conservative Catholic research group, said, "Pope Benedict will hold to principle, but he will do so with a gentle smile."

"That approach has allowed him to be so amazingly clear about the problems he has with militant Islam, and at the same time walk right into the heart of one of the epicenters of the Islamic world and emerge as a hero, a mender of fences, a great humanitarian, a man of dialogue," Father Berg said.

But however well Benedict's new approach seemed to go over in Turkey, Mr. Gibson, who described Benedict as a polarizing figure in his book, issued a warning: The clash of East and West, Islam and Christianity, is not over. Benedict's role as conciliator is young, untested and does not come as naturally as his older role as a man of certainty.

"I don't think he wants to play Mr. Touchy-Feely with world Islam," Mr. Gibson said. "I think there are going to be some difficult moments."

German Turks Ask Where They Fit Now (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

FOR the 2.7 million Turkish immigrants who live in Germany, Pope Benedict XVI's visit to their homeland last week was not quite the occasion for relief, satisfaction, even joy that one might have expected.

The German-born pope did speak of understanding and dialogue between Christians and Muslims, trying to salve wounds caused by a speech in Bavaria in which he had seemed to equate Islam with violence. And he endorsed Turkey's entrance into the European Union, reversing the opposition he had expressed while still a cardinal.

But the pope's message fell short of a full embrace; he never, for example, dropped his definition of Europe as a place with a Christian history. Such ambiguity about welcoming Turkey and Islam into Europe is felt deeply across the continent, and it turns out that the Turks who have migrated here mirror it. They feel part of Germany and Europe, and yet never fully welcomed.

That was plainly the case during a series of conversations here in Kreuzberg, a graffiti-stained district that is one of Berlin's largest Turkish quarters. Benedict's pilgrimage elicited a complex range of feelings that spoke of conflicted loyalties and disillusionment, of a people caught between the land of their ancestors and their adopted land. "The pope's power is mainly within the church," said Ramiz Koyuncu, a sporting-goods salesman, as he emerged from morning prayers at Berlin's largest mosque. "What people like Merkel say is more important."

His reference was to Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, who opposes granting Turkey full membership in the union. The European Union, in fact, is now weighing whether to suspend part of the negotiations because of Turkey's failure to open trade with Cyprus, and Turks who live in Europe are resigning themselves to a hard reality: their home country may not break into the European club during their lifetimes.

It's more complicated than a simple question of spurning a club that won't have them. Turks who came to Germany as guest workers in the early 1960's are building retirement communities here. Of the estimated 2.7 million people of Turkish origin living in Germany, 900,000 are now German citizens — a percentage that has grown as the influx of new arrivals has slowed because of tougher immigration laws.

While 60 percent of Turks in Germany still favor entry, according to a survey by the Center for Turkish Studies in Essen, that number represents a steep drop from 91 percent in 2004.

Ahmed Hunker, who owns a kebab restaurant in a hard-bitten Berlin neighborhood, said that admitting Turkey would cost Germany billions of euros in aid and erode his standard of living. After scraping together a life in Germany over a decade, Mr. Hunker said he did not want to see his new country saddled with the problems of his old one.

"Why should Turkey be a member of the E.U.?" he asked. "Why should Bulgaria be a member? Why should Romania be a member? The rich countries will just end up paying for them."

Mr. Hunker and his neighbors know about the costs that come with expanding borders. When the reunification of Germany took place more than a decade ago, Turks like him in western Berlin found themselves suddenly competing for jobs with newcomers from the east.

Few Turks speak as bluntly as Mr. Hunker. It is far more typical to hear them say they hope to see Turkey in the union. But some seem to have given up on the idea that the West will ever accept a Muslim society. Pope Benedict's remarks about the Prophet Mohammed confirmed the suspicions of some Turks that Europeans view their club as a Christian one.

"The pope poisoned the atmosphere," Mr. Koyuncu said. "That's why he had to make this gesture to Turkey."

Closer To And Farther From Europe (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

The strained relationship between Europe and Turkey took two steps forward last week and, we fear, at least that many backward.

On the plus side, the visit to Turkey by Pope Benedict XVI helped soothe relations, especially after Benedict backed off his opposition to Turkey's application to join the European Union. The pope — who infuriated Muslims a few months ago with a tone-deaf speech criticizing Islam — may have done even more good with his visit to the Blue Mosque in Istanbul, where he prayed facing Mecca.

But those efforts at conciliation may be undercut if the European Union follows through on a recommendation by its enlargement commissioner, Olli Rehn, to freeze part of the negotiating program for Turkey's membership unless Turkey opens its ports to shipping from Cyprus. To many in Turkey — and to us as well — that looked like another ploy to keep Turkey out of the union. Some members are pressing for the European Union to suspend the talks altogether.

There is no question that Turkey has to open its ports, the sooner the better. But the European Union also needs to do a lot more to help end the division of Cyprus — rather than just hitting Turkey over the head with it.

In 2004, Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, courageously changed his country's longstanding policy and persuaded Turkish Cypriots to vote in favor of a United Nations settlement plan.

But the Greek Cypriots — assured by the European Union of membership no matter what they did — rejected the plan. If the union is serious about bringing in Turkey — and it should be — it needs to press the Greek Cypriots to settle.

It is obvious why Turkey would want to join Europe's wealthy club. But Europe and all of the West have a lot to gain as well. The prospect of membership is already encouraging Ankara to make needed political and economic reforms, although a lot more needs to be done. Turkey's admission would be a strong sign that the West truly believes its claims of tolerance and respect for all religions.

As he left Istanbul, the pope said he hoped his visit would bring "civilizations progressively closer." The European Union should listen.

Germany To Restrict Smoking, Joining Other Nations In Europe (NYT)

By Mark Landler

FRANKFURT, Dec. 2 — Yielding grudgingly to the growing European campaign against smoking in public places, Germany announced Friday that it would seek to ban smoking in restaurants, discos, schools and other public buildings, but not in pubs, bars or beer tents.

The compromise, worked out by the coalition government, would bring this country, Europe's biggest tobacco market, closer to its neighbors in curtailing public smoking. But it would fall short of the recent laws passed by Britain, France, Ireland and Italy, which stamp out cigarettes in pubs and bars as well as other public places.

Antismoking groups said the proposal was a milestone, given Germany's long resistance to any restrictions. They called on the Parliament to broaden the ban when it votes on it, probably next year.

"Germany has been lagging on this issue for 20 years," said Friedrich J. Wiebel, president of the German Medical Action Group on Smoking and Health, an antismoking organization. "There is no reason why one group of customers should be protected and others should not."

German officials defended the loopholes, saying the ban had a better chance of passing that way.

For a people fixated on the virtues of fresh air, Germans are curiously tolerant of smoking in public places. Restaurants here are typically hazy with smoke. Customers who ask for a nonsmoking table are sometimes treated brusquely.

Roughly a third of Germans smoke regularly, a proportion comparable to other major Western European countries. But Germany has more young smokers than many of its neighbors. And while the percentage of men who smoke has declined modestly since 1984, smoking has become more popular among women.

One woman who quit years ago is Chancellor Angela Merkel. That makes her one of the few nonsmoking German leaders. Gerhard Schröder puffs on cigars, Willy Brandt smoked a pipe and Helmut Schmidt has frequently appeared on television talk shows wreathed in cigarette smoke.

Mrs. Merkel's support for a smoking ban, though carefully modulated, helped turn the tide, according to antismoking groups.

DOJ_NMG_0101445

Surveys show that, despite their tolerance of secondhand smoke, a majority of Germans now favor banning it in restaurants. The hurdle, Dr. Wiebel said, is the German tobacco industry, which has historically had close ties to the government and has stymied previous efforts to curtail smoking.

Losing The Race Against AIDS (NYT)

Despite all the lofty goals set by world leaders, and billions of dollars thrown into the fight to quench the global AIDS pandemic in recent years, it is discouraging to learn the world is still falling behind.

A recent update issued by the United Nations AIDS program and the World Health Organization found some encouraging signs of progress, including a drop in H.I.V. infections in young people in eight African countries, thanks to aggressive prevention programs. But the number of people living with the AIDS virus continued to grow, reaching a record 39.5 million in 2006; 4.3 million people became infected this year; and the number of deaths due to AIDS reached an all-time high.

Most disturbingly, some countries that had been trumpeted as successes in controlling AIDS, like Uganda and Thailand, seemed to be having a resurgence. As one top United Nations official noted, “countries are not moving at the same speed as their epidemics.”

Even more troubling was a report from the International Treatment Preparedness Coalition, an advocacy group, which pointed to shortfalls in an area where substantial progress seemed to have been made: the provision of antiretroviral drugs to save or extend the lives of AIDS victims. Both the United Nations and the Group of 8 industrialized nations have set a goal of providing “universal access” to AIDS treatment by 2010, by which time they hope to have 9.8 million people receiving antiretroviral drugs. At the current rate, the coalition estimates, they will fall five million short.

Progress has been slowed by many factors, including insufficient testing to identify people who are infected and weak public health services for delivering the drugs. But the overriding problem may be a loss of the sense of urgency and a reluctance by most governments to commit the huge resources needed to provide universal access to treatment, prevention, care and support.

Blame Iceland (WP)

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

IN A FORM of fishing known as bottom trawling, huge, weighted nets are dragged across the ocean floor, destroying corals and just about everything else in their path. In U.S. waters, the practice is tightly regulated -- and forbidden in certain environmentally sensitive areas. On much of the high seas, however, it's open season. Delicate ecosystems get ravaged with nobody paying attention. The Bush administration, along with several other governments, has been pushing for a moratorium on unregulated trawling on the high seas. Last month, thanks in large part to Iceland, it failed to get that measure.

Iceland did not act alone in preventing a ban: Russia, Japan, China and South Korea joined in. Iceland's embassy, in a statement, said it "strongly objects to claims, made by some environmental organizations, that it was in the forefront of blocking consensus" to ban deep-sea bottom trawling. The denial is disingenuous. In closed-door negotiations, Iceland, along with Russia, took a particularly vocal and aggressive stand against strong action.

Because the arcane rules of high-seas fishing are largely defined by consensus, even small countries that are genuine moral outliers in world attitudes toward oceans can prevent agreement. The result in this case was a mushy resolution that fell far short of what the administration and environmental groups wanted, which in turn is ominous for efforts to protect marine life in international waters. The world's oceans are heading toward environmental collapse, which only bold action will avert. It's hard to imagine that happening if a country that hunts whales and has a population smaller than Washington's can help block a common-sense proposal to safeguard the ecological health of the ocean floor.

Kofi Annan's Legacy (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- The melancholy of a decade of might-have-beens mixes with a deep fear of what might yet be as Kofi Annan prepares to leave his 38th-floor global pulpit at the United Nations. But the secretary general's silky voice also betrays a determination to spend his final month in office warning the world of grave threats to its moral and physical existence.

Iran, Iraq, the Middle East and Sudan's Darfur region dominate the final day-to-day business that the career diplomat from Ghana conducts. But he is also delivering a series of thoughtful speeches examining nuclear proliferation, human rights and global governance so that "these issues don't drop off the radar" after he puts down his U.N. megaphone.

As we begin a conversation about his legacy -- easily the most active and therefore most controversial record of a secretary general since Dag Hammarskjold gave the job meaning during the Cold War -- Annan surprises me by going quickly to his concern that the West may underestimate Iran's resolve in pursuing its nuclear program.

"I have told the United States and Britain to be careful, to be sure that the Iranians don't come out of a Security Council debate laughing" because sanctions are not adopted by a divided body, he says. Later Annan adds: "Iran feels itself to be a powerful nation. Its president looked me in the eyes" and said exactly that.

Annan says the simultaneous confrontations with Iran and North Korea demonstrate that "you can't do nonproliferation on a case-by-case basis. You have to find a real mechanism" to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to new states or even terrorist groups. That is likely to happen only if recognized nuclear states begin to fulfill existing treaty obligations to eventually give up nuclear weapons, rather than continually modernizing them.

Iran's new self-confidence also suggests that Tehran will not easily agree to U.S. overtures to engage in talks about Iraq, as conventional wisdom in the foreign policy community now recommends. Tehran will instead relentlessly bargain for U.S. concessions as a price for joining a dialogue, in the view of Annan and others.

That possibility was forecast in the contacts that former secretary of state Jim Baker had with Javad Zarif, Iranian ambassador to the United Nations. Iran has no interest in a dialogue limited to Iraq, as Baker suggested to him, Zarif has told diplomats here. Instead, talks must include security guarantees for Iran as a topic.

The might-have-beens of Annan's two terms center on his rocky relations with the Bush administration, which have left scars on both sides. Some U.S. officials treated him "as an enemy" at times because of his opposition to the invasion of Iraq, Annan tells me.

"The United States has a natural leadership role to play in this organization," says Annan, who is American-educated, came to office with strong U.S. support and has worked hard to develop a broad constituency for the United Nations among American private-sector and nongovernmental organizations. "It can get a lot done." He pauses. "But no one nation can always have its way. It has to be possible to disagree" and still work together.

"Iraq has set us back on many issues," including one of Annan's proudest accomplishments. That was to get the United Nations to endorse an international "duty to protect" citizens from their own abusive governments.

In today's polarized atmosphere, it is much more difficult to get governments to take on the burden of humanitarian intervention in places such as Darfur, Annan believes. So he has had to engage a devious Sudanese government in an exasperating political negotiation for getting an effective peacekeeping force into that country.

Despite -- or perhaps because of -- his troubles with Washington, Annan is actively pushing for a regional conference to help resolve Iraq's instability and permit an orderly U.S. withdrawal: "Everybody has an interest in getting Iraq right."

A standing conference intended to last for months, not a few days, and one that would include the major Security Council powers as well as Iraq's neighbors, is his preferred option. The United Nations would sponsor such a meeting, if asked, he predicted to the Iraq Study Group headed by Baker and Lee Hamilton.

The day is late, and the light coming in from the sky over Manhattan's East River is fading as I ask Annan a final question: How should his successor, South Korea's Ban Ki Moon, go about restoring U.S.-U.N. relations?

"My only advice to him about this job is to do it his way. I did it my way, which was to try to work with the United States while being the secretary-general of all United Nations members."

The New Demagogues (WP)

By Niall Ferguson

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

"We are confronting the devil -- and we will hit a home run off the devil!"

Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez was at it again last week, demonizing his archenemy in front of throngs of loyal supporters in downtown Caracas. Forget his opponent in today's presidential elections -- that's not the "devil" he has in mind. Instead, following the example of another great Latin American demagogue, Fidel Castro, Ch?vez directs his rhetorical fire against the United States and President Bush.

The world over, demagogues are back, yelling their slogans and thumping their tubs.

In Latin America, Bolivia's Evo Morales and Mexico's Andr?s Manuel L?pez Obrador have joined Ch?vez in heaping opprobrium on the diabolical gringo imperialists. In the Middle East, Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Hezbollah's Hasan Nasrallah denounce the demonic Yankee crusaders and their Zionist confederates with equal fervor. Others have different targets, but their language is no less inflammatory. In Germany, Udo Pastoers of the xenophobic National Democratic Party won a regional election after calling Europe "a cultural space for white people." In South Africa, former deputy president Jacob Zuma belts out "Mshini Wami," an anti-apartheid anthem that includes the line, "Bring me my machine gun."

Their rhetoric may seem overblown, but no one should underestimate the threat these new demagogues pose -- especially to the United States. Irrelevant in Latin America, impotent in the Middle East, ignored in Africa and isolated in Europe, Washington may be facing its biggest foreign policy crisis since the late 1970s, when the Iranian Revolution and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan rocked Jimmy Carter's presidency. And this new generation of rabble-rousers is seizing the moment. The more unpopular the United States becomes, the easier it is for them to win votes by bad-mouthing Uncle Sam.

We have been here before, and it wasn't pretty. When an elected president expresses skepticism about the Holocaust and threatens to wipe the state of Israel from the map, it is not hyperbole to draw comparisons with that most disastrous of demagogues, Adolf Hitler. Like Hitler, Ahmadinejad knows that anti-Semitism is one of the aces in the demagogue's deck, a tried-and-true means of inspiring hatred and suspicion of others -- and of staying in power himself. Hitler also frequently expressed his contempt for the United States, which he dismissed as "a decayed country," racially and culturally inferior to Germany -- and, of course, ruled by Jews. Read Ahmadinejad's latest letter to "the American people," released last week, for a reprise of that theme.

And today, the conditions for truly dangerous demagogues to emerge are almost ideal.

The classic breeding grounds for demagogy are war and revolution. It is no coincidence that Ahmadinejad is a veteran of the 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran and the war between Iran and Iraq. In a new mood of "realism," the United States would now like Iran to help prevent its neighbor Iraq from collapsing into civil war. Fat chance. Ahmadinejad is bidding for Iranian hegemony in the Middle East. The last thing he needs is to be seen bailing out the Great Satan.

Severe economic volatility can also create a popular appetite for rousing rhetoric. It is significant that economic growth has been so much more variable in Latin America and the Middle East over the past 20 years than it has been in the United States. When people are buffeted by wild fluctuations in income, prices and job security, they are more likely to lose confidence in the political status quo and to heed the words of messianic leaders such as Ch?vez and Morales.

Also relevant is the level of average income. Today, per capita incomes in poorer Latin American countries and most of the Middle East are similar to those of Central Europe between the wars. (That's important, because studies suggest that a democracy's chances of survival are much higher when per capita income is above $6,000.) Illiteracy rates are probably higher than they were in Central Europe. Urbanization rates certainly are. It's an ideal environment for demagogy: masses of people, stuck between the grinding poverty of agrarian societies and the affluence of today's richest countries, living in crowded cities with lousy schools. In such settings, the center seldom holds for long. Soon the maverick speechmaker is strutting in presidential regalia.

That helps explain why so many demagogues swept to power in Central and Eastern Europe in the 1920s and '30s. Hitler was only one of a host of dictators who combined fiery rhetoric with colored shirts, shiny boots -- and an utter disregard for civil liberties, especially those of ethnic minorities. And that's the critical point.

History's lesson is that personal freedom is all too often the demagogue's first victim, especially when popular sentiment is whipped up against some internal or foreign enemy.

The ancient Greek word "demagogos" means simply a spokesman for the people or, more pejoratively, a leader of the mob. Modern usage implies rhetorical gifts and the ability to arouse an audience, usually with the promise of radical measures. It is to the baser impulses of the public that a demagogue usually appeals -- hence the tendency to identify and denounce enemies of the people.

Demagogy is as old as democracy, but not all democracies produce demagogues. The best known of the ancient Greek demagogues was Alcibiades, who sold his fellow Athenians the (bad) idea of conquering Sicily. The Roman Republic produced Marcus Tullius Cicero, whose devastating Philippics sought to thwart the ambitions of Julius Caesar's friend and Cleopatra's lover Mark Antony. (Cicero called Antony a "madman" who wanted a "bloodbath" in Rome.)

The term took on a new significance in the 17th century. If the English Civil War had its demagogue, it was the Puritan parliamentarian John Pym, Charles I's most vehement critic in the House of Commons -- though it was the plainspoken man of action Oliver Cromwell who emerged as dictator.

Not all revolutions produce demagogues. The American Revolution owed more to lawyerly draftsmen and amateur soldiers than to masters of rhetoric. In France, though, intemperate speechifying was the essence of the revolution. Demagogues such as Georges Danton -- nicknamed "Jove the thunderer" and one of the leaders of the Reign of Terror -- gave firebrand oratory a bad name for the better part of a century.

From the 1880s on, the widening of franchises to include poorer, less educated voters combined with a major economic slowdown to produce a new kind of demagogue: not so much a warmonger or a revolutionary as a vote-winner. The defining moment was William Ewart Gladstone's 1878 Midlothian campaign, when the British Liberal leader made a series of inspirational stump speeches aimed not just at local voters but at the nation.

But as the boom years of the industrial age gave way to deflation and depression, demagogues turned against liberalism. On the left and right alike, from socialists to anti-Semites, radical politicians discovered that the best way to mobilize new voters was to blame economic volatility on enemies of the people. In Austria, the anti-Semite Karl Lueger blamed the troubles of the Viennese petty bourgeoisie after the stock market crash of 1873 on the city's supposedly all-powerful Jews. In Russia, radical socialists such as Leon Trotsky fulminated with equal vehemence against czarism and capitalism. In every case, the demagogue pointed an accusatory finger, blaming this or that group for the sufferings of the masses. Success meant power for the demagogue, and persecution for his targets.

Small wonder, then, that the years between World Wars I and II proved to be the zenith of demagogic politics. After 1914, the world was swept first by war, then by revolutions and finally by the worst depression in economic history. Hitler was of course the arch-demagogue, a hate-filled monster and false Messiah who promised the German people redemption after years of humiliation. But in Italy, Benito Mussolini also strutted and stormed; Oswald Mosley, the renegade socialist who founded the British Union of Fascists, tried the same tricks in England. Central Europe resounded to the diatribes of a horde of similar rabble-rousers. In Poland, National Democrat leader Roman Dmowski prophesied an "international pogrom of the Jews." In Romania, the founder of the Legion of the Archangel Michael, Corneliu Codreanu, pledged to "destroy the Jews before they can destroy us." Hitler was very far from the only demagogue in the 1930s to scapegoat the Jews. When he took Europe to war, he found willing collaborators all over the continent.

The good news about demagogues is that they often find it harder to deliver on election pledges than to deliver election speeches. In September, Morales's deputy, Vice President ?lvaro Garc?a Linera, called on Bolivia's indigenous people to defend Morales's government "with your chest, with your hand, with your Mauser" in response to opposition in the eastern city of Santa Cruz. Such language belies the reality that the Morales government has been forced to modify its plan to nationalize the country's energy sector (though last week it did succeed in pushing through a radical land reform bill). Economic instability and backwardness may bring demagogues to power. But they also constrain them once they get there.

Still, the fact that Chavez and Ahmadinejad sit on top of 6 percent and 11 percent of proven global oil reserves must give us pause. Perhaps the greatest strategic weakness of the interwar demagogues was their lack of fuel. That, indeed, was one of their motives for conquering what Hitler called "living space" from neighboring countries.

Today's demagogues, by contrast, rule oil-rich countries. This may reduce their need to acquire territory. But with oil prices stuck above $60 a barrel, it also guarantees them large payments from oil-importing countries such as the United States and gives them the means to back up their words with action. And you don't need to know a lot of history to know that hot air plus petroleum is a potentially explosive combination.

Felipe Calderon's Daunting To-do List For Mexico (LAT)

By Jorge G. Castañeda

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

MEXICO'S SEEMINGLY endless electoral ordeal has finally concluded: Felipe Calderon took office as president on Friday, albeit under hardly auspicious circumstances. Constitutional order has prevailed — though just barely — despite the onslaught of a strident and deeply wounded left-wing opposition bent on impeding Calderon's inauguration and a bitter, resentful Institutional Revolution Party (PRI) silently hoping and conspiring for the new president's failure.

The bad news for Calderon is that the telenovela that debuted on election day, July 2, is only the beginning. The toughest challenges lie ahead for him now that he has moved into Los Pinos (as the presidential spread on the edge of Chapultepec Park is called).

The conventional wisdom in Mexico doesn't fully appreciate Calderon's predicament. If Vicente Fox's term was largely a self-inflicted failure — as is broadly believed — then it would be relatively easy for the new administration to improve on this dismal past. So Calderon would set about imposing respect for the rule of law and the country's institutions, using political skills acquired as a party leader and legislator to broker deals with the PRI for the structural economic reforms Mexico needs to grow at roughly twice the rate of the Fox years (a meager 2% a year), downsizing expectations for dealing with Washington on immigration and cracking down on corruption that has remained rampant over the last six years.

That wouldn't prove so daunting. Alas, this simplistic narrative is not only inaccurate, it is devastatingly misleading.

Fox's six years in office, coupled with the four last years of former President Ernesto Zedillo's mandate, were a milestone. Not since the 1960s had Mexico enjoyed 10 consecutive years of economic stability, low inflation, low interest rates, a stable currency and constant, if mediocre, growth. For the first time, mortgages, automobile loans and consumer credit became available to the lower middle class: This year more homes were built and sold, and more cars were bought, than ever before.

Fox can be criticized for indulging disruptive political protesters and an extremist opposition, but what's more important is that he did not resort to the bloody repression for which most of his predecessors came to be known. And as his foreign minister for a time, I am proud that Fox dragged Mexico out of its archaic foreign policy cocoon and put immigration and human rights front and center on Mexico's international agenda.

As far as Fox's inability to build coalitions with other parties (his National Action Party, or PAN, did not control a majority in the Congress, and still doesn't), perhaps it was their fault, not his. Even before taking office, Calderon was unable to accomplish his very first goal: building the coalition government — at least with the PRI — that he repeatedly proclaimed as the solution to the political gridlock that has cursed Mexico since 1997. There are advantages to having a uniform and disciplined, though probably disposable, PAN Cabinet, even one made up largely of lackluster, mostly unknown and untested archconservatives from the heartland, but this is not what Calderon said he wanted. Similarly, no deal was reached with the leftist opposition regarding the inauguration ceremony — thus the chaotic, depressing scenes of Mexican congressmen fighting it out at the podium of their chamber over the course of the last week.

Moreover, local conflicts like those in the southern state of Oaxaca have not been quickly resolved under Fox, either politically or through the use of force. It seems that Mexico's problems are more intractable than just not having Fox to "kick around anymore."

Actually, they may be more simple and complex at the same time. Mexico experienced an abrupt economic opening under former President Carlos Salinas de Gortari (1988-1994), a belated but successful political opening under Zedillo (1994-2000) and, at long last, a true rotation in power thanks to Fox (2000-2006). But all of these historical transformations took place while leaving the essence of the old PRI-inspired machinery intact: The foundations of the system (which political scientists would call "corporativist" because that system managed to subordinate all sectors of society — the party, business, labor, the church and so on under its control), created in the 1930s, remain untouched. They still represent the most formidable obstacles to Mexico's growth and success.

The first pillar of this structure is the public and private economic monopolies that dominate the country. The oil (Pemex) and electric power (Federal Electricity Commission) firms owned by the state are untainted by competition; the private virtual monopolies in telecommunications (Telmex), television networks (Televisa), cement (Cemex), bread and tortilla manufacturing (Bimbo and Maseca, respectively) and banking (Banamex/Citigroup and Bancomer/Banco de Bilbao) face only tepid competition at home, thanks to their cozy relationship with the state. Prices, supply, service and quality suffer as a consequence, and today these monopolies are stronger than ever.

The second pillar is formed by the unions that have controlled the Mexican labor movement since the 1930s. They were granted immense leverage in workplaces, tremendous resources and political power. The power of such organizations as the teachers union (the largest in Latin America), the oil workers union (the richest in Latin America) and the Social Security employees union (that has thwarted any attempt at pension or health reform for years) remains largely unchecked to this day. These unions obtained all their perks in exchange for 70 years of support for the PRI. They retain those perks, though they no longer owe any support to the government.

The third pillar is the political monopoly. For 70 years, one party had a complete lock on Mexican politics; now three parties do, and no one else can enter the political arena or have access to the taxpayer subsidies handed out to these parties (to the tune of more than half a billion dollars last year) without their consent. In Mexico, Joe Lieberman would not have been reelected to the Senate because, among other reasons, independent candidates are not allowed to run. The parties write their own antitrust legislation, vote their own subsidies and choose their own elected officials, who are just ratified at the polls.

Calderon's daunting assignment is to take on the pillars of the PRI's ancient regime, which have outlasted that party's seven-decade control of the presidency. His administration needs to liberate the union movement, upgrade and enforce antitrust laws to break up private monopolies and allow new competitors — even to the old public monopolies — to enter the marketplace. The barriers of entry into the marketplace of political ideas must also come down.

Can Calderon achieve all this? On one hand, the question might appear nonsensical. Given his weakness at the start, and the virulence and insidiousness of his opposition, taking on more enemies, including some of the powers that be that backed him, seems absurd and impossible. On the other hand, doing so may be the only way to strengthen his presidency. Moreover, his supporters can hardly break with him and join the Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador insurrection or the PRI silent conspiracy. They have nowhere else to go. Nor, indeed, does Calderon. He has to move forward and take up some formidable interests that are standing in the way of Mexico's future. It will not be easy.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Video Is A Window Into A Terror Suspect's Isolation (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

One spring day during his three and a half years as an enemy combatant, Jose Padilla experienced a break from the monotony of his solitary confinement in a bare cell in the brig at the Naval Weapons Station in Charleston, S.C.

That day, Mr. Padilla, a Brooklyn-born Muslim convert whom the Bush administration had accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack and had detained without charges, got to go to the dentist.

"Today is May 21," a naval official declared to a camera videotaping the event. "Right now we're ready to do a root canal treatment on Jose Padilla, our enemy combatant."

Several guards in camouflage and riot gear approached cell No. 103. They unlocked a rectangular panel at the bottom of the door and Mr. Padilla's bare feet slid through, eerily disembodied. As one guard held down a foot with his black boot, the others shackled Mr. Padilla's legs. Next, his hands emerged through another hole to be manacled.

Wordlessly, the guards, pushing into the cell, chained Mr. Padilla's cuffed hands to a metal belt. Briefly, his expressionless eyes met the camera before he lowered his head submissively in expectation of what came next: noise-blocking headphones over his ears and blacked-out goggles over his eyes. Then the guards, whose faces were hidden behind plastic visors, marched their masked, clanking prisoner down the hall to his root canal.

The videotape of that trip to the dentist, which was recently released to Mr. Padilla's lawyers and viewed by The New York Times, offers the first concrete glimpse inside the secretive military incarceration of an American citizen whose detention without charges became a test case of President Bush's powers in the fight against terror. Still frames from the videotape were posted in Mr. Padilla's electronic court file late Friday.

To Mr. Padilla's lawyers, the pictures capture the dehumanization of their client during his military detention from mid-2002 until earlier this year, when the government changed his status from enemy combatant to criminal defendant and transferred him to the federal detention center in Miami. He now awaits trial scheduled for late January.

Together with other documents filed late Friday, the images represent the latest and most aggressive sally by defense lawyers who declared this fall that charges against Mr. Padilla should be dismissed for "outrageous government conduct," saying that he was mistreated and tortured during his years as an enemy combatant.

Now lawyers for Mr. Padilla, 36, suggest that he is unfit to stand trial. They argue that he has been so damaged by his interrogations and prolonged isolation that he suffers post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to assist in his own defense. His interrogations, they say, included hooding, stress positions, assaults, threats of imminent execution and the administration of "truth serums."

A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Todd Vician, said Sunday that the military disputes Mr. Padilla's accusations of mistreatment. And, in court papers, prosecutors deny "in the strongest terms" the accusations of torture and say that "Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security."

"His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner, including Halal (Muslim acceptable) food, clothing, sleep and daily medical assessment and treatment when necessary," the government stated. "While in the brig, Padilla never reported any abusive treatment to the staff or medical personnel."

In the brig, Mr. Padilla was denied access to counsel for 21 months. Andrew Patel, one of his lawyers, said his isolation was not only severe but compounded by material and sensory deprivations. In an affidavit filed Friday, he alleged that Mr. Padilla was held alone in a 10-cell wing of the brig; that he had little human contact other than with his interrogators; that his cell was electronically monitored and his meals were passed to him through a slot in the door; that windows were blackened, and there was no clock or calendar; and that he slept on a steel platform after a foam mattress was taken from him, along with his copy of the Koran, "as part of an interrogation plan."

Mr. Padilla's situation, as an American declared an enemy combatant and held without charges by his own government, was extraordinary and the conditions of his detention appear to have been unprecedented in the military justice system.

Philip D. Cave, a former judge advocate general for the Navy and now a lawyer specializing in military law, said, "There's nothing comparable in terms of severity of confinement, in terms of how Padilla was held, especially considering that this was pretrial confinement."

Ali al-Marri, a Qatari and Saudi dual citizen and the only enemy combatant currently detained in the United States, has made similar claims of isolation and deprivation at the brig in South Carolina. The Pentagon spokesman, Lieutenant Vician, said Sunday that he could not comment on the methods used to escort Mr. Padilla to the dentist. Blackened goggles and earphones are rarely employed in internal prison transports in the United States, but riot gear is sometimes used for violent prisoners.

One of Mr. Padilla's lawyers, Orlando do Campo, said, however, that Mr. Padilla was a "completely docile" prisoner. "There was not one disciplinary problem with Jose ever, not one citation, not one act of disobedience," said Mr. do Campo, who is a lawyer at the Miami federal public defender's office.

In his affidavit, Mr. Patel said, "I was told by members of the brig staff that Mr. Padilla's temperament was so docile and inactive that his behavior was like that of 'a piece of furniture.' "

Federal prosecutors and defense lawyers are locked in a tug of war over the relevancy of Mr. Padilla's military detention to the present criminal case. Federal prosecutors have asked the judge to forbid Mr. Padilla's lawyers from mentioning the circumstances of his military detention during the trial, maintaining that their accusations could "distract and inflame the jury."

But defense lawyers say it is unconscionable to ignore Mr. Padilla's military detention because, among other reasons, it altered him in a way that will impinge on his trial.

Dr. Angela Hegarty, director of forensic psychiatry at the Creedmoor Psychiatric Center in Queens, N.Y., who examined Mr. Padilla for a total of 22 hours in June and September, said in an affidavit filed Friday that he "lacks the capacity to assist in his own defense."

"It is my opinion that as the result of his experiences during his detention and interrogation, Mr. Padilla does not appreciate the nature and consequences of the proceedings against him, is unable to render assistance to counsel, and has impairments in reasoning as the result of a mental illness, i.e., post-traumatic stress disorder, complicated by the neuropsychiatric effects of prolonged isolation," Dr. Hegarty said in an affidavit for the defense.

Mr. Padilla's status was abruptly changed to criminal defendant from enemy combatant last fall. At the time, the Supreme Court was weighing whether to take up the legality of his military detention — and thus the issue of the president's authority to seize an American citizen on American soil and hold him indefinitely without charges — when the Bush administration pre-empted its decision by filing criminal charges against Mr. Padilla.

Mr. Padilla was added as a defendant in a terrorism conspiracy case already under way in Miami. The strong public accusations made during his military detention — about the dirty bomb, Al Qaeda connections and supposed plans to set off natural gas explosions in apartment buildings — appear nowhere in the indictment against him. The indictment does not allege any specific violent plot against America.

Mr. Padilla is portrayed in the indictment as the recruit of a "North American terror support cell" that sent money, goods and recruits abroad to assist "global jihad" in general, with a special interest in Bosnia and Chechnya. Mr. Padilla, the indictment asserts, traveled overseas "to participate in violent jihad" and filled out an application for a mujahedin training camp in Afghanistan.

Michael Caruso, a public defender for Mr. Padilla, pleaded "absolutely not guilty" for him to charges of conspiracy and of providing material support to terrorists. Mr. Padilla faces two charges that each carry a maximum penalty of 15 years.

Over the summer, Judge Marcia G. Cooke of United States District Court in Miami threw out the most serious charge, of conspiracy to murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country, saying that it replicated accusations in the other counts and could lead to multiple punishments for a single crime. This was a setback for the government, which has appealed the dismissal.

Mr. Padilla's lawyers say they have had a difficult time persuading him that they are on his side.

From the time Mr. Padilla was allowed access to counsel, Mr. Patel visited him repeatedly in the brig and in the Miami detention center, and Mr. Padilla has observed Mr. Patel arguing on his behalf in Miami federal court.

But, Mr. Patel said in his affidavit, his client is nonetheless mistrustful. "Mr. Padilla remains unsure if I and the other attorneys working on his case are actually his attorneys or another component of the government's interrogation scheme," Mr. Patel said.

Mr. do Campo said that Mr. Padilla was not incommunicative, and that he expressed curiosity about what was going on in the world, liked to talk about sports and demonstrated particularly keen interest in the Chicago Bears.

But the defense lawyers' questions often echo the questions interrogators have asked Mr. Padilla, and when that happens, he gets jumpy and shuts down, the lawyers said.

Dr. Hegarty said Mr. Padilla refuses to review the video recordings of his interrogations, which have been released to his lawyers but remain classified.

He is especially reluctant to discuss what happened in the brig, fearful that he will be returned there some day, Mr. Patel said in his affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0101456

"During questioning, he often exhibits facial tics, unusual eye movements and contortions of his body," Mr. Patel said. "The contortions are particularly poignant since he is usually manacled and bound by a belly chain when he has meetings with counsel."

On Tape: An 'Enemy' Interrogation (NSWK)

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Newsweek

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - Lawyers for "enemy combatant" Jose Padilla claim he is so disoriented from three years of isolation and aggressive interrogations that he is now mentally ill. In new court filings, Padilla's lawyers also assert for the first time that Padilla's interrogations were taped, thereby providing a potentially extensive video record of how the government treated a man once considered a dangerous Qaeda operative.

U.S. officials have denied Padilla's claims that he was mistreated after he was thrown into a U.S. naval brig on orders from President Bush in June 2002. "It is our policy to treat all detainees humanely," said Pentagon spokesman J. D. Gordon. (A Justice spokesman declined to comment on the new claims about Padilla's mental state or the existence of tapes.) But the disputes about Padilla's treatment have raised issues that are likely to come up in future prosecutions, whether in regular criminal courts—where Padilla is due to be tried early next year—or in military commissions where the Bush administration plans to prosecute Qaeda figures. A former Chicago gang member and a U.S. citizen, Padilla was proclaimed an "enemy combatant" by Bush and denied access to a lawyer amid White House assertions he had plans to set off a radiological "dirty" bomb. Administration officials have since backed off that claim. Last year Padilla was removed from the brig and indicted in Miami on charges that he's part of a North American jihad cell that provided material support to Islamic extremists overseas.

Padilla's lawyers recently moved to have the entire case dropped because of government conduct that allegedly included subjecting him to sleep deprivation, extreme cold, injecting noxious fumes into his cell and giving him mind-altering drugs. Justice lawyers said there was not a "shred of record evidence" to support claims of "torture," but have declined to address specific interrogation techniques. Defense lawyers then submitted an affidavit from psychiatrist Dr. Angela Hegarty, who asserted Padilla was so "traumatized" by his treatment that he cannot bear to watch tapes of his interrogation, and when "approached by his lawyers, he begs them, 'Please, please, please' not to have to discuss his case." Hegarty says Padilla is suffering from post-traumatic-stress disorder and cannot assist in his defense—a claim that could be a basis to put off his trial. Another new affidavit says Padilla suffers from "facial tics" and bodily "contortions," and fears that his lawyers are government agents. Human-rights lawyer Scott Horton said he expects lawyers for other Qaeda detainees at Gitmo to make similar claims, and also to press for access to tapes of clients' interrogations. "This is going to wind up being an enormous issue," he said.

A Judge's Sharp Opinion (WP)

U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler issued a blunt indictment Friday of the Bush administration's legal handling of prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba. Frustrated with the plight of prisoners held without charges for years at the base, Kessler expressed disgust with the federal government's repeated efforts to block courts from hearing detainees' complaints.

Kessler's written opinion was particularly unusual in that it came in a ruling about a technicality. The Justice Department had asked her to dismiss the complaint of an Afghan detainee, Hamid al-Razak, and to bar him from ever seeking the court's help. Below is a portion of her denial of the government's motion:

-- Carol D. Leonnig

The Petitioner . . . identifies the legal, cultural, and psychological isolation in which the detainee exists which demonstrate his inability to challenge the legality of his detention. They are as follows:

He is a resident of Afghanistan.

He has had virtually no contact with the news media or any word from outside the closed Guantanamo prison system for over 3 years.

He has had no contact with his friends or family members outside Guantanamo.

He is unfamiliar with the United States Court System.

He does not speak English.

He likely does not know what the term Habeas Corpus means.

He has no criminal charges against him.

He has every reason to distrust his captors and keepers.

He has every reason to rely on the friendship with other detainees, who speak his language and suffer the same disabilities.

He has every reason to challenge his confinement.

No party outside Guantanamo is aware of the specific camp in which he is being detained, nor the "grade" or "level" of detention he is presumed to be, each level being determinative of the privileges he receives.

He does not have access to a law library.

He cannot communicate with his attorney, nor does he even know at present that he has an attorney.

He has no expectation of release, ever.

In light of these facts, there can be little doubt in the Court's mind that Mr. Al Razak is not able to challenge the legality of his detention. . . .

The fact that some of the unfortunate petitioners who have been detained for many years in the terrible conditions at Guantanamo Bay have been knowledgeable enough to file their own petitions certainly does not demonstrate that Mr. Al Razak himself had either the sophistication, or confidence in the American justice system which has so delayed ruling on his status without even filing criminal charges against him, or the physical or mental stability, to do so on his own.

Finally, the Government has offered no evidence to contradict Petitioner's statements that he . . . knows that Mr. Al Razak wants a lawyer to assert his legal rights. . . .

In numerous cases, the Court has felt compelled, for purposes of judicial economy and efficiency, to grant Respondents' Motions to stay proceedings of the Guantanamo Bay cases until completion of related appeals. The longer those appellate proceedings drag on, the more problematic it becomes as to whether a stay serves the interest of justice. It is often said that "justice delayed is justice denied."

Nothing could be closer to the truth with reference to the Guantanamo Bay cases.

Pentagon Invoking Emergency Authority For Guantanamo Court (MBSN/MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News/McClatchy, December 4, 2006

MIAMI - The Pentagon is invoking emergency authority to fast-track funding of a comprehensive war-crimes court compound at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to a letter to Congress obtained by The Miami Herald.

Department of Defense spokesmen would not say when - if ever - the Pentagon had last invoked similar authority.

Nor would they specify which military construction already approved by Congress would be frozen to fund the courtroom project, which could cost as much as $125 million, according to U.S. government documents.

But, in a Nov. 17 letter to several Republican and Democratic senators and House members, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England explains the unusual move this way:

"Due to national security implications and extreme urgency, emergency construction was authorized pursuant to Section 2808 of title 10, United States Code."

Congressional staff members say the price tag and the funding mechanism have stirred protests among key members of Congress with fiscal and operational oversight of the Department of Defense.

The Pentagon wants to build, in three months, a mini-city on an abandoned airfield to stage the trials - two new courtrooms with space for two more, dining, housing and work space for up to 1,200 military and civilians working at the trials, and media, conference and classified information centers.

At issue is how swiftly and at what cost the Pentagon will kick-start its on-again, off-again Military Commissions process at the U.S. Navy base.

The military envisions night-and-day court sessions in at least two courtrooms to allege war crimes against about one-fifth of the so-called enemy combatants held as terror suspects at Guantanamo, some since early 2002.

An internal worksheet for what would be Project 68043 says the Pentagon anticipates trying "75 to 80" of the 430 or so detainees under an "increased operations tempo."

In a bipartisan move, Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and the man who will succeed him in the next Congress, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., have filed a letter of protest, say congressional staff members who asked that they not be named because they were not authorized to speak to reporters.

Moreover, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, wrote England in a two-page letter dated Nov. 29 that, while he understands the need for more facilities, the price tag "is a little excessive at this point," said Hunter spokesman Josh Holly.

Hunter has been a key supporter of the Bush administration's detention policy, and last year staged a photo opportunity on Capitol Hill - in which he presented a Guantanamo lemon chicken meal - to answer critics who contend detainees are abused at the facility in southeast Cuba.

But on the court complex, Duncan "would urge significant reductions of costs through greater use of temporary portable or modular structures," added Holly.

"There's no need to build something that needs to be down there for 30 years."

The Pentagon would not elaborate, but it appears to be relying on a National Emergency Construction Authority Executive Order, which President Bush signed more than five years ago - after the Sept. 11, 2001, World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks.

The compound would supplement an existing courtroom, lock-up, office space and security facilities. The Bush administration had held pre-trial hearings there, until the U.S. Supreme Court in June declared them unconstitutional on a challenge by Osama bin Laden's driver.

Now, armed with a new Military Commissions law, the Pentagon is preparing to hold multiple trials in multiple venues - even as Justice and Defense Department lawyers are still writing new guidelines for new trials.

Moreover, new legislation introduced by Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., in the lame-duck Congress, seeks to redesign the court system again and, significantly, accelerate civilian court scrutiny of the system's constitutionality.

Unclear is what defense projects will be set aside and put at risk with the extraordinary move.

Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman said in a Nov. 28 e-mail to The Miami Herald that "offsets have been identified."

Rep. Jim Walsh, R-N.Y., who chairs the House subcommittee on military appropriations, over the weekend declared his opposition to the Pentagon move, too.

Diverting money "would affect military readiness, and we're at war," the 18-year veteran congressman was quoted as saying in the Post-Standard of Syracuse. "It sounds like their priorities are skewed."

In the letter, England asks the Congress members to support a future request to restore the projects that the emergency move would preempt - an idea that Hunter replied was unlikely to succeed.

Also unclear is the true cost of the project.

A Navy presolicitation notice to would-be builders, dated Nov. 3, with a response deadline of Dec. 20, put the value of the project at $75 million to $125 million, and a fast-track deadline of July 2007.

England's Nov. 17 letter put the price tag at $102 million - and did not explain the discrepancy.

The CIA And The Militant Who Eluded It In Norway (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

OSLO -- Two months after he helped kidnap a Muslim cleric in Italy, records show, an undercover CIA officer boarded a flight to Norway on another secret mission. Two other U.S. spies followed a few weeks later and checked into the same hotel.

Shortly after the agents arrived in the spring of 2003, an Islamic militant living in Oslo known as Mullah Krekar received a warning from an anonymous Norwegian official, according to Krekar's lawyer. The message: Krekar, then head of a Kurdish insurgent group, was a CIA target and should watch his back.

The spies left Norway by the end of the summer, according to records of their travels compiled by European investigators. If the CIA was planning to abduct Krekar, like other Islamic radicals it had secretly apprehended in Europe after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, those plans were quietly abandoned.

But it would not be the first or last time that the U.S. government had sought to push Krekar out of Norway. For more than a decade, the Kurdish cleric had enjoyed protection in the Nordic country as a political refugee, even as he frequently slipped back into his homeland in northern Iraq to lead an armed separatist movement called Ansar al-Islam, which has carried out attacks on civilians and U.S. troops.

The case shows how the United States has struggled to deal with Islamic militants who are allowed to live freely in Europe despite being labeled serious security risks. Others have included radical clerics in London and supporters of the Hamburg cell responsible for the Sept. 11 hijackings.

But the pursuit of Krekar also demonstrates how U.S. tactics in confronting those militants have sometimes backfired, giving ammunition to critics who accuse the Bush administration of skirting the law or relying on questionable evidence.

Before the invasion of Iraq, the U.S. government publicly portrayed Krekar and his network as an organizational link between al-Qaeda and the government of Saddam Hussein. Under pressure to prove that connection, the United States tried a variety of tactics to forcibly remove Krekar from Norway and hand him over to friendly security services in the Middle East.

Each attempt failed. Today, although the Norwegian government has declared Krekar a security threat and ordered him deported, the mullah is still in Oslo.

Most evidence against him remains classified. But other charges have been refuted in court or publicly discredited, including allegations by U.S. and Iraqi officials that Krekar ordered followers to carry out suicide bombings and that Ansar controlled a chemical weapons factory.

"At first, I didn't think I had done anything that was a threat to the Americans," Krekar said in an interview. "Later, some people told me I had become a target, but I didn't think the Americans would come for me themselves. They wanted to use me, to show that there was a link between Saddam and al-Qaeda."

The intense U.S. interest in Krekar came at a time when the CIA was targeting other Islamic radicals in Europe for "extraordinary rendition," the clandestine practice of seizing terrorism suspects and transferring them to allied nations that sometimes practice torture. Among suspects grabbed by the CIA: a Muslim cleric in Milan, two Arabs living in Stockholm and two others from Germany.

The CIA and the U.S. Embassy in Norway declined to comment on whether Krekar was a rendition target. In a prepared statement for this article, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said, "The United States continues to consider Krekar to be a threat to national security, and we think the same with respect to Ansar al-Islam."

U.S. officials have made no secret of their desire to see Krekar booted from his Scandinavian haven. As secretary of state, Colin L. Powell repeatedly urged his Norwegian counterparts to expel Krekar, singling out Ansar al-Islam as proof of a connection between the Iraqi government and al-Qaeda in a February 2003 speech to the United Nations.

In August 2003, a few weeks after the CIA operatives left Oslo, Attorney General John Ashcroft made his own trip to this nation of 4.6 million people to ratchet up the pressure. He called Ansar "a very dangerous group," whose leaders "merit the very close attention of those who are fighting terrorism."Made 'Bigger Than He Is'

Krekar, whose real name is Najumuddin Faraj Ahmad, is 50 years old. Fluent in four languages and sporting a bushy black beard, he has become a celebrity in Norway. He has published an autobiography -- "My Own Words" -- and aggressively defended his reputation, saying he quit as Ansar's leader in 2002.

Even as he denies involvement in terrorism, he has praised those who practice it. In an interview with a Kurdish newspaper in June 2006, he called al-Qaeda's founder, Osama bin Laden, "a good Muslim" and wished him a long life. He also lamented the "bad news" about the recent death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, chief of al-Qaeda forces in Iraq. "But I am not sad, because he went to paradise," Krekar added.

Krekar has also been questioned by European counterterrorism investigators about his alleged ties to radicals in Germany, Sweden, Italy and Spain, though none of those countries has filed charges against him.

"Everyone -- the Americans, the Islamists, the Norwegian government -- has built up Mullah Krekar into someone bigger than he is, into a symbol," said Brynjar Meling, one of his Norwegian attorneys. "And he has let them do this."

Krekar hasn't always been an enemy of the United States. He fled northern Iraq in 1990 and received asylum in Norway after claiming he had been persecuted by Saddam Hussein's security services.

After the Persian Gulf War of 1991, he returned for long visits to his Kurdish homeland, which was under the protection of U.S. warplanes maintaining a "no-fly" zone. In early 2001, he said, he and other Kurdish leaders met with three CIA officers to discuss how to overthrow Hussein.

Later that year, Krekar founded Ansar al-Islam, or Followers of Islam. The network carved out a small territory near the Iranian border and engaged in skirmishes with other Kurdish factions. U.S. counterterrorism officials suspected that Ansar sheltered al-Qaeda fugitives who had fled Afghanistan after the U.S. invasion there in 2001.

In September 2002, after crossing the mountainous border with Iran, Krekar was detained by Iranian authorities and put on a flight to Amsterdam. Upon landing, he was arrested again, this time by Dutch authorities, who said he was wanted for extradition to Jordan on drug charges.

Krekar said that the allegations were trumped up and that he had never been to Jordan. His attorneys said U.S. officials had orchestrated the detention.

Dutch officials confirmed U.S. involvement in the case but didn't elaborate. "You can assume the Americans have an interest," Dutch Justice Ministry spokesman Martin Bruinsma told reporters.

While he was held in Amsterdam, Krekar said, he was questioned by FBI agents on two occasions, even though he wasn't wanted on U.S. charges. "They wanted to talk about al-Qaeda," he recalled. "I didn't answer anything. I said, 'Just ask about me and my group.' "

Krekar was released in January 2003 after Jordan failed to provide detailed evidence against him. He flew to Oslo, where authorities weren't eager to let him return but didn't have a legal basis for refusing him entry.In U.S. Spies' Sights

Three months later, on April 24, a CIA officer arrived in Oslo on an SAS flight from New York. He checked into the Radisson SAS Plaza Hotel in Oslo, a few blocks from Krekar's apartment, and registered as an employee of a fictitious technology firm in Hyattsville, Md.

The same CIA officer, using a false cover name, had been present in Milan two months earlier for the abduction of a radical Muslim cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, according to Italian prosecutors.

Nasr was taken to Egypt, where he says he was tortured. Italian authorities have filed kidnapping charges against 25 CIA operatives, including the officer who later flew to Norway. None has been arrested.

The spies' European travels were reconstructed by Italian investigators who traced their frequent-flier and credit-card account records. The existence of the records was first reported by Stavanger Aftenblad, a Norwegian newspaper.

Four days after the CIA officer arrived in Oslo, Krekar's attorney, Meling, said he received a warning about his client from a Norwegian government source, via an intermediary. Although the message was vague, it made clear that U.S. spies had Krekar in their sights. In response, the lawyer wrote a letter to Norwegian police, requesting extra protection for Krekar.

The CIA operative left Norway on May 18. But two weeks later, he was replaced by a female U.S. spy -- also charged in the Italian kidnapping case -- who flew to Oslo from Chicago.

She was joined a month later by another female agent, according to Stavanger Aftenblad. Both women registered under fictitious names and businesses and rented a car for a month, the newspaper reported. Both left the country by summer's end.

What else the spies did in Norway is unknown. But at the time of their visit, their cover was jeopardized as rumors swirled about their presence in Oslo.

In May 2003, local news media reported that the Norwegian government had approved plans for undercover U.S. agents to come to Norway to investigate Islamic radicals, including Krekar. Norwegian officials would not confirm or deny the reports but said foreign intelligence agents would not be allowed to operate in the country independently.

Meanwhile, Norwegian authorities, with the aid of intelligence provided by U.S. officials, tried to deal with Krekar in other ways.

The cleric was arrested on the eve of the invasion of Iraq in March 2003 but released a few weeks later for lack of evidence. Later that year, Norwegian prosecutors opened another investigation, this time focusing on allegations that Krekar had ordered Ansar recruits to stage suicide bombings in Iraq.

The case hinged on a key witness: a would-be suicide bomber who was captured in Iraq and handed over to U.S. forces. The failed bomber told Iraqi officials that Krekar was behind the plot. When he was interviewed by Norwegian investigators in Baghdad, however, the man recanted, saying he had been tortured until he agreed to testify against Krekar.

Norwegian immigration officials have tried for years to kick Krekar out of the country. Citing classified evidence, the government first declared Krekar a threat to national security in 2003 and ordered him deported.

He has appealed to the courts, where he has lost repeatedly. On Nov. 22, an appellate court upheld the government's decision, declaring, "Reasons exist to fear that the plaintiff has links with terrorist activities and groups."

But chances are remote he'll have to leave Oslo anytime soon.

Under Norwegian law, no one can be deported to a country where he or she could face torture or the death penalty. Judges in Norway have ruled that Iraq is such a place and will probably remain that way for years.

"I think Mullah Krekar can get a mortgage and prepare for a long and secure stay in Norway," Arvid Sjoedin, another of his attorneys, said last month.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

'Visa Lite' Program Studied To Ease Travel (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

U.S. officials are providing more details of the president's proposal to broaden the Visa Waiver Program, sketching an ambitious plan for an electronic "visa lite" system that would enable travelers to be cleared against terrorism and immigration watch lists before reaching the United States.

In remarks in Europe last week, President Bush addressed complaints from the leaders of several of the post-Soviet democracies about the restrictive requirements for the program, under which citizens of 27 participating nations are entitled to travel to the United States for up to three months for business or pleasure without a visa.

Mr. Bush said officials in Estonia had been "straightforward and very frank" about the issue. He said there was "deep concern" that people from countries fighting alongside the U.S. military in Iraq weren't able to travel to the United States as freely as they would like.

The issue also arose in Latvia, and had been raised with Mr. Bush by Poland and other former East Bloc countries that are now U.S. allies and in some cases members of NATO and/or the European Union.

Mr. Bush promised last week to send a proposal to Congress to modify the program, "to make sure that nations like Estonia qualify more quickly," while strengthening security.

On Wednesday, the Department of Homeland Security laid down broad outlines of the reform package Mr. Bush would be sending to Congress. They include the new "visa lite" system called an "electronic travel authorization," which would be issued to passport holders before they traveled to the United States, as well as better information-sharing by new member nations on lost and stolen passports and criminal and terrorist watch lists and higher standards for their document and airport security.

In return for subscribing to these additional security measures, officials said, nations that wanted to join the program would be granted flexibility on other requirements of membership, such as the less than 3 percent refusal rate on visa applications.

"We know that, realistically, there are some [countries] that are not going to make the 3 percent bar," said Homeland Security Department spokesman Jarrod Agen, adding that the focus of such measures was on a pre-September 11 conception of how the program might be abused, "looking at economic factors and illegal migration."

After A Rush To Make Repairs, Pace Of Levee Work Downshifts (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — For months, the Army Corps of Engineers raced through the city, frantically patching broken levees and building floodgates to prepare for a hurricane season, now ended, that produced no hurricanes here.

That repair work is essentially complete and the corps has moved on to the task of strengthening flood protection in New Orleans beyond its pre-Hurricane Katrina level, hoping to entice residents back. But lately the bulldozers have been idle, and the trucks motionless. The pace has slowed, those in the region say, with little trace of the round-the-clock frenzy of the first phase.

"We don't see that anymore," said Ivor van Heerden, deputy director of the hurricane center at Louisiana State University.

Contractors are waiting impatiently for the chance to bid on jobs. "By now, I would have expected there to be many more jobs bid and under way," said Robert Boh, the head of Boh Brothers, a major local contractor. "We're going to dance as soon as anyone asks us."

The change of pace is obvious to nonexperts as well. Willis Reed, 64, who was fishing at Lake Pontchartrain along a levee that is to grow higher by several feet, said the contrast between the first phase and the second phase was striking. These days, Mr. Reed said, it seems that "Everybody's dragging a leg." Even some within the corps say things should have been well under way by now. An engineer who left the corps, and was granted anonymity because he continues to work with the agency, said, "We should have been turning dirt months ago."

The new, $6 billion phase involves raising the levees above their new levels, armoring the most vulnerable against erosion and creating pump stations to block the surge from Lake Pontchartrain in future storms.

Instead of the placid bank of earthen levee behind the spot where Mr. Reed was fishing, bulldozers could be shaping the terrain to add height and width to the levee. Dump trucks could be bringing their heavy loads of clay-rich earth drawn from borrow pits in the area. But for now there is no noise to disturb Mr. Reed.

Corps officials say the early work was done in the spirit of addressing a crisis, when they had broad latitude to get the job done. Officials on the ground, who call the current lull a "strategic pause," say the new work has to be planned with great care. And they say it is a greater challenge to design and build new flood protection — the bulk of the second-phase work — than it is to patch breaches.

"The laws of physics have not been repealed," said Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, commander and chief of engineers for the corps. "It takes time to think through what needs to be done. It takes time to make things happen. You don't move 5.5 million cubic yards of earth overnight."

All the new projects are still being designed and their contracts drawn up, but already the corps has postponed a two-day industry forum that was scheduled for last week to familiarize contractors with work that had been expected to be awarded within the next three or four months.

Since levees that are built higher must also become much wider, land has to be acquired. And these days, state and local governments, neighborhood groups, historical societies and others must be consulted before the corps can push forward.

Some trees have grown too close to the toes of levees, which has been identified by experts as one possible cause of some of the breaches that led to the city's flooding. Some homeowners have fought the corps' plans to remove the trees. At community meetings, corps officials have been criticized by residents who argue that the city's sheltering trees give it much of its character. They also said the loss of trees would lower their property values.

It is all very different from the first phase, when the corps group known as Task Force Guardian worked in a city so deeply devastated that virtually no one questioned its plans.

"Guardian kicked down the door," said Walter O. Baumy Jr., chief of the engineering division for the corps' New Orleans District, who worked with the group. "We didn't stop for pretty much anything," Mr. Baumy said, and "we were able to get a lot of cooperation from everybody."

Now, Task Force Guardian has been replaced by the Hurricane Protection Office, which works alongside the district. "We still have that same sense of urgency," Mr. Baumy said, but with so many local organizations back on their feet since the storm, "we're not making decisions alone at this point."

Col. Jeff Bedey, who heads the Hurricane Protection Office, said that what appeared to be a slowdown was just an absence of obvious work like digging and piling dirt; Colonel Bedey said that the planning and contract work was proceeding rapidly. The corps, he added, does not want to build another "system in name only," as its own report referred to the pre-Katrina patchwork of components that failed.

"We've got one opportunity here," he said, "and we've got to do this right."

The challenges are enormous. Congress has ordered the Army Corps to upgrade the city's hurricane protection system to standards first authorized in 1965 — goals that were not reached because of a series of compromises and mistakes, the corps has admitted.

After those standards are reached, the corps must upgrade the system further, to resist a storm that has a 1 in 100 chance of occurring in any given year.

It is also becoming increasingly clear that the billions of dollars in appropriations will not cover the New Orleans area projects Congress has ordered the corps to take on. The situation, in the short run, could require the corps to go back to lawmakers for the authority to move some appropriated money around. Eventually, corps officials say, more money from Congress may be necessary.

To save money, the corps will skip interim steps on some projects and go straight for the higher, 100-year level of protection. But that will leave the city at risk until 2010 at least, say those who oppose the move. The corps has also scaled back plans to armor the levees against being scoured away when water flows over the top. An editorial in The New Orleans Times-Picayune described that cost-saving consideration as "a horrifying argument from an agency whose lack of foresight and competence caused a deadly and costly catastrophe."

But Colonel Bedey said the corps would probably be criticized no matter what it did.

The agency still has not finished its first-phase work on the floodgates for the city's drainage canals. At the $85 million 17th Street Canal project, which has presented the most challenges, the corps has had to do extra work to firm up the mushy soil at the site, and new pumps have had technical problems. There are also not enough pumps at the site to push the enormous amounts of water that would drain into the canals during a hurricane.

Whether the corps is working deliberately and responsibly or "dragging a leg" and falling into old bureaucratic ways is difficult to determine at this early stage, said G. Wayne Clough, president of the Georgia Institute of Technology and chairman of the National Research Council committee that reviewed the corps' post-Katrina investigation. Still, Mr. Clough added, "If they don't get started soon, they will lose momentum, and that's a concern."

What is essential, he said, is oversight from an outside, neutral group — the main recommendation of his committee.

For their part, New Orleans residents say that they want to see more progress from the corps, but that they are cheered by the progress in neighborhoods like Lakeview and Broadmoor, where homeowners are doggedly rebuilding.

Emile Bruneau, a longtime state representative whose renovations on his home in Lakeview are coming along, said, "I'm disappointed by the slowness" of the corps, and added, "If I was the corps, given the colossal failure that their engineering caused here, I would be making every effort to assure as expeditiously as possible that this would never happen again."

Still, Mr. Bruneau said, "Lakeview is going to be fine."

He said the vacant lots where ruined houses had been cleared away reminded him of the 1960s, when the development was first filling up.

Some residents are building for the future without waiting for the corps. One home in the Lakeview neighborhood is being raised on jacks by about 10 feet. Another Hurricane Katrina might not even dampen its carpets.

Whatever the corps does to protect this vulnerable city, homeowners know that the rules of real estate have changed forever.

Instead of "location, location, location," now it's "elevation, elevation, elevation."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Memo Was Part Of Bush Plan, Officials Say (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0101464

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush has been actively soliciting ideas and proposals about a course correction in Iraq from an array of senior aides, congressional and military leaders, Iraqi officials and others, and plans to announce a "new way forward" soon, senior administration officials said Sunday.

National security advisor Stephen Hadley and Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad sought to portray Bush's actions as a bold leadership step, not a reaction to calls for a change in strategy by the Iraq Study Group, congressional Democrats and even his own outgoing Defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

They said an internal Rumsfeld memo proposing major changes in Iraq policy that surfaced publicly Saturday was actually part of that initiative, not an admission of failure or a reflection of dissension.

"The president had asked agencies to begin a review of our policy in Iraq, and what Secretary Rumsfeld did, I think, very helpfully, was put together a sort of laundry list of ideas that ought to be considered," Hadley told ABC's "This Week."

"We have to make some changes," he said. "We need a new way forward in Iraq, and that's what this policy review is all about."

On CBS' "Face The Nation," Hadley said there was no timetable for the plan, but "I think it's going to be weeks, not months."

Khalilzad told CNN's "Late Edition" that the efforts by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group — which is expected to release a report Wednesday calling for gradual troop withdrawal — helped spur the administration into seeking its own alternatives on what to do next, particularly from top officials like Rumsfeld.

"It is energizing to review and adjust," Khalilzad said.

Bush repeatedly has rejected a wholesale pullout of troops, or what the White House calls artificially imposed deadlines, saying Thursday: "This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

On Sunday, Hadley and Khalilzad emphasized that even as the president considers calls for a drawdown by the study group, Rumsfeld, Democrats in Congress and others, his main goal is to shift responsibility to Iraqi political and military leaders and force them to more quickly assume control of the country.

The White House is preparing for an important week in the increasingly contentious debate over Iraq, focusing not only on whether — and when — U.S. troops should be withdrawn, but on administration fears that Iraqi officials will not be able to keep their country from plunging deeper into civil war among Kurds, Shiites and Sunni Arabs.

Officials are particularly concerned whether Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and his government can stand up to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr and his armed followers, whom U.S. officials have characterized as "death squads."

Bush is to meet today with Abdelaziz Hakim, a Shiite cleric and Sadr's main rival, to discuss ways of stanching the bloodshed and strengthening Maliki's fractured government.

Hakim, who is linked to a militia blamed for some of the sectarian killing, will press Bush to accelerate the handover of security control to Iraq in exchange for promises to rein in militias accused of using the Shiite-dominated police force as a cover for killing Sunnis, said Sheik Diyadhin Fayadh, a senior member of the Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. He will also reassure Bush that Iran will not be allowed to exert undue influence in Iraq, Fayadh said.

Khalilzad said the meeting with Hakim and one planned with Iraqi Vice President Tariq Hashimi, a Sunni leader, are designed to give Bush a chance to encourage Iraqis "to come together, to unite, to reconcile, and to confront extremists."

The officials' appearances on the Sunday television shows came on the heels of two embarrassing leaks, both to the New York Times, concerning the administration's efforts in Iraq. The first disclosed a classified memo from Hadley to Bush expressing concerns about Maliki's leadership abilities. That came Wednesday, just before a meeting between Bush and the Iraqi.

The second came Saturday, when an internal Nov. 6 memo from Rumsfeld to Bush surfaced in which the Defense secretary acknowledged that the current strategy in Iraq "is not working well enough or fast enough."

Rumsfeld, who resigned two days after writing the memo, called for a "major adjustment" in U.S. strategy. His proposals included calls for the administration to be more "minimalist" in its goals in Iraq and its troop presence. Many were similar to ideas pushed by Democrats in Congress.

Noting the similarities, some Democrats on Sunday condemned Rumsfeld's memo, saying it was emblematic of an administration that was too inflexible on Iraq until after the GOP's crushing electoral defeat that cost it control of Congress.

Others said they still doubted that Bush would offer a substantially new plan. "I don't think he listens to Republicans, and he doesn't listen to Democrats," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said on "Late Edition." "He listens only to the selected few around him who essentially cater to this 'stay the course' theory."

Some Republicans were also critical of the White House's promises of change.

"We have to have a reality check here. And memos being leaked and all of that — that's interesting Shakespearean drama," Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told CBS. "But bottom line is, if for no other reason, we need a policy worthy of the young men and women serving in Iraq today. And we don't have one."

Adviser Says Bush Plans To Review Panel's Report And Make 'Significant Changes' On Iraq (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — President Bush plans "significant changes" in his approach to Iraq after he reviews options drafted by an outside panel of experts and suggestions from others in the administration and Congress, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said Sunday.

Mr. Hadley, whose own internal memo expressing doubts about the Iraqi leadership stirred a debate when it was disclosed last week, said Mr. Bush would announce "a new way forward" in Iraq in the coming weeks, once he goes through the recommendations from various groups.

Among the options to be examined are those expected to be released on Wednesday from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton. The group has spent most of the last year studying Iraq strategy.

"The president has said that what is going on in Iraq is not going well enough or fast enough," Mr. Hadley said on the NBC News program "Meet the Press." "The president said we need to make changes. Some of those changes are going to be significant changes."

Mr. Hadley said, however, that the principal goal of helping Iraq become a self-governing country that can defend itself would remain, and that a withdrawal of troops "regardless of what was happening on the ground" would not be adopted.

"That's cut and run, and, of course, as the president has said, cut and run is not his cup of tea," Mr. Hadley said.

Asked when Mr. Bush planned to report to Americans on his own conclusions, Mr. Hadley said, "I think it's going to be weeks, not months."

Mr. Hadley described a leaked memo written by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that called for "a major adjustment" in approach on Iraq, possibly including troop redeployments or withdrawals, as part of the overall review being conducted by the president.

"What Secretary Rumsfeld did, I think very helpfully, was put together a sort of laundry list of ideas that ought to be considered as part of that review," Mr. Hadley said on the ABC News program "This Week," referring to the memo.

Mr. Hadley used the phrase "laundry list" to characterize Mr. Rumsfeld's suggestions on each of his three television appearances on Sunday, the third one being "Face the Nation" on CBS News.

He also said that despite his own memo expressing doubts about Iraq and the leadership of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, President Bush had confidence in Mr. Maliki and would work hard to help the Iraqis accelerate their training of military and security forces.

"They're not there yet," Mr. Hadley said of the Iraqi government on "This Week." "They face enormous challenges. They don't have all the tools that they need." He said that when Mr. Bush met Mr. Maliki in Amman, Jordan, last week, they resolved to find ways to help the Iraqis "get greater capabilities" and "more responsibility."

In Mr. Hadley's memo, written on Nov. 8 after he had met with Mr. Maliki in Baghdad, he said it was unclear whether Mr. Maliki was misinformed about violence in Iraq or unwilling or unable to curb sectarian violence, including the spread of Shiite militias loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, one of Mr. Maliki's most important political allies.

But on Sunday, Mr. Hadley said that, since then, the administration had become convinced that Mr. Maliki was doing his best to go after the militias and assume greater responsibility for Iraq's security.

"That memo was written early in the review process, in the first week of November, as a result of a trip I took," Mr. Hadley said on "Meet the Press." "We have been making assessments in a variety of agencies to try and answer the questions I posed in that memo."

After meeting with Mr. Maliki, Mr. Hadley said, Mr. Bush drew the conclusion that, as he put it last week, the Iraqi leader was "the right guy" for Iraq.

On Sunday, Mr. Hadley was repeatedly asked about his memo, which was disclosed in The New York Times last week. He denied that its disclosure was in any way authorized by the White House or his office. He said leaking it was "an effort to embarrass" Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki on the eve of their summit meeting.

"It was outrageous," he said of the disclosure. "It could have cast a pall over this meeting, a meeting that was very important to Iraqis and to Americans to chart the future in Iraq." He declined to say whether the White House would investigate who disclosed the memo.

Analysis: Bush Parries Pressure On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 3, 2006

President Bush has walked a fine line between embracing the mission of a bipartisan, high-profile advisory panel on Iraq and maintaining enough distance not to be bound by all — or even most — of its upcoming recommendations.

This week, the congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group presents Bush with its suggestions for a new way forward in the increasingly messy and unpopular war. Hopes went sky-high that the commission has devised a winning prescription for the beleaguered U.S. effort, now well into its fourth year with violence not abating.

Expectations rose in part because two of Washington's most respected graybeards lead the group: Bush family loyalist James A. Baker III, a former secretary of state, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission that produced a gold-standard report on fighting terrorism.

Aware the study group could recommend some bitter prescriptions, the White House has indicated it will take the advice seriously but not accept it automatically. The president says the report will be only one of many he will consider and still insists that American troops should stay in Iraq until the country can take care of itself.

"We are not going to outsource the business of handling the war in Iraq," press secretary Tony Snow said in October when questions began arising about the panel.

Since then, Bush has ordered examinations of Iraq policy throughout the administration, anchored by a review of military options by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Bush has heard his team's consolidated but still-incomplete conclusions and is expected to get the final report in about two weeks.

Last week, the president portrayed his meeting in Jordan with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as part of conducting his own due diligence. Continuing that effort, Bush meets on Monday with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the Shiite leader of the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament. Next month, Bush will see Iraq's Sunni vice president.

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, emphasized that the White House will not "shoot from the hip" following the study group's Wednesday presentation. Do not expect an immediate response, Hadley said, but one probably weeks off.

"America is ready to make changes to better support the unity government of Iraq," the president said in his Saturday radio address. "I want to hear all advice before I make any decisions about adjustments to our strategy in Iraq."

Hours after he spoke, it was disclosed by The New York Times that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for major changes in tactics two days before he resigned as defense secretary.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote in a Nov. 6 memo to the White House. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign-policy scholar at the Brookings Institution whom the Iraq Study Group consulted, said Bush's parallel maneuvers are not merely attempts to get in front of what may be unpleasant options.

The independent panel took stock of current, smart thinking on Iraq across a broad spectrum. But, O'Hanlon said, it did not do the detailed digging necessary to craft the sort of radical changes needed to turn the tide in Iraq — meaning Bush can go a different direction without too much cost.

"Many got their expectations too high," O'Hanlon said.

Bush's traditional pattern is also at work as he considers how to handle the 100 pages of advice — all nonbinding — he is about to receive.

He often strenuously resists outside recommendations for action, then pivots to embrace them as his own when pressure becomes irresistible.

The president opposed creation of the Sept. 11 commission in the first place, as well as the establishment of a catchall Homeland Security Department. Bush later changed his mind on both points, and ran campaigns on putting in place that commission's recommendations, and against Democrats who balked at the way he wanted to structure the Homeland Security behemoth.

"He believes that his best chance of getting closer to what he wants is to do it this way," said Bruce Buchanan, a University of Texas political scientist who long has studied the Bush family. "What he wants now is to be perceived as still in charge and not pushed into receivership by a group of wise heads."

Seeking to shift Iraq policy more toward diplomacy, for instance, the panel is expected to call for direct pleas for help from Iran and Syria.

Bush remains cool to that idea, publicly and privately. Those Iraq neighbors are the United States' most vexing rivals in the Middle East and two countries that the U.S. has blamed for destabilizing Iraq and fomenting global terrorist activity.

So in recent days, the White House undertook a pre-emptive flurry of Iraq-focused diplomacy with Mideast nations considered friends, such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan. At the same time, the in-house review is considering reducing the administration's role as a middleman in some of the most contentious fights between Iraq's fractious sectarian and political factions, say officials familiar with the process.

The Baker commission also will endorse a phased withdrawal of troops, perhaps beginning early next year and not conditioned on progress by Iraqi security forces, according to officials familiar with the group's deliberations. The U.S. force posture could be changed — focused less on front-line fighting and more on support and intelligence.

Bush has rejected any American military drawdown before Iraqi security forces are capable. But the panel is not expected to urge a timetable. Because that is not directly at odds with the president's position, it could give him cover to accept some sort of redeployment.

"He's positioning it so he has the opportunity to take it a la carte, or more if he wants," said Frederick Barton, co-director of the Post-Conflict Reconstruction Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Buchanan predicted Bush would "grab the things he can accept and portray that as being cooperative."

The president will have to hope that works.

Otherwise, restive Democrats, who won control of Congress in last month's elections in large part because of public dissatisfaction with the war, could try to force him into a specific timeline for troops to come home.

"Redeployment is now the accepted next step" in both parties, said Ivo Daalder, a White House national security aide in the Clinton administration. "So he's pretty alone in saying we should not redeploy."

Aide: Bush Not Seeking Cover For Pullout (AP)

By Ben Feller

While President Bush acknowledges the need for major changes in Iraq, he will not use this week's Iraq Study Group report as political cover for bringing troops home, his national security adviser said Sunday.

"We have not failed in Iraq," Stephen Hadley said as he made the talk show rounds. "We will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed."

But he added: "The president understands that we need to have a way forward in Iraq that is more successful."

The White House readied for an important week in the debate over Iraq: Bush planned a meeting Monday with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the Shiite leader of the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament, and awaited the recommendations Wednesday from the bipartisan commission.

Yet his administration, hoping to find a new way ahead in Iraq, found itself on the defensive from the second recent leak of an insider's memo on Iraq in a week.

The latest, first reported in Sunday's New York Times, showed that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for a "major adjustment" in U.S. tactics on Nov. 6 — the day before an election that cost Republicans the Congress and Rumsfeld his job as defense secretary.

Hadley played down the memo as simply a laundry list of ideas rather than a call for a new course of action.

He said that Bush — just before a pivotal election — was not portraying a different sense of the war to the public than his own defense secretary was giving him in private.

The president "has said publicly what Rumsfeld said, that things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," Hadley said.

Democrats did not buy that.

"The Rumsfeld memo makes it quite clear that one of the greatest concerns is the political fallout from changing course here in the United States," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "The bottom line is there is no one, including the former secretary, who thought the policy the president continues to pursue makes any sense."

Bush has nominated Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld. His confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee is on Tuesday.

As pressure builds for a new strategy, the report from the Iraq Study Group increasingly is viewed as perhaps clearing the way for a U.S. exit strategy in Iraq. Hadley, though, said the review will be just one factor the White House considers, along with views of congressional leaders, U.S. military commanders and the Iraqi government.

Once the president is comfortable on how to proceed, he will spell out his plan publicly in the coming weeks, Hadley said.

Bush repeatedly has rejected a wholesale pullout or what he calls artificial deadlines, saying Thursday, "This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

Hadley said Bush was trying to address those who contend the commission "was just going to be cover for an American withdrawal, almost regardless of what was happening on the ground. And the president needed, and felt he needed to stop that right there. That isn't graceful withdrawal, that's cut and run. And, of course, as the president's said, cut and run is not his cup of tea."

Hadley said the goal remains to shift responsibility to Iraqi forces, an increasing point of emphasis as the unpopular war rolls on.

Bush, after a meeting last week in Jordan, expressed confidence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government can lead the country toward peace with support from the United States.

Yet Hadley was left Sunday to defend his own memo that called that very point into question.

Written on Nov. 8 but disclosed just before Bush's meeting with the Iraqi leader, the memo described al-Maliki as "either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

Hadley said Sunday about the memo: "I made an assessment, raised a number of questions, hard questions that should have been raised. But if you look at that memo and if you look at what the president said in the press conference after the meeting with Prime Minister Maliki, it is clear that this government shares our objective for Iraq and has the will and desire to take responsibility."

The White House maintains that, taken as a whole, the memo was an expression of support for al-Maliki. Hadley rejected the suggestion that Bush administration hadn't shown much displeasure about the leak — or even that it had been authorized to pressure al-Maliki.

"It's unconscionable," he said. "It's an effort to embarrass those two leaders. It could have cast a pall over this meeting."

In Congress, Democrats and Republican continue to wrestle with how and when to withdraw troops without leaving a mess in Iraq, the kind of instability that could jeopardize the region and the United States.

The outgoing Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said Bush is "listening, learning, and he's open to take a change in course."

Bush says the U.S. will stay in Iraq as long as it takes to get the job done. That is the wrong message to Iraqis, said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"It tells them that it's not their responsibility, it's ours," said Levin, pushing for the start of a phased troop withdrawal.

"Nothing has changed," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., about the president. "He said he'll continue to be flexible. But he hasn't been flexible. He doesn't listen. And that's just a fact."

Hadley appeared on ABC's "This Week," NBC's "Meet the Press," and `Face the Nation" on CBS. Warner and Levin were on NBC, Biden was on "Fox News Sunday" while Feinstein appeared on "Late Edition" on CNN.

Amid Hints Bush Will Change Policy, Clues He Won't (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — The debate that will engulf Washington and much of the country this week centers on a question that lurks at the intersection of war strategy and the personality of the commander in chief: after three and a half years, is President Bush ready to abandon his declaration that American forces cannot begin to leave Iraq until the Iraqis demonstrate that they are capable of defending themselves?

As administration officials tried to prepare the ground over the weekend for the release of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's long-awaited report on Wednesday, the president's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, repeatedly sidestepped questions about how the administration would react to the panel's recommendations.

On three television news programs on Sunday, he offered assurances that Mr. Bush would look at all the new ideas landing on his desk to develop what Mr. Hadley referred to — 12 times — as a "new way forward," one that the president would announce to the nation in "weeks, not months."

But Mr. Hadley knows that one of the commission's core conclusions is that the White House should announce a plan for American forces to begin pulling back, whether the Iraqis are ready or not.

The commission's proposal is carefully calibrated, officials familiar with it say, dangling the possibility that American troops would stay longer if the fragile Iraqi government actually takes on the militias and death squads. But without explicit resort to deadlines or timelines, it also threatens accelerated withdrawal if the government fails to act decisively.

Commission members say they concluded that Mr. Bush's strategy so far has created an expectation that the United States will always be there to hold Iraq together. Breaking that culture of dependency, they concluded, is the key to making the long-discussed "Iraqification" of the country's security a reality. But they are uncertain whether they can persuade a famously stubborn president to adopt that view.

"Is George Bush ready to hear that?" one commission member asked over the weekend. "I don't think any of us really know. I don't know if the president himself knows."

The answer may depend on the impact of the bruising political realities of 2006 — and the prospect that Iraq could define Mr. Bush's presidency as Vietnam defined Lyndon B. Johnson's.

DOJ_NMG_0101470

Mr. Bush, of course, has never lacked for certainty about his strategies for Iraq. From his early enthusiastic descriptions about building a model of democracy in the Middle East to his glossy "Victory in Iraq" strategy paper a year ago, Mr. Bush has not shown a hint of doubt in public that eventually his approach would succeed, or that his critics were wildly off course.

That has begun to change just days before the Iraq Study Group's report, which includes a call for phased withdrawal of combat brigades from Iraq, starting next year and ending in 2008. Now Mr. Bush and his aides are suddenly trying to embrace uncertainty as a virtue — a sign of flexibility toward new ideas.

A flood of memos written by Mr. Bush's top advisers — two of them leaked in recent days — offer a host of ideas, some of them internally inconsistent and some proposing actions dismissed by Mr. Bush just months ago as evidence of a lack of national resolve to win.

On Sunday, Mr. Hadley's repetition of the wording "way forward" was no accident. Both the title of the Iraq Study Group's report and the proposed name of the yet-undecided White House strategy are expected to make use of the same language, officials say.

Mr. Hadley portrayed Mr. Bush as "interested in getting a range of new ideas" for many months now — a period that covers the run-up to the midterm elections, when he and Vice President Dick Cheney charged that "phased withdrawal" and timelines were just euphemisms for retreat.

Perhaps so. But Mr. Bush himself told Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki on Friday that "this business about graceful exit just simply has no realism to it," a statement that made some commission members wonder if the president was signaling that some of their ideas would be dead on arrival.

Mr. Hadley offered a different explanation on Sunday, saying on NBC's "Meet the Press" that after the first leaks of the Iraq Study Group's conclusions, the president simply felt "he needed to stop" any talk that the commission, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, was going to provide "cover for an American withdrawal."

"That's cut and run and, of course, as the president has said, cut and run is not his cup of tea," Mr. Hadley said.

But commission members say it is not tea they will be serving on Wednesday, but rather a more powerful brew, infused with the realities of a war on the brink of spinning beyond Washington's control. They insist that their phased approach of incentives and disincentives to Mr. Maliki's government amounts to a last-ditch effort to come up with a strategy with a prayer of working, and that if it was compressed onto a bumper sticker, it would boil down to "train and walk backward."

Administration officials say Mr. Bush is likely to embrace that part of the report, which will call for vastly increasing the number of American trainers embedded in Iraqi units, along with other provisions that he can argue are already being implemented.

And while the White House will call for time to examine the rest of the report, officials say that Mr. Baker, who was secretary of state under Mr. Bush's father and is close to the current president, has kept Mr. Hadley and others apprised of the broad directions of the report.

"There's been more than a little common shaping of concepts here, and I suspect you'll hear that in some of the language used by all sides," said one commission official working on the report.

The risk, commission members say, is that by the time the White House carries out its "new way forward," it may be too late. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of American forces in Iraq, drafted plans early this year to reduce the number of American combat brigades by a third by the end of this year. That has not happened; instead, the brigades are facing more danger than ever as they try to regain control of Baghdad.

Even Mr. Hadley seemed barely able to suppress his skepticism at Mr. Maliki's vow, renewed last week, that Iraq's military would be able to defend the government itself by the middle of 2007. "Our commanders have looked at that plan; they think it is ambitious," he said.

Bush Is Weighing Options For New Strategy In Iraq, Aide Says (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101471

Nearly four years after invading Iraq, President Bush is sorting through an array of options -- none of them easy -- for a way out, including a partial withdrawal of U.S. troops from violence-plagued cities and a redeployment near Iraq's borders with Iran and Syria, his top security aide said yesterday.

Bush is open to several previously rejected possibilities because he realizes "things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley told ABC News's "This Week." "We have to make some changes."

Hadley said the president is considering a "laundry list of ideas" from a Nov. 6 memo by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who announced his resignation two days later -- just after Republicans lost control of the House and Senate in the midterm elections. The options include the redeployment of substantial U.S. forces to areas near the Iranian and Syrian borders, withdrawing U.S. troops from especially vulnerable positions and starting modest drawdowns of American forces to encourage Iraqis, as Rumsfeld wrote, "to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

"Of course they're being considered," Hadley said of the suggestions. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, he said, "made very clear to the president that he and his unity government want to take more responsibility. That's what we've been seeking for three years."

"They're not there yet," he added. "They don't have all the tools that they need."

The Rumsfeld memo suggests that in the days leading up to the Nov. 7 elections, the administration was torn between staying on course in Iraq and considering options it repeatedly had rejected. Three days before Rumsfeld wrote the memo, Vice President Cheney said in an interview that the administration would continue "full speed ahead" with its policy in Iraq, regardless of the elections' outcome. Even if the policy proved unpopular, Cheney said, "it doesn't matter, in the sense that we have to continue what we think is right."

Rumsfeld's resignation on Nov. 8 was widely seen as a nod to voter anger over the war and discontent within GOP ranks.

Hadley said Bush will weigh recommendations from Rumsfeld, congressional Democrats and Republicans, military leaders, Iraqi officials, and a soon-to-be-published report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. "He is going to then take all of those things and come together with a way forward," Hadley said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "His hope is that it is a way forward that the American people can support."

Some senior Democratic senators, who will be in the majority when Congress convenes next month, said yesterday that the administration continues to move too slowly in pressing Iraqis to assume control of their security and future.

"I'd do the opposite of what the president did a month ago, when he picked up the phone and called Prime Minister Maliki and said, 'Don't worry, we're staying,' " Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), who is considering a presidential bid, told ABC. "I'd pick up the phone and say, 'You know what, we're not staying forever. You need to start getting your act together.' "

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), another possible presidential candidate and the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told "Fox News Sunday" that the Rumsfeld memo shows "there was a clear disconnect between what the administration has been saying the last year and what's been going on on the ground." He said no one, including Rumsfeld, "thought the policy the president continues to pursue makes any sense."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), who will chair the Senate Armed Services Committee, told NBC that Bush is "not capable of admitting mistakes." Levin said the United States should begin withdrawing its troops in four to six months. "I know the president has rejected that," he said. "He's rejected everything that reflects on his policy or that suggests that his policy is wrong or that we've got to change course."

Republican Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) took a different tack, saying the United States should send more troops to Iraq to quell the sectarian violence and stabilize the nation. He said Bush "needs to tell the American public a failed state in Iraq is a dramatic loss in the war on terror. . . . We must stay, fight and win in Iraq. I reject timetables" for troop withdrawals.

"And any strategy that unites the country and we lose, I'm against," Graham told "Fox News Sunday." "I'd rather be divided as a nation and win than united and lose."

Hadley Calls Leaked Memo "Constructive" (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101472

President Bush's national security adviser said a leaked memo from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, which lists redeployment of U.S. forces in Iraq as a potential alternative to current administration strategy, was "constructive" but not a formal proposal by the outgoing Pentagon chief.

"It was a useful and constructive memo, but it was not a proposal for a new course of action," Stephen J. Hadley said during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation." "It was much more a list of things that needed to be considered."

Meanwhile yesterday, incoming Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said that the president should accept the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, whose findings will be released this week and are expected to include a similar call for troop redeployment.

"I think it's the right timeline," Mr. Biden said during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "Because it recognizes the reality: that, by the end of 2008, one of two things is going to have happened. We will either help broker a political settlement where the violence is abated in that country and/or things will be totally out of control."

Although Mr. Hadley twice described the Rumsfeld memo, written the day before last month's elections, as a "laundry list," he said Mr. Bush agrees that a change of course in Iraq is necessary.

"He's said that. He has said publicly what Secretary Rumsfeld said, that things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," Mr. Hadley told George Stephanopoulos, host of ABC's "This Week." "We have to make some changes. We need a new way forward in Iraq, and that's what this policy review is all about."

However, some Senate Democrats remain skeptical that Mr. Bush will embrace either the Iraq Study Group findings or the Rumsfeld memo.

"His stubbornness has continued," said Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat.

Mr. Levin, slated to lead the Senate Armed Services Committee when the Democrats assume Congress' reins next month, told NBC's "Meet the Press" that he doesn't expect Mr. Bush to make significant changes without pressure from Democratic lawmakers.

"He's not going to make admissions; he's not capable of admitting mistakes," he said. "The Democratic proposal is a modest one. It is not precipitous. It's been characterized as cut and run. It is not."

Added Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat: "Nothing has changed. [Mr. Bush] said he'll continue to be flexible. But he hasn't been flexible. He doesn't listen. And that's just a fact."

"I don't think he listens to Republicans and he doesn't listen to Democrats. He listens only to the selected few around him who essentially cater to this 'stay the course' theory," she said during an appearance on CNN's "Late Edition."

Yesterday's discussion sets the stage for a busy week for the president on Iraq policy. He meets today with the head of Iraq's largest political party; tomorrow, confirmation hearings begin for Robert M. Gates, whom Mr. Bush has picked to succeed Mr. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon; and Wednesday, the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, releases its report.

Still, Mr. Hadley said during his "Face the Nation" appearance that Mr. Bush will take the various recommendations into account and come up with a bipartisan plan for Iraq.

"He's going to listen to the Baker-Hamilton report. He's going to listen to the reviews that are being done by his agencies. He's going to want to hear what Republicans and Democrats and the Congress think about. Then he's going to pull it together in terms of a way forward in Iraq that hopefully will command support from Republicans, Democrats, the executive branch and the Congress."

Mr. Bush did receive support from a pair of Republican senators who have often criticized him on Iraq.

"Our president is listening, learning, and he's open to take a change in course," Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, said during his appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said that he continues to reject calls for a timetable for withdrawal.

"I reject any proposal coming out of the Congress, any commission, the Pentagon or any other source that sets a deadline or a timeline." Mr. Graham told "Fox News Sunday" that a redeployment would embolden terrorists. "If we redeploy to a friendly nation under these circumstances, the terrorists will see that as retreat and defeat, and they will come after us in that friendly nation."

Bush Weighing Rumsfeld Ideas Among Options (USAT)

By Richard Wolf, Haya El Nasser

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush will consider new options for Iraq within weeks, including those suggested by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld before his resignation and by a bipartisan study group this week, his national security adviser said Sunday.

The president's review will take into consideration "a full range of options for changing what we do and how we do it," Stephen Hadley said on CBS' Face the Nation. That will include Rumsfeld's "laundry list," contained in a memo written the day before Election Day and reported Sunday in The New York Times.

In the memo, Rumsfeld said the president should consider beginning "modest withdrawals" of U.S. and coalition forces, particularly from vulnerable areas.

Rumsfeld also listed increasing the number of U.S. forces embedded with Iraqi forces, beefing up security near the Iranian and Syrian borders, and providing money to key political and religious leaders "as Saddam Hussein did."

The memo also said more Iraqi troops could be placed with U.S. units, which would improve "our units' language capabilities."

"Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough," Rumsfeld wrote.

The Defense secretary listed as "less attractive options" increasing U.S. forces, moving far more forces into Baghdad, continuing on the current path or setting a firm withdrawal date.

Hadley said Bush will take all suggestions into consideration. "The president made clear he wanted to open the aperture, really have a re-look and look at a variety of ideas," Hadley said. Rumsfeld's memo was "useful and constructive," he said, "but it was not a proposal for a new course of action."

Bush said Saturday that "I want to hear all advice before I make any decisions about adjustments to our strategy in Iraq. … The decisions we make in Iraq will be felt across the broader Middle East."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group is expected to emphasize that point Wednesday when it releases its report. The group, chaired by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, will recommend withdrawing some troops from Iraq soon, according to two people who participated in writing the report. The Associated Press, citing a U.S. official, reported that the panel might recommend a tentative completion date as early as 2008. It also will recommend a comprehensive Middle East diplomatic initiative.

U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said on CNN that the administration should "increase incentives" for Iraq to deal with its own problems and "incentivize" Iran and Syria "to change their behavior."

Rumsfeld's leaked memo generated opposing views Sunday from members of Congress:

•"Iraq has to be solved politically," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., on CNN's Late Edition. Adding troops "is to make the mistake of Vietnam all over again."

• "They can't achieve security if we begin to withdraw," said Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an Iraq war supporter who won re-election as an independent last month. "That's the signal to everybody I've talked to that the sectarian violence will get worse and the government will collapse," he said on CBS.

Hadley said Rumsfeld's memo did not appear to be a late effort to save his job.

Rumsfeld announced his resignation Nov. 8, a day after Democrats won control of both houses of Congress. Bush's choice to replace him, former CIA director Robert Gates, has his confirmation hearing Tuesday in the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Iraq Memo Piles The Pressure On Bush (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Edward Luce, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

President George W. Bush's isolation over Iraq deepened on Sunday following the publication of a leaked memo from sacked defence secretary Donald Rumsfeld calling for a "major adjustment" in Iraq policy.

DOJ_NMG_0101474

John Warner, the outgoing Republican chairman of the Senate armed services committee, told NBC's Meet the Press programme that the president should respect the will of the people and seek agreement with the Democrat leaders of Congress on a new Iraq policy.

Top Democrats attacked the president for appearing to dig in his heels ahead of the publication on Wednesday of the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton report on Iraq. Carl Levin, incoming chairman of the Senate armed services committee, said "his stubbornness has continued . . . it seems to me to be more of the same".

Meanwhile Kofi Annan, the secretary-general of the United Nations, told the BBC that he agreed with those who say the "average Iraqi's life" is worse now than it was under Saddam Hussein.

The pressure on Mr Bush, who last week insisted there would be no "graceful exit" from Iraq, comes ahead of what may prove a defining week in US Iraq policy.

Stephen Hadley, White House national security adviser, on Sunday played down the significance of the Rumsfeld memo, which was leaked to The New York Times. It included an option to "begin modest withdrawals of US and coalition forces [start taking our hands off the bicycle seat]" – a policy shift favoured by the Democrats.

Mr Hadley described the memo – released two days before Mr Rumsfeld was fired – as a "laundry list" rather than "a game plan". The White House desperately wants to keep room for manoeuvre and not be bound by the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton report – which, leaks suggest, will advocate a draw-down of US combat troops and talks with Iran and Syria.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador to Iraq, told CNN it would take Mr Bush "a few weeks" to make up his mind on any changes to Iraq policy.

Mr Hadley said the report was an important input to what he characterised as a broader review of Iraq policy.

While Mr Rumsfeld had floated the idea of redefining US goals and going "minimalist", Mr Hadley insisted Mr Bush's goal re-mained the same: "a democratic Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself and be an ally in the war on terror". He cast the present challenge as one of building Iraqis' ability to take on responsibility for their own security.

A Pentagon official told the FT that when the memo was released, Mr Rumsfeld had known he was to be sacked.

Bush's Shrinking Options (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

George W. Bush passed through seven time zones from Amman, Jordan, on Thursday to land in Washington at 4 p.m., resting briefly before embarking on the annual round of White House Christmas parties. The nightly six-hour chore of handshaking and posing for photos was followed by sitting through the endless annual honors presentation at the Kennedy Center on Sunday night. This regimen, for a president who likes to fine-tune and limit his schedule, fits his loss of control over Iraq.

The notion bruited about Washington that James A. Baker is a deus ex machina imposed by President Bush to resolve the entangled Iraqi plot is nonsense. The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, is out of the White House sphere of influence. The White House certainly did not ask Congress for help by creating this commission. Baker has made sure that the report, though leaked in part to the press, has not gone to the White House.

As a creature of Congress (an institution that Bush dislikes), Baker's group spells trouble for Bush when it releases its report Wednesday. It will propose, however muted its tone, gradual withdrawal of U.S. combat forces from Iraq before the president is ready for it. The hope is that Baker will nuance the report's words sufficiently and hedge calls for withdrawal in such a way that Bush can say that is what he has been doing anyway.

Bush has not stepped back from the decisions he has made on Iraq. At the core of Bush's Iraq dilemma is the fact, still denied at the White House, that the president has lost his political base on the overriding issue of the war. In contact mainly with fawning campaign contributors, Bush may not appreciate the steady decline in support of his war policy that I have seen deepening among Republicans in the past year.

This undercurrent of GOP protest roared to the surface with the party's election debacle Nov. 7. At the Republican grass roots, there is no question that Iraq lost the election. State officials and party leaders who are no specialists on foreign policy tell me the Republican Party simply cannot go into the 2008 campaign with troops still fighting in Iraq.

As a lame-duck president, Bush seems oblivious to the grass-roots sentiment that will be seconded in part by the Baker-Hamilton recommendations. Baker clearly is not doing the president's bidding. On the contrary, Bush aides have suggested that two forthcoming government reports on Iraq (especially one by the Pentagon) are more important than Baker's and should be given more attention.

The president's position is difficult. He does not want to be seen as ignoring a congressional study group. But he has not yet reached the point of accepting unconditional troop withdrawal. If he seems to differ from Baker-Hamilton recommendations, he can expect heavy scolding by the group's members on television.

Increasingly, Republicans on Capitol Hill see no viable alternative to combat troop withdrawal. While Bush's plight is compared to Abraham Lincoln's after his mid-term elections, there is no capture of Atlanta to guarantee an ultimate military victory. This is not that kind of war.

If not able to secure an Atlanta-style victory, could Bush stabilize the situation in Iraq by sending in more troops? Sen. John McCain, the putative front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination, once again has gone against the body of opinion in the party by calling for more U.S. troops in Iraq. Sen. Chuck Hagel, second-ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a McCain supporter in 2000, wrote in The Post on Nov. 26: "The time for more U.S. troops in Iraq has passed. We do not have more troops to send and, even if we did, they would not bring a resolution to Iraq."

Bush agrees with that, but not with Hagel's call for a phased troop withdrawal likely to be included in a Baker-Hamilton group recommendation. Hagel sees the report as a last chance to avert "impending disaster in Iraq." While its release is anticipated at the White House as no less annoying than sitting through the Kennedy Center honors, the president faces an opportunity as well as a dilemma.

The Iraq Alternative (WSJ)

By Donald L. Horowitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

Just when you thought the midterm election results had weakened President Bush's hand in Iraq, it turns out the opposite is true. The president has been liberated from a stay-the-course policy that the Iraqi government could pocket as an open-ended commitment. The voters have given Mr. Bush a chance, perhaps a last chance, to turn Iraq in a new direction.

The Iraqi government does not want the U.S. to leave now, but the American electorate has said that the choice is to show real progress or draw down the troops. For the first time in many months, the Bush administration has a credible weapon to use on the Iraqi government and its Sunni opponents, who increasingly see the U.S. as their last line of defense against Iran and against Shiite militias. * * *

Many of Iraq's current problems stem from the Kurdish-Shiite attempt to carve the country into a confederation of three regions with a very weak central government. The result would be to leave the Sunnis, who strongly favor an indivisible Iraq, with a rump region in the center, devoid of most oil revenue. The deal would also leave minorities, large and small, stranded in zones dominated by their opponents and their respective militias. Sunnis hate this deal, and so should we. They fear it will make Iraq an Iranian satellite. If regionalization deteriorates into partition, they will likely be right, at least in the south, where pro-Iranianism, although contested among Shiites, shows signs of winning.

Partition would bring horrific bloodshed as minorities are targeted and forced migration purifies territories. The regions could very well go to war with each other over contested boundaries and people left on the wrong side of a border. Smaller groups will organize to resist, and outside forces will surely be drawn in. Turks may aid Turkomen in the north, as they have already threatened to do. Sunni states, especially Saudi Arabia, are deeply fearful of growing Iranian influence on their own Shiite minorities, and they will probably aid the large Sunni minority in the south of Iraq and those stranded in the center. The position of Islamic radicals will be strengthened.

If Iraqi politics does not change, this is the most likely outcome. Since it threatens all the Sunni states in the region, partition also means the danger of a wider war. Even though the violent partition of Iraq is not in America's interest, the U.S. will be blamed for it. Or, in the paranoid version, this is what the "Zionist-imperialist conspiracy" planned: division of an Arab country, accompanied by mass killing.

How does the Bush administration use its new leverage to prevent this? If the Iraq Study Group thinks the road to peace in Iraq runs through Iran and Syria, it has missed the point. Neither country has had any interest in fostering stability at a price we would or should be willing to pay. The only chance for peace in Iraq lies in changing the Kurdish-Shiite deal so that the Sunnis are incorporated into an undivided federal Iraq with a real central government, limited regional autonomy, and a new agreement on the distribution of oil revenue.

The odds may not favor such a new dispensation. The violence and distrust have gone too far, and strong measures against militias will be necessary. Still, the Sunnis know that if American forces leave Iraq, they are vulnerable to brutal repression. They would prefer a unitary state to a federal Iraq, but they have been coming around to accepting a federation that is not loaded against their interests, as the current arrangement is. Shiites also have reasons to reconsider. The Maliki government has not been able to put down either the Baathist or the Islamist insurgency. The former is particularly well organized and hard to defeat. Not all Shiite elements in the Iraqi regime are friendly to Iran, and they must understand that foreign Sunni states might just fill a vacuum left by departing Americans.

There is a process in the Iraqi constitution to produce the amendments demanded by Sunni opinion before the 2005 constitutional referendum, but Kurdish leaders and Shiite advocates of an autonomous south have made clear their opposition to fundamental changes. A parliamentary committee was duly appointed to consider amendments; it has wasted months squabbling over trivia. By contrast, last month the Iraqi parliament narrowly approved, over a strong boycott led by Sunnis, secularists and some Shiites, a law prescribing the procedure for the regionalization of the country. So things are going in the wrong direction. The U.S. needs to turn this around.

The Maliki government should have a choice: progress on real Sunni incorporation in the regime, or progress on phased American withdrawal. Sunni incorporation would need to begin with a revitalized and serious constitutional amendment process to avert the de facto partition of the country. To convince Sunnis that this was genuine, the government would have to discuss a Sunni agenda, make serious constitutional proposals in the amendment committee, work harder to cool down Shiite militias, reverse the most extreme de-Baathification purges in the civil service, and possibly reshuffle the cabinet. If it did all this earnestly so that Sunnis were drawn in -- as they would have every reason to be -- the Baathist part of the insurgency might either decline or be less warmly received in the Sunni heartland. Recall that even the Saddamist insurgent Ibrahim al-Douri recently called for a truce. External supporters of the Sunni insurgency would have good reason to urge Sunnis to participate in the new initiative to empower them, and if Sunni insurgents were less active, Shiite revenge killings would probably decline.

Shiites who are not pro-Iranian could find the proposals congenial. These would include some in Mr. Maliki's own Dawa party; supporters of the Fadhila party, which is strong in some southern provinces and opposed to a single, nine-province region there (in which they would be in the minority); and even followers of Muqtada al-Sadr, whose base is not in the south. All are wary of the largest Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and its leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the main proponent of a strongly autonomous south with close ties to Iran. There is a more complex politics in Iraq than the one that has formed the basis of U.S. policy thus far.

If such an initiative failed, there is another option for the Iraqi regime. The Maliki government has periodically complained that the Americans have tied the regime's hands in dealing with insurgents. If we pulled back or drew down our troops, government forces could be expected to deal brutally with Sunni insurgents and the hospitable civilian population in which they flourish. The results might or might not favor the government, but either way they would not be pretty. If the Islamic radicals were defeated and prevented from making a comeback, that short-term result would be congenial to our interests, but it is hard to believe that the U.S. could stand by and watch the brutality that made it possible.

Furthermore, if the Maliki government did succeed in repression on this scale, a truly authoritarian regime would likely emerge, with a Shiite region in the south, forcible Shiite occupation of the center, and de facto independence in the Kurdish north. This would be a kind of reverse Saddamism, but without its secular features and with strong Iranian influence. Like partition, this would be a decidedly poor outcome for the U.S. * * *

There are three main options facing Iraq. One is gloves-off repression. The second is protracted conflict, gradual partition, large-scale ethnic cleansing, and the prospect of external intervention or even outright warfare among states in the region. The third is a last-ditch political effort to reconstitute an Iraq that keeps it whole and includes Sunni interests. This alternative aligns the U.S. squarely with ethnic inclusion and territorial integrity, both worthwhile causes, and with Iraqi political forces whose agenda happens to coincide with ours.

The third course may not have a high probability of success, but it is low risk and, if it succeeds, offers great benefits to Iraq and the U.S. This approach recognizes the large area of overlap between Sunni interests (and those of our regional allies, Jordan, Turkey and Saudi Arabia) with our own. It also offers the prospect of attracting Baathists and isolating al Qaeda insurgents, and it recognizes important differences among Shiites, aiding those who do not wish to see Shiite Arabs subordinated to Iran.

This third course probably will not produce a full-fledged democracy, but it could produce minority guarantees and impediments to a nasty, ethnically exclusive autocracy. In the short run, it will not produce complete peace either. But it should still reduce the violence, and eventually could produce a stable regime that limits Iranian influence, Kurdish provocations of the Turks, and terrorist domination of the Sunni areas.

Keeping all the contending groups attached to Iraq would be a major achievement. If, however, this plan fails, nothing will be lost over and above what is already lost. For the U.S. administration, the plan is an attractive option, for it offers what the electorate demanded: real progress or a drawdown of troops. President Bush's newfound power, paradoxically produced by an election loss, makes this a serious option and the threat underlying it credible with the Iraqi regime. There is no reason not to go down this road.

Can Bush Find An Exit? (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, December 4, 2006

George Bush has a history of long-overdue u-turns. He waited until he woke up, hungover, one morning at age 40 before giving up booze cold. He fought the idea of a homeland-security agency for eight months after 9/11 and then scampered aboard and called it his idea. He dumped Donald Rumsfeld last month as Defense Secretary, although lawmakers and even some generals had been calling for his head since 2005. Bush's biggest reversals usually come after months--even years--of stubborn resistance, when just about everyone has given up on his having any second thoughts at all. That's always been the point: he's a decider, he says, and deciders aren't supposed to undecide. When he does have to Kojak the car and head down the street in the opposite direction, he takes a little extra time getting it done.

But Bush has never had to pull off a U-turn like the one he is contemplating now: to give up on his dream of turning Babylon into an oasis of freedom and democracy and instead begin a staged withdrawal from Iraq, rewrite the mission of the 150,000 U.S. troops there as they begin to draw down, and launch a diplomatic Olympics across the Middle East and between Israel and the Palestinians. Even calling all that a reversal is a misnomer; it would be more like a personality transplant.

So it may take the 43rd President a little more time than it normally does to execute this particular U-turn. And he will do all he can to make it look more like a lane change. But sometime in the next month or so, Bush will begin the biggest foreign policy course correction of his presidency. No matter what else may get stapled onto it, the maneuver will be based on the agreement reached by the bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Indiana Congressman Lee Hamilton. Bush aides said last week that there is already agreement on the name for the restart: A New Way Forward, which borrows from the commission's own title, The Way Forward--New Approach. Among people who have known Bush for decades, there is almost as much certainty that he needs to disengage from Iraq as there are doubts about whether he has the wiring and instincts--much less the desire--to pull it off. "He is not stupid," says a commission source. "But he is stubborn. And he is very dug in. It takes a big person to find a way to walk back from some of this and embrace reality."

THE PRESIDENT IS ABOUT TO GET A LOT OF reality therapy. The Baker-Hamilton commission's work has been compared to a family intervention for a substance-addicted cousin, but unlike those encounters, this one won't remain behind closed doors. The entire 10-person commission will brief the President this Wednesday and then repeat the lesson for congressional leaders, both incoming and outgoing, later the same day. What happens next is designed to be even more convincing: several days of nonstop interviews on every media outlet, network and cable-TV station--a media blitz that will run well into the Sunday-morning news programs.

Of course some people don't like being rescued, and there is little reason to think that Bush or anyone around him is going to enjoy the visit by the Baker-Hamilton emergency squad. While there will be no lights flashing or sirens wailing, the commission is proposing nothing short of a repudiation of pretty much all U.S. foreign policy for the past three years. The Iraq Study Group will call for a massive diplomatic push in two areas in which the White House has never put its shoulder to the grindstone: rekindling peace talks between Palestinians and Israelis and holding an international conference that would lead to direct talks between Washington and both Tehran and Damascus. The commission agreed that the political turmoil inside Iraq could only be sorted out with the cooperation of neighboring countries, particularly Syria, Turkey, Iran and Saudi Arabia, which have the strongest ties to the Shi'ite and Sunni groups propelling Iraq ever deeper into civil war.

The study group's military proposals are performance based: they would link a staged withdrawal from Iraq by U.S. forces to stronger actions by the struggling Iraqi government. The report does not set a timetable for troop reductions, but it is expected to offer Baghdad a slower withdrawal if the government takes steps to end the violence. If Baghdad cannot make that happen, the troops would depart at an even faster rate. The genius of the approach is that if security returns as a consequence of this squeeze play, the need for U.S. troops will presumably also decrease. Says an expert who briefed the panel on the idea of trading troops for cooperation: "Unless we use our withdrawal as leverage against reduced violence, anything we do will be drained away in the sands of an ineffective central government." That is why, either way, the report envisions, but stops short of stating flatly, that troop withdrawals should begin sometime next year.

These proposals will push Bush's buttons because they come from outsiders. Vice President Dick Cheney in particular has long resisted outside interference in foreign policy. But last week it was internal interference that upended the Administration's best-laid plans. Bush had no sooner arrived in Amman, Jordan, for talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki than the New York Times published the full text of a memo to Bush from his National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley portraying al-Maliki as isolated, powerless and out of touch with the realities of his country and unable to affect them. This is hardly surprising for a man who can barely leave his home without American logistical support, but the leaked memo from somewhere in the Bush Administration sank the President's plans for a take-charge summit. Al-Maliki abruptly canceled his planned meeting with Bush--a snub for which there is no well-known precedent--and waited until the following morning to have breakfast and a shortened, 45-min. session with him. There was little chemistry in that encounter; by all accounts al-Maliki looked sour and lost. During a short photo break, al-Maliki refused to look at Bush, and the President had to initiate a handshake between them. Ignoring the previous day's discourtesy, Bush declared al-Maliki "the right guy for Iraq," a thumbs-up that did nothing for the Prime Minister's credibility at home, where an endorsement from the U.S. President may be the kiss of death. Bush then offered his first official reaction to the Baker-Hamilton proposals. "There's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq. We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the government wants us there. This business about graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

INSIDE THE COMMISSION

REALISM WAS EXACTLY WHAT THE PEOPLE who cooked up the commission had in mind when they set the bipartisan operation in motion more than a year ago. The review began as an earmark--a $1 million insertion into an appropriations bill by Republican Representative Frank Wolf of Virginia, who had gone to Iraq last year and decided U.S. policy wasn't working or, as he put it, needed "fresh eyes." He slotted the money to the U.S. Institute of Peace, whose president, Richard Solomon, joined two CEOs Wolf trusted to organize the study: David Abshire, of the Center for the Study of the Presidency, and John Hamre, who runs the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Those three settled on Baker and Hamilton as chairmen. Hamilton agreed, but Baker wanted Bush's blessing--and he wanted to let Bush know he might not like the outcome.

To bring Bush aboard, Solomon, Hamre and Abshire approached the one person in Bushland who still had a reputation for realism and who could command the President's ear, alone: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Would she propose the commission to the President? After some hesitation, Rice agreed, but she made one request: the commission had to look forward, not backward, in part because she knew the dysfunctional Bush foreign policy operation, tilted as it was so heavily along the Cheney-Rumsfeld axis, would not permit, much less sustain, scrutiny. As the trio departed, a Rice aide asked one of her suitors not to inform anyone at the Pentagon that chairmen had been chosen and the study group was moving forward. If Rumsfeld was alerted to the study group's potential impact, the aide said, he would quickly tell Cheney, who could, with a few words, scuttle the whole thing. Rice got through to Bush the next day, arguing that the thing was going to happen anyway, so he might as well get on board. To his credit, the President agreed.

After rejecting every name that Solomon & Co. proposed, Baker and Hamilton were left to choose their own panelists, and the commission went to work, gathering evidence, making a trip to Baghdad and hearing from more than 100 experts. Retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor developed a reputation for asking the best questions. Democratic power broker Vernon Jordan emerged as the group's political sage. Former Bill Clinton Defense chief William Perry cornered the military options--and would be a holdout on the final deal. In October, as the number of casualties in Iraq exploded, public support for Bush dropped through the floor. When Democrats swept the November elections, aides to several panelists told TIME that the commission would have more room to make sweeping proposals. Rumsfeld's resignation the next day cemented that feeling--which is not to say the commission thought it had any perfect solutions. "We did not think there were any good options on Iraq," one of the experts told TIME. "What we're really looking at are less-bad options."

But instead of making things easier, the elections actually made them harder. After Bush replaced Rumsfeld with Robert Gates, a member of the Baker-Hamilton commission who had served the first President Bush as head of the CIA, the psychoanalysis rampant in the media about Daddy's team coming back to save the prodigal son steamed everyone at the White House, from the President on down, and led the Administration to dig in its heels. Says a Baker confidant: "Everything that happened on Election Day made for extra work." It wasn't long before senior Administration officials were whispering that the diplomatic proposals coming out of Baker's shop would never fly. Realizing that with Gates moving to the Pentagon, the study group's report may have more impact than they had first thought, Democrats from all quarters began bombarding their allies on the panel with advice about how to stage an organized withdrawal and pressing for a precise drawdown timetable. Baker, who was in touch with the White House, resisted.

Meanwhile, Iraq kept deteriorating, and there was a risk that the panel's proposals would be obsolete before consensus was reached. "It overshadowed everything," says an aide to one member. "They were constantly dealing with new developments over there." Baker turned up last Monday with a draft report he wanted panel members to consider or amend and then get into the President's hands. Democrats led by Hamilton, Perry and Leon Panetta, Clinton's ex--chief of staff, were adamant that the report recommend a firm starting point for troop withdrawals. When the Republicans again refused, members agreed on language that would leave the date vague but the vector clear. And then the group adjourned.

THE ENDGAME

THE HOT WORD IN WASHINGTON THESE days is bandwidth, as in, Does this Administration have the bandwidth to solve all these problems? Even those who back the Baker plan worry about whether there is anyone inside the Administration who can carry it out. There is widespread doubt that the Bush team is emotionally or ideologically able to execute a plan that is so at odds with its collective instincts and that many of its supporters might resist. Of particular concern to members of the study group is the state of the U.S. State Department. Although Rice has restored some of the department's lost influence since replacing Colin Powell, she is currently working without a deputy and has had trouble filling that post. Her top lawyer, Philip Zelikow, is leaving soon, and there is a wide variety of people who wonder whether she--or anyone else--could amass the clout to take on both the Middle East and Iraq security talks in the time that is left to this Administration. That's one reason there are growing calls for a special envoy to the region who can hold all the reins in one hand. Some have even suggested that Bush try to persuade Baker to stay on and take up one last mission for his country.

Bush will put a few weeks between the big Baker-Hamilton rollout and his own restart. White House officials worry that anything faster would look too reactive--a curious instinct, given the public's overwhelming desire for change and the positive response Bush received when he tossed Rumsfeld over the side after the elections. Says a former government official who has known Bush for 20 years: "If he is going to take political advantage of things he might have done anyhow, why not do them fast instead of slow?" It may be that the President is not yet ready to answer the obvious question when the strategy changes: What is the new definition of success? Bush himself teed that up when he told reporters in October, "You all got to understand, and the parents of our troops must understand, that if I didn't believe we could succeed and didn't believe it was necessary for the security of this country to succeed, I wouldn't have your loved ones there."

But the White House won't wait for the Baker-Hamilton road show to signal that it is changing course. A White House official told TIME over the weekend that the new path the President will outline in coming weeks is "significantly different than what we've been doing. When the President says we're going to get the job done, that doesn't suggest it is an open-ended commitment forever." The inevitability of serious change, it emerges, had become clear even to one so dug in as Rumsfeld. The New York Times reported last week that two days before he was ousted, the Defense Secretary submitted a memo to the White House saying the Iraq strategy was failing and calling for "major adjustment," including possible troop pullbacks.

To seize the initiative, the White House announced a series of new diplomatic actions of its own, inviting Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of Iraq's leading Shi'ite party, and Tariq al-Hashemi, the Sunni Vice President, to Washington over the next few weeks as part of an effort to deepen connections to a greater variety of Iraqi political figures. And aides say Bush may call for what were already being dubbed "reciprocal obligations" with the Iraqi government: trading troop deployments for progress on sectarian violence, just as Baker and Hamilton are expected to propose. But there will be no ultimatums. A senior Administration official says, "Bush's plan is eventually going to call for reductions in troops. They're going to do whatever they can to get the security to a level at which it's sustainable so that at some point they can start to draw down the troop levels."

And that points to the biggest weaknesses in any rescue plan. Whether it is the Baker approach or whatever the White House decides to call its own, events in Iraq could easily make any plan for diplomacy and withdrawal irrelevant in the face of a weak central government, a deepening civil war and widespread violence. A commission official put it this way: "What we have produced is a plan for December. We have no idea what things are going to look like in February."

So Now What, Mr. President? (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - George W. Bush was doing everything he doesn't usually like to do. He was traveling in foreign lands (when Bush campaigns, he likes to fly home every night to sleep in his own bed). The carefully choreographed president was hit with a sudden change in schedule. Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, America's thin hope to create a stable government in Iraq, had seemingly snubbed Bush and was now standing frostily a few feet away at a press conference after a mini-summit meeting, held at a fancy hotel in Jordan because, nearly four years after the fall of Saddam Hussein, it is still too dangerous to meet in Iraq. Maliki was reportedly sore because someone high in the Bush administration had leaked a secret memo from national-security adviser Steve Hadley to the president saying, in essence, that Maliki was well intentioned but either out of touch, weak or deceitful.

Bush hates leaks almost as much as he dislikes meeting with the journalists who now surrounded him, clamoring to know about reports that a long-awaited independent panel was about to call for a substantial troop pullout from Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, also known as the Baker Commission after its co-chairman, former secretary of State James A. Baker, has been widely seen as a gambit by Republican moderates close to Bush's father, the 41st president, to rescue the 43rd president from his disastrous plunge into Iraq. Of all the things Bush dislikes, the idea of needing to be rescued by Daddy may well top the list.

So no wonder the president was a little out of sorts. "I know," Bush began, trying, unsuccessfully, to stifle a tone of deep exasperation, "there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq. This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

A few days later, many thousands of miles away at his ranch in Texas, Jim Baker was resting up, lying low, waiting for his moment. The leak, reported in The New York Times, that the Iraq Study Group was about to call for substantial troop pullback was wrong, Baker knew. In fact, the Iraq Study Group report, scheduled to be released this week, will set no timetables or call for any troop reductions, according to a source familiar with the report, who, like everyone involved, requested anonymity owing to the sensitivity of the subject. It will speak more generally of shifting U.S. troops from an active combat role to advising Iraqi forces, and suggest that the president could, not should, begin to withdraw forces in the vaguely defined future. The report will also urge more diplomatic initiatives to secure Iraq and the region.

Persuading Bush to listen—and to change course, even at the margins—will be very difficult. One of the myths that the Bush camp has tried to perpetuate over the years is that the president follows the model, learned as a student at Harvard Business School, of a chief executive who delegates, listens to advice and only then decides. Bush is the "decider," as he calls himself, but there is little evidence that he listens to advice that he doesn't want to hear. It may be that the last really serious call for a midcourse correction heeded by George W. Bush was the hangover he experienced at Colorado's Broadmoor Hotel one morning in the summer of 1986, when he decided to quit drinking—a decision that put him on the path to the presidency. That was indeed a momentous example of evaluating options and choosing to change, but it happened two decades ago.

People who know Bush well say, as one presidential friend put it to NEWSWEEK, that he "realizes that the disappointments on the ground in Iraq—not just the election—require new thinking." (The source spoke anonymously for fear of alienating Bush.) "He is looking for a militarily effective and politically sustainable approach that gives Iraq the chance to succeed in the long term," says the friend, "and I think he is very open to change, very open to the Baker Commission and the internal review," referring to the administration's forthcoming in-house study of Iraq policy. Yet even Bush's most loyal lieutenants can only point to relatively minor examples such as the creation of the Department of Homeland Security (which Bush initially opposed) and the doomed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers as instances of a president's being, as the Bush friend said, "willing to change his mind." (Other Bush confidants point to his decision to fire longtime chief of staff Andy Card and Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld as evidence of his willingness to change, but both were drawn-out decisions that many friends believed came too late.)

The tone of Bush's senior aides, who were interviewed this week by news-week, was dismissive, even condescending, toward Baker and the Iraq Study Group. The word from the White House was not entirely Stay the Course, but pretty close. The Iraq Study Group is just one of three ongoing reviews of Iraq policy, say the Bush aides, and not the most important one at that. Bush is also hearing from his Joint Chiefs of Staff as well as a team under Hadley. Bush may trim and fiddle here and there, say his advisers, but he is determined to send a signal of unwavering determination—that he is in charge, and he will not abandon Iraq.

Bush's reluctance to change course—Bill Kristol, The Weekly Standard editor, calls Bush "the last neocon in power"—may come as a disappointment to voters who thought they were sending the president a message last Election Day. Bush seems determined to play the role of a 21st-century Winston Churchill, steadfast in the West's darkest hour, when many Americans see Bush as the captain on the bridge of the Titanic. But in fact the dire situation in Iraq—and the reality that there are no magical fixes—may push the president into listening to Baker and other advisers, if only for a moment, and then maybe with only half an ear. At least that is what Baker, according to those who know him, is hoping and maneuvering for—a chance to get his foot in the door of the Oval Office, to make one last pass at getting Bush to make an attempt at true diplomacy in the Middle East.

Bush may have dismissed talk of a "graceful exit," but Baker, who knows something about getting out of tight spots, is looking for just that. Baker realizes, however, that getting any kind of successful outcome will take a great deal of diplomacy on many fronts, starting with his long but somewhat cool relationship with the president of the United States. According to friends familiar with his thinking, Baker realizes that his panel's report could wind up just sitting on a shelf somewhere. But he wants a shot at sitting down with the president—at getting Bush to ponder new approaches to keeping Iraq, and possibly the entire Middle East, from disintegrating even further.

Baker likes to be the man behind the scenes. He is very deferential to his Iraq Study Group co-chairman, Lee Hamilton, a respected former Democratic chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. (Baker refused to be photographed by NEWSWEEK unless Hamilton was also pictured.) Baker is mindful of Ronald Reagan's old dictum that you can accomplish a lot if you don't care who gets the credit. But Baker's critics, on both the left and the right, think he is engaging mostly in a classic

Washington cover-your-rear operation. He wants, the skeptics say, to get credit for making a noble effort to bring light and reason to the dunderheads in power—even if the effort is doomed. That may be an unduly cynical view of Baker's motivations, though it may describe the ultimate outcome.

The odds for "victory" in Iraq, whatever that means, are long. The star-crossed country first conceived on the back of a British imperialist's envelope 80 years ago seems fated to consume itself in sectarian blood-letting. But the debate roiling in Washington is not just for show. It represents a basic clash of approaches to getting out of the worst American mess since Vietnam. No one wants to say it, but the real question is whether the United States can manage to be defeated in Iraq in a way that does not lead to worse disasters in the region—or another terrorist attack at home.

Baker is a charter member of what is known in foreign-policy circles as the Realist School. The chief apostle of the Realists is Brent Scowcroft, Bush 41's national-security adviser. In public and private statements, Scowcroft has been deeply skeptical of the dream of the neoconservatives to bring democracy to the Middle East. Scowcroft consistently and openly warned that invading Iraq would not herald a new age of freedom in the region but rather inflame old sectarian passions. Better, Scowcroft urged, to aim for policies that would promote stability in the region. Those policies might keep despots in power, but they would at least keep the region from exploding into violence that could cut off America's vital pipeline to Middle East oil and create generations of resentments that could breed more terrorists. Scowcroft's sober-minded op-ed pieces and candid remarks to reporters before, during and after the invasion of Iraq succeeded in making him persona non grata in the White House of George W. Bush.

Baker, Scowcroft's old friend and colleague as Bush 41's secretary of State, has been more circumspect in public, trying not to unnecessarily antagonize the younger Bush and his True Believer followers. Baker and Scowcroft talk often, and they both stay in touch with Bush 41, who is also a charter member of the Realist School, even if he religiously avoids being seen second-guessing his son.

To the neocon faithful who shaped Bush 43's world view after 9/11, Baker is often depicted as a creature of Washington who favors compromise over conviction. For the record, Baker mostly makes jokes about his cautious approach when it comes to the use of force. "I used to get asked why I didn't want to push on to Baghdad [in the 1991 gulf war]," Baker likes to say. "I don't get asked that question much anymore."

It is well known that Baker is a firm believer in talk over force, not just because, as Churchill once said, "jaw-jaw is better than war-war," but because Baker has great faith in his own powers as a negotiator. Time after time through a long career as Reagan's chief of staff and Treasury secretary and as a top adviser to Bush 41, Baker was able to deliver deals against great odds. Baker is crafty and endlessly patient. He can sit for hours listening to statesmen bloviate, waiting for them to run out of gas and start to bargain.

The Iraq Study Group report has been written with the sort of high-minded generalities needed to achieve consensus among strong-minded Republicans and Democrats. It will not demand an international peace conference on the future of the Middle East or insist that the Unites States pressure Israel to restart the vexed peace process with the Palestinians.

Baker starts from the premise that none of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, want Iraq to dissolve into the kind of bloody chaos that can spread through the region, pitting Sunnis against Shiites and faction against faction. He has also been a longtime believer that the best way for the United States to establish credibility in the Arab world—and in Europe, for that matter—is to get serious about the creation of a viable Palestinian state. As Bush 41's secretary of State, Baker was willing to lean on the Israelis to try to make peace with the Palestinians by forgoing the establishment of settlements on the West Bank. Under pressure from Israel's friends in Congress, Bush 41's team backed off. But Baker's own desire to use the Israeli-Palestinian peace process as a key to defusing the wider animosities in the region is well known.

Baker also believes a successful negotiator never goes into talks by publicly laying down conditions for the other side to meet. By that measure, President Bush is making a mistake by insisting that Iran agree to give up enriching uranium that can be used to build a nuclear weapon before the United States will even sit down at the table. Of course, slowing or stopping the Iranian nuclear program should be a prime goal for American diplomacy. But, in Baker's view, according to those familiar with his thinking, it won't happen just by refusing to talk to the Iranians. The question of engaging Iran could be the stickiest of all between

Baker and Bush, for people who know Bush well say that the president regards a nuclear Iran as an issue on par with Iraq—the two nations that, with North Korea, formed the "Axis of Evil" of Bush's post-9/11 presidency.

Of course, Baker's emphasis on diplomacy may be naive. As conservative columnist Charles Krauthammer has argued, the Iranians are content to foment chaos in Iraq that could eventually produce a Shiite state that would lean, if not bend, toward Tehran. The best check on Iranian ambitions in the region would be a stable Iraq that represents Sunnis and Kurds as well as Shiites, and that is what the current administration is working to achieve, if sometimes clumsily and with uncertain success. Why do anything to legitimize the Islamic radicals who run Iran? By the same token, why should the Bush administration want to talk to Syria? The Syrian regime has been trying to impose its will on Lebanon's fragile democracy. This may not be the time to be making nice with Syrian strongman Bashar Assad. Bush has said that Iraq is a sovereign state and should conduct its own diplomacy with its neighbors. He may be right that America's attempts to dicker between Iraq and Iran or Syria are futile and possibly even counterproductive.

On the other hand, Baker may be right that jump-starting the Israeli-Palestinian talks is necessary to achieving some wider Middle East peace process. The Bush administration has already been making some moves to gently push the Israelis toward talking to the Palestinians. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been traveling back and forth to the region, and Vice President Dick Cheney journeyed to Saudi Arabia to visit his old friends in the royal family—to speak privately of many things, no doubt, but also to sound out the Saudis on the seemingly eternal Palestinian crisis.

These diplomatic gestures may be a way of saying that the Baker Commission isn't recommending anything new or different, that the Bush team is already on the case and even a step ahead. Indeed, earlier this fall a top adviser to Bush privately told a NEWSWEEK reporter that Bush's greatest ambition was to leave behind a Palestinian peace pact and a viable Palestinian state. But at the moment, prospects for a deal between Israel and the Palestinians are just about as bad as ever. The Palestinians are feuding among themselves; the lead faction in control of Parliament, the sometimes-terrorist group Hamas, refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist.

The prospects for improving matters on the ground in Iraq seem just as vexed. Last week, Anthony Cordesman, a widely respected analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, gave a highly discouraging briefing to reporters. The administration's devout wish and goal is to stand down its forces as Iraq stands up its own. Indeed, last week, Prime Minister Maliki asserted that Iraq would be able to take over its own security in six months. Cordesman's statistics make a mockery of that promise. By his count, maybe one in four of Iraq's Army battalions are able to "perform a useful function." Cordesman pointed out that the latest Defense Department report says there is no way to count the number of men in the Iraqi police force, and there is no system for rating the effectiveness of police units. But the daily carnage suggests that the police are overwhelmed—if they're not actually in on the killing of civilians.

Washington's tendency to blame the Iraqi government for the current disaster is misplaced, Cordesman says. "The idea that when you send the bull in to liberate a china shop, you blame the china shop for breaking the china is, shall we say, somewhat ingenuous and probably misleading."

Bush has not given up on Maliki. The president continues to believe in the 56-year-old prime minister as the best hope of creating some kind stability in Iraq, say Bush's advisers. The Americans have been spying on Maliki, according to administration officials who declined to be identified for obvious reasons, and they have not caught him double-dealing or trying to sell out the United States. (A reference in the leaked Hadley memo to "sensitive reporting" may have alluded to eavesdropping on Maliki.) Indeed, his snub of President Bush apparently had more to do with local politics. Maliki did not want to appear to get too close to Jordan's King Abdullah II, who was also meeting with Bush. Abdullah, who keeps warning of Iraq's falling into a "Shiite crescent" stretching across the Middle East, is not popular with the Shiite majority in Iraq.

But if Maliki is, in the old cold-war saying, "our son of a bitch," he's not a very formidable one. At times he seems to be a second-tier bureaucrat caught between Sunnis who want to kill him and his Shiite allies—particular the sinister Moqtada al-Sadr.

Maliki's aides were encouraged by the Bush summit. They asked for and got assurances that Maliki could communicate directly through the White House and not have to work through the balky State Department. The Iraqis don't really expect to have control of their own security by next summer. But they want more freedom to try. "It's like the father with a baby and a bicycle," one

Maliki aide told Bush. "You have to let him fall and if he scrapes himself you can run and pick him up. But if you hold on too long, trying to mentor everything, he will never be able to ride on his own."

The American military is fed up with Maliki. The ground commanders in Iraq felt betrayed by him this summer when he undermined a push to get control of the streets of Baghdad. The Iraqis failed to deliver on a promise to put enough troops on the ground. A four-star general who declined to be identified discussing a confidential conversation told of this encounter with Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who was in charge of day-to-day ground operations. "Do you have enough forces? Enough to clear an area and stay there to secure it 24/7?" Chiarelli replied, "Of course not." The four-star recalls replying, "It's going to fail, it's absolutely going to fail." The Americans never had enough forces to sweep even half the city, much less secure it. Maliki made their job tougher by in effect forbidding the U.S. military from taking on Shiite fighters; ordering them to lift roadblocks around Sadr City, the Shiite slum, and ordering them to release prisoners suspected of running death squads.

It's not clear whether the military made its frustrations known to the White House. Generals tend to salute and say can-do; if anything, the military has not been accurately portraying the dismal events on the ground, at least in the eyes of some White House aides. But with Donald Rumsfeld's departure, the Pentagon is entering a new era of leadership, in hopes it will be one in which the uniformed brass and their civilian bosses will communicate better. Gen. John Abizaid, the overall theater commander, and Gen. George Casey, the ground commander, are exhausted and overdue for replacement. ("There might be a sense that a fresh perspective is needed," said a senior White House aide.) Rumsfeld's former right-hand man, Stephen Cambone, has announced that he is stepping down. Others are expected to follow, stripping the Pentagon leadership of the group around Rumsfeld whose neocon certainties led to such catastrophic miscalculations in Iraq.

The job of rebuilding a demoralized and war-weary Pentagon will fall to the new Defense secretary, Robert Gates. Popular among the ranks as CIA director under Bush 41, Gates is low-key and rarely acts before he examines all the evidence. He has a dry, sardonic sense of humor; though he can affect Texan bonhomie, he's not really the towel-snapping type. He is said to have some spine. He was a big supporter of Bush 41's desire to dramatically (and unilaterally) scrap the U.S. stockpile of tactical nuclear weapons even though the military warned against such a bold move.

He'll have his work cut out for him winning over President Bush, who is not patient with advisers who take time getting to the point. White House aides speaking anonymously to NEWSWEEK seemed to suggest that Gates would not have a lot of impact on crafting a new Iraq policy; any tweaks in the policy, they say, will be made before Gates is sworn in sometime in January. This portrayal of Gates's role may be a further attempt to play down the picture of Bush 41's old cronies riding to the rescue. Gates is close to Bush 41.

It is not out of the question that Bush 43 will be brought around by the so-called Realists. Fantasies of a liberal democracy in Iraq are long gone. The most Bush can reasonably hope for in Iraq is some measure of stability, which is what the Realists want, too. Bush's situation—and petulant tone—are not unlike Lyndon Johnson's in 1968, when the Vietnam War was getting no better, despite troop levels' reaching a half-million men and a heavy bombing campaign. Johnson's new secretary of Defense, Clark Clifford, was a clever fixer/statesman, just like Baker. Johnson ranted to his advisers, "Let's get one thing clear! I'm telling you now that I'm not going to stop the bombing!" (Bush last week: "There's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete.") But Clifford and the other Wise Men he brought into the White House did persuade LBJ to halt the bombing and open peace talks with the North Vietnamese. Baker & Co. might still nudge Bush onto a track that involves more diplomacy and less force.

There is, however, a cautionary coda to the Vietnam comparison. The revolt of the Wise Men in 1968 did change administration policy—but it did not end the war. The peace talks dragged on until Richard Nixon became president in 1969; he then re-escalated the war, which didn't end until another five years had passed and 25,000 more American soldiers had been lost. Iraq has not cost nearly as many American lives. But Vietnam fundamentally shaped America in ways that reverberate even today, and no matter what happens between George Bush and Jim Baker in the coming days and weeks, it is likely that Iraq will be with us for as long as Vietnam has been—or longer.

Sticking To His Guns (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

While George W. Bush's many critics and detractors portray him as facing the same dilemma as Lyndon Johnson in Vietnam, Bush himself seems determined to proceed the way Harry Truman did in Korea–or, as some might put it, as Winston Churchill did after Dunkirk. Leading Democrats like Sen. Carl Levin have been calling for troop pullouts from Iraq starting in four to six months. The Iraq Study Group cochaired by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, the New York Times tells us, will recommend a "gradual pullback" of troops, direct negotiations with Iran and Syria, and pressure on Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians.

But Bush seems unpersuaded. "There's one thing I'm not going to do," he said at last week's NATO summit in Riga, Latvia. "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete." In this, Bush has the support of others. Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates opposes a quick pullout. So do all the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Central Command's Gen. John Abizaid. Retired generals who have criticized Bush testified that we should send more troops into Iraq. Democrats seem disinclined to use their congressional majorities to cut short our mission in Iraq lest they be blamed for the unpleasant consequences many predict.

So maybe the Vietnam analogy will not apply. And it shouldn't, because it's misleading. The Communists' Tet offensive was a smashing defeat for them, not us, as outlined in Peter Braestrup's 1977 book Big Story. Military historian Lewis Sorley has shown how after Tet, Gen. Creighton Abrams produced a strategy that was proving successful-until Congress prevented the United States from fulfilling its promises of aid against the North Vietnamese offensive in 1975. In Iraq, our enemies may not be making all the progress they seek, and changes in our military tactics are likely. Many argue for embedding more U.S. troops in Iraqi Army units. Other recommendations may come from the review commissioned–evidently out of dissatisfaction with current operations–by Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace.

Bush, like Truman and Churchill, seems determined not to concede defeat. And remember that for Truman on Korea and for Churchill after Dunkirk, no promising military courses were immediately apparent. Truman, after firing Gen. Douglas MacArthur, had forsaken the threat–a nuclear attack–that his successor Dwight Eisenhower deployed to get the Communists to agree to a truce. But Truman's perseverance despite his 22 percent job approval–much lower than Bush's–was essential in preserving the independence of South Korea, which now has the world's 14th-largest economy. Churchill, facing Hitler alone, could promise only "blood, toil, tears, and sweat" until his enemies' mistakes–Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union, the Japanese strike on Pearl Harbor–gave him the allies that made victory possible. Churchill's stubbornness prevented a Nazi victory in midsummer 1940.

No Iranian nukes. We should keep in mind, as well, Bush's repeated vow not to allow Iran to get nuclear weapons. That's in tension with the Iraq Study Group's expected recommendation of direct negotiations with Iran: The obvious quid pro quo for Iranian help in stabilizing Iraq would be dropping our opposition to Iran's nuclear program. In fact, the opposite approach may be what's needed. Historian Arthur Herman in this month's Commentary calls for airstrikes not only on Iran's nuclear facilities but also on its ports and refineries; Iran depends on imports for its gasoline, and without ports and refineries, its economy and military would grind to a halt. That's a move that might be condemned by the "international community," and it risks antagonizing the people of Iran, many of whom tend to hate the mullahs and admire America. But it also might destabilize the regime and dislodge a president who has threatened the destruction of Israel and America. Who today regrets Israel's strike against Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981?

NBC News has declared that Iraq is in the midst of a "civil war," just as CBS's Walter Cronkite declared Vietnam was lost after Tet. Many in the mainstream media today, as in 1968, see nothing but the prospect of American defeat. George W. Bush seems to have other ideas.

What We Would Leave Behind (TIME)

What would happen to Iraq if Washington follows the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group? The group's underlying assumption is that Iraqi forces will be ready to take over from the U.S. military by early 2008. To test that thesis, it is instructive to look at parts of southern Iraq from which coalition forces have already been withdrawn. There Shi'ite militias backed by Iran have taken control, intimidating government forces into submission and terrorizing Sunnis. On several occasions Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, has had to plead with radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr to restrain his fighters from killing soldiers... The Iraqi Exodus (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

The gunman stood at the foot of his bed. "Are you al-Jaboury?" he yelled. It was 2 o'clock on a stifling July morning, and al-Jaboury had been sound asleep next to his wife. After hearing his name, the young Iraqi police officer didn't hesitate. Grabbing the gun he had been stashing under his pillow every night since he'd joined the police 18 months earlier, he shot the intruder in the throat. The gunman's accomplices all fled.

But the danger wasn't over. "I knew the insurgents would come back, and maybe they would blow up the whole house," al-Jaboury says. "My wife blamed me for joining the police. She said that I am a Sunni and that I know that the insurgents don't like this, and that I would get killed sooner or later." The next day, al-Jaboury left his wife, his daughter, and his home in the troubled Diyala province and took off in a neighbor's pickup truck, loaded with fruit, and headed for Syria. He had $300 in his pocket.

For the past few months, al-Jaboury has just been scraping by in a Damascus suburb packed with poor Iraqis. Back in Iraq, insurgents continue to threaten his wife, telling her that the only part of al-Jaboury they want back is his head. Today, al-Jaboury works in a small Syrian hotel, making $10 a day, plus room and board. "I am living a disgusting life now," he says, "and I can't take the idea of cleaning toilets after being a policeman cleaning society." His chief goal now: making enough money to rent an apartment to be able to send for his wife and child to join him in Syria. "I think," he says, "that will take a long time."

Like al-Jaboury, an average of 2,000 Iraqis a day are fleeing to Syria–and the numbers appear to be growing. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that at least 700,000 Iraqis have taken refuge in Syria, while an additional 700,000 or so are in Jordan. (Iraq's estimated population is 27 million.) Few of the refugees have any legal protections, leaving them hostage to the whims of local government officials and reluctant even to divulge their full names.

While some had fled during Saddam Hussein's reign, most have arrived since the U.S. invasion, desperate to escape the spiraling violence. The numbers jumped sharply after the bombing of the Shiite shrine in Samarra last February that intensified Iraq's sectarian strife. With Iraq slipping toward an all-out civil war amid record numbers of civilians being killed each month, a UNHCR official warns that hundreds of thousands more Iraqis appear to be "teetering" on the brink of departure. Even U.S. officials, many of whom have previously downplayed refugee flows, now acknowledge they are increasingly concerned. "We do know the trend is growing," says a State Department official.

"Brain drain." The tide of refugees is just one of the more visible symptoms of the regional spillover from the chaos in Iraq. Amid concerns that the violence could eventually spread across the border, calls for a more regional approach to Iraq have been intensifying. The Iraq Study Group, created by the U.S. Congress to search for new policy options in Iraq and led by former Secretary of State James Baker, is set to release its keenly awaited report this week. One anticipated recommendation will call for the Bush administration to open a dialogue with Iran and Syria. President Bush was in Jordan last week to meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, while Iraqi President Jalal Talabani made a high-profile visit to Iran.

'Civil War' Or Not? (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD–With its crisp air and blue skies, the late fall offers some of the best weather in an often unpleasant climate. But as daily violence continues to convulse Baghdad, people tend to go outside only when necessary. The city's many playgrounds are overgrown from disuse, with grass that rises as high as the seats of rusted swing sets. The ambulance siren, residents now say, is the country's national anthem.

As the capital last week eased out of the round-the-clock curfew imposed after the bombing of the Shiite enclave of Sadr City that killed over 200 people, traffic was light–except on the airport road, where families packed into cars and braved roadside bombs for the chance to fly to another place. Exhausted and heartbroken, many Iraqis who remain are nonetheless reluctant to call the violent turmoil here a civil war. "We've been living all together, Sunni, Shia, Christian," says Baghdad policeman Ali Khalaf Jasim, his tone tinged with disbelief. "This can't be civil war."

Such sentiments are a nod to tribal ties and intermarriage that bind millions together across sects. But with each passing day those relationships seem more strained–along with hopes that the government can do anything about it. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is increasingly viewed as weak and beholden to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who temporarily suspended–but did not withdraw, Iraqi government spokesmen were quick to point out–his bloc's membership in the national parliament to protest the prime minister's meeting with President Bush.

Skeptics. Maliki got no boost with the pre-meeting disclosure of an assessment by White House National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley–a memo that allowed that "his intentions seem good." But, it added, "the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action." Such assessments mirror the views of many in Iraq–minus the part, particularly among Sunnis, about good intentions.

The memo prompted heavy questioning from Iraqi journalists about what, precisely, the prime minister's plans were. Maliki announced one of them–to have his country assume control of its own security forces by June 2007, a development that would, he said, allow U.S. troops to begin withdrawing. In the meantime, a government spokesman added, what Maliki needs are "tools to rise up and to find a solution for the crisis."

Militia power. One of the tools America offered up last week, an infusion of some 3,500 new U.S. troops to Baghdad, was greeted with little more than a shrug among some Iraqis who wondered whether more soldiers will make much of a difference as political parties build militias to consolidate their power. These militias now control access to vital resources like health care and increasingly subscribe to the view that, in the words of one Iraqi journalist, "the best way to defend their turf is to attack."

American soldiers, too, had questions about what, exactly, more troops will do. "'Go secure Baghdad' is a pretty big hand-wave in a general direction," says Maj. Mark Brady, a U.S. military adviser to an Iraqi Army battalion based in Baghdad. "What does that involve? What are they going to do that others aren't doing right now?" And how, others wonder, will they help to convince tired and shut-in Iraqi citizens that their government can deliver on promises they feel it has broken time and again.

For his part, Lt. Col. Steven Duke, a brigade military transition teams commander, feels his U.S. troops here could use some explanations, as well. "I wish there was a better barometer for our soldiers over here to be able to gauge: 'Are we winning? Are we making progress?'" The other day, he says, a suicide bomb at a police recruiting station sent human body parts over the wall near his headquarters. "Are we in a civil war?" he asks. "I don't know. I know there's a lot of people being killed because of their religious sect, and I know the Iraqi Army here is doing their best to get a grip on it-and they need their government to back them up."

The Civil War Behind "Civil War" (TIME)

By James Poniewozik

Time, December 4, 2006

When Katie Couric took over the CBS Evening News, some viewers wondered whether a Today show anchor could claim Walter Cronkite's mantle. Turns out we were wondering about the wrong Today anchor. When Matt Lauer announced that NBC would start referring to the conflict in Iraq as a "civil war," media observers hailed it as a "Cronkite moment," referring to the CBS anchor's 1968 declaration that the Vietnam War was unwinnable, upon which L.B.J. realized he had lost Middle America.

The backlash to Lauer's Cronkitization was quick, for several reasons. First: dude, we're talking Matt Lauer here. Second: Cronkite's language--"We are mired in stalemate"--was far stronger. Third: some newspapers, including the Los Angeles Times and the Christian Science Monitor, quietly started using "civil war" earlier (as did TIME). Last: polls and common sense indicated that most Americans already believed Iraq's sectarian fighting was a civil war.

So, O.K., NBC's declaration may have no effect on the war in Iraq. But it was a signal moment in the war between the Bush White House and the media. If the issue seems like pointless semantics, it is hardly so to the Administration, which has been fixated on framing issues and politicizing language. It (and Fox News) renamed suicide bombers "homicide bombers." It cast the fight against al-Qaeda as a "war on terror," even though the struggle was unlike old-fashioned wars between armies. Now it wants Iraq not to be a "civil war"--ironically, on the ground that it is unlike old-fashioned civil wars between armies--and has suggested that anyone who calls it one is taking political sides.

The White House got its way for a long time, and that's not surprising. The period from 9/11 through much of the Iraq war was often shameful for the media, especially TV news. There was plenty of excellent, tough, heroic reporting. But from the production offices, where the tone and packaging of the news are set, came hints that, in wartime, the Fourth Estate was on the side of the good guys. Newscasts were adorned with American flags, and press outlets (including, initially, TIME) prematurely made aÂ John Wayne figure ofÂ Private First Class Jessica Lynch.

This was not because the media were jingoistic but because the media business was, and is, existentially scared. TV audiences and print readerships are shrinking, along with media payrolls; nightly newscasts and newspapers wonder how much longer they will exist, much less thrive. The Administration has played on that fear of irrelevance, freezing out big institutions in favor of friendly local outlets and allies. A Bush aide told reporter Ron Suskind that journalists were an ineffectual "reality-based community." Were the mainstream media dying? The ebullient Bushies seemed to answer, They're already dead!

Layered on this was the sense of a conservative swarm sweeping the country. War supporters and "values voters" were coming out of the woodwork in elections, lining up for The Passion of the Christ and making Fox the sole TV-news success story of the era. They were collecting scalps--Bill Maher, Peter Arnett, Dan Rather--and taking names. They had blogs and remotes and money, and they hated the press. Journalists might not slant stories to show their loyalty, but what was the harm in hanging a little bunting on the screen?

The ideology of scared media is me-too-ism: straining to show the audience you like what it likes, be it Harry Potter or Donald Rumsfeld. (He's tough! He's funny! He's a sex symbol! The Philadelphia Inquirer dubbed him a "stud muffin.") With the worsening of Iraq, however, coverage became more assertive, and after Hurricane Katrina, reporters found they could question the Administration without being struck dead. With the "civil war" fight--as with erstwhile stud muffin Rumsfeld--the momentum has reversed. It's less important what the press is calling the war than that the White House is no longer calling the terms.

Of course, all this proves is that me-too-ism knows no party. NBC took its public step only after Bush's midterm thumpin'. Middle America may have been led by Cronkite, but now the reins are firmly in the other hand. In a perfect world, the media would be led by the facts, and the audience by its own mind. But if the public is giving the news permission to be more, well, reality-based, then lead on, folks, lead on.

What I Did On My Travels (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, December 4, 2006

There were plenty of reminders of why President Bush doesn't relish traveling abroad. In Moscow, the VIP terminal's red carpet turned out to be just a wide stripe of red paint on the Tarmac. In Jordan, all the King's men formed a wild motorcade, their vehicles nearly crashing into one another as they jostled for position trying to snap photos of the presidential limousine. In between were five other countries for a total of some 37,000 miles and 56 events.

But if there was ever a good time for George W. Bush to leave home for a spell, it was right after the mid-term elections, when Capitol Hill was aswarm with triumphant Democrats. He spent two weeks abroad, separated by a brief Thanksgiving interlude at Camp David. Air Force One, the Boeing 747 that has its own medical facility, among other amenities, circled the globe twice, serving Swiss burgers and taco salad, with snicker-doodles for dessert. On the ground in Amman, the White House staff did grapple with local dishes like chicken frekah and homemade knafeh. The President and First Lady Laura Bush watched a replay of the Michigan--Ohio State game onboard during a 36-hour day that saw the couple in Ho Chi Minh City, Jakarta and across the international date line on their way to Hickam Air Force Base adjoining Pearl Harbor.

European leaders expecting a humbled Bush at the NATO summit in Latvia instead got a stout speech in which he rearticulated his foreign policy. "We must advance freedom," he said, "as the great alternative to tyranny and terror." When kids in Indonesia asked his hobby, he replied, "Baseball--sports" and told them to go easy on TV. He got his most enthusiastic reception in Vietnam, as curious onlookers lined the roads and waved at his passing motorcade. There was much the country and the visiting dignitary had in common. Neither has much appetite for looking back at the difficulties of the past. Far better to stay on the move.

Why Military Calls To Raise Iraq Effort Grow (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe, Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As demands mount to pull U.S. troops out of Iraq, a growing number of senior military officials are arguing that the only way to salvage the situation is to add more U.S. forces and more U.S. money.

Outside the military, most of the debate is focused on a U.S. troop withdrawal. But inside the Pentagon, the recent dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has given some new life to arguments by military officers who say the U.S. must pour more troops and money into the country to expand the Iraqi army -- the one institution in Iraq that has shown some promise -- and stabilize the capital.

Right now there are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Though there are no firm plans for an increase, some military officials said that as many as 30,000 more troops could be needed. Most of the U.S. troops would be focused on patrolling Baghdad and training the Iraqi Army.

During his tenure Mr. Rumsfeld largely rejected calls for sending in more Americans, countering that Iraqis should take on more security responsibility faster. He was backed in his approach by Gen. John Abizaid, the senior military commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq. The two generals have argued publicly that the U.S. goal must be to bolster Iraqi Army forces as quickly as feasible.

It isn't clear how much longer the two commanders -- both of whom have served long, grueling tours -- will stay in their jobs. Even before Mr. Rumsfeld's dismissal, the Bush administration was laying plans to replace them as early as this summer. The job of selecting their successors will now fall to Robert Gates, Mr. Bush's nominee to run the Pentagon, who could choose his own team or extend current tours. How hard new commanders might be willing to press to redouble the U.S. commitment in Iraq could have a major effect on U.S. policy going forward.

Even with new leadership in the Pentagon and Iraq, big barriers remain to boosting the size of the U.S. force. Any move to do so will draw the ire of the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill. Multiple reviews of U.S. policy in Iraq also seem poised to recommend that the U.S. start to disengage from Iraq.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, is likely to recommend in a report later this week a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops. President Bush has asked for his own internal review, led by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, who has suggested that a focus of the administration going forward will be building up Iraqi troops.

Senior military officials seeking to make one last push to stabilize Baghdad might find a receptive ear with President Bush.

The President used a joint appearance last week with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to signal that his administration wasn't planning troop reductions any time soon. Senior White House officials say Mr. Bush is open to the idea of a drive to stabilize the country by temporarily increasing the number of U.S. forces there. These officials say Mr. Bush has paid a political price for the war and now has a brief window of time before the 2008 election cycle intensifies to change conditions on the ground there. The officials say Mr. Rumsfeld's ouster was misinterpreted as a sign that a significant shift is coming.

"We have not failed in Iraq," said Stephen Hadley, Mr. Bush's National Security Adviser, on NBC's "Meet the Press" yesterday. "We will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed."

The push among the uniformed military to do more in Iraq is being driven, in part, by a small study group working for Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The group's work, which is classified, lays out several options for Iraq. But it seems to favor a temporary increase in U.S. forces as part of a broader effort to build the Iraqi Army, says an officer familiar with its work.

The officers' recommendations largely run counter to Mr. Rumsfeld's own ideas, which were revealed in a leaked memorandum written by Mr. Rumsfeld in early November and published yesterday by the New York Times. In the memo Mr. Rumsfeld suggests a pulling back of U.S. forces to bigger bases and possible withdrawals of U.S. troops "so the Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Most military officers, however, seem to believe that a pullback of U.S. forces would only trigger more violence and make political compromise in the country impossible. These officers argue that 20,000 U.S. troops are needed to bring order to Baghdad. Another 10,000 U.S. soldiers would also be needed to work as advisers with the Iraqi Army, which currently numbers about 134,000 troops and might need to double in size.

Military officials who advocate such an approach warn that it could take years and hundreds of billions of dollars. But many of these officers bristle at the idea that it is too hard or impossible.

"The notion that we can't provide protection for people in one of the capital cities of this world [Baghdad] is just rubbish," says retired Gen. Jack Keane, who has made trips to Iraq to meet with commanders and provide recommendations to senior military officials. Gen. Keane, who advocates sending more U.S. forces into Baghdad neighborhoods and bolstering the Iraq Army, says he is speaking for himself.

Active duty Army officers have also stepped forward publicly in recent days to call for a redoubling of the U.S. commitment in Iraq. Col. Bill Hix, who spent 13 months in Iraq as the chief strategist for Gen. George Casey, wrote last week in Stanford University's Hoover Digest that more money is needed in the country for reconstruction. At the same time he suggested that it would be a mistake to pull out U.S. troops. "Iraq is simply in no position to progress politically or economically without assistance," wrote Col. Hix, who is now a strategist in the Pentagon. He suggests finding $20 billion to revive the anemic and largely ineffective U.S.-led reconstruction effort.

Even backers of an increase in troops acknowledge the plan carries risks that President Bush and Mr. Gates will have to weigh. One worry is that the increase will break an already strained Army and Marine Corps at a time when they might be needed to address other problems in the world. To find the additional troops, the Pentagon likely would have to extend some units' tours in Iraq beyond a year. The Army, which is also short equipment for units, would have to pool equipment from many units back in the U.S. to prepare a few to deploy.

America's Moral Duty In Iraq (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

James Baker almost smiled.

When the poker-faced co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group heard a commentator who had been invited to advise the group say that America's aim must be "victory," Baker's stony visage betrayed the bitter amusement that the word "victory" now occasions. Not even the word "success" seems elastic enough to cover any attainable outcome. Remember the "demonstration effect" that Iraq's self-governance was to have in transforming the region? Although America's vice president calls Iraq "a fellow democracy," it lacks a government whose writ runs beyond Baghdad's Green Zone.

John McCain seethed.

Weeks ago, he had been with a proud father of a Marine who was then in Iraq. Recently McCain had heard that the son's legs had been blown off. "At the hips," McCain said, intensely, several times, with a clenched-jaw fury born of frustration. Fifteen minutes later, on ABC's "This Week," McCain brought a steely clarity to the Iraq debate.

For three years he has been saying, correctly, that there are far too few U.S. troops in Iraq. For months he has said we cannot win without many more troops. That, too, is correct -- if it does not imply that some surge of troops can now guarantee winning. He has also said: Absent a commitment to send significantly more troops to Iraq, it would be "immoral" to keep asking the same number of troops "to risk life and limb so that we might delay our defeat for a few months or a year."

George Stephanopoulos: "President Bush has said he doesn't want to send more troops now. So by your own standards isn't it currently immoral to keep Marines and soldiers, other service people in Iraq?"

McCain: "Yes it is."

Moments later, Stephanopoulos asked: "At what point do you say, I am not going to be complicit with an immoral policy?"

McCain: "When I think we've exhausted every possibility to do what is necessary to succeed and not until then, because the consequences of failure are catastrophic. . . . We left Vietnam, it was over, we just had to heal the wounds of war. We leave this place, chaos in the region and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict in my view. A lot more."

Stephanopoulos: If the Iraq Study Group does not call for an increase in troops as you've advocated, "will you call for American troops to come home?"

McCain: "I will if at the point I think that we have exhausted every option and that we are doomed to failure."

At long last, rigor. McCain applies two principles of moral reasoning. There can be no moral duty to attempt what cannot be done. And: If you will an end, you must will the means to that end.

Sen. John Warner put down a marker.

Four months ago the Virginia Republican said that Congress must "examine very carefully" what it authorized the president to do in 2002 when it authorized military action against Iraq. Warner wondered whether, if there is an "all-out civil war," the president must "come back to the Congress to get further indication of support."

If only Iraq had -- were capable of -- a normal civil war. Its civil war -- fueled by religion and tribal rivalries and leavened by rampant criminality and depravity for its own sake -- does not offer a clear binary choice between regionally based sides that would allow U.S. forces to pick one and help it win.

Today there are many fewer Iraqis than there were three years ago. This is not just, or even primarily, because so many Iraqis, especially from the mobile middle class, have fled the country, taking with them the human capital -- skills, attitudes, mores -- requisite for a successful society. Rather, many -- and more every day -- of those who remain in Iraq no longer think of themselves as Iraqis. It is too dangerous to identify with the nation.

The national government is gossamer, but subgroups are solid. They are in an intensifying melee that has, according to Stephen Biddle of the Council on Foreign Relations, "genocidal stakes." Writing in the National Interest, Biddle says that "the downside risks" for any group that is party to a power-sharing deal include extermination by mass violence from rival groups. America cannot now credibly promise protection commensurate with that risk.

And absent adoption of the McCain policy -- a substantial increase in forces -- America's waning influence on events may derive from the increasing likelihood that the scant protection that American forces now provide will be withdrawn.

Bush To Meet With Top Iraqi Shiite Leader (MCT)

By Greg Gordon, John Walcott

McClatchy Newspapers, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush will hold an Oval Office meeting with a key Iraqi Shiite leader Monday amid a scramble to bolster the strife-torn nation's unity government before it collapses in civil war.

The meeting with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution, is considered an effort to boost support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, with whom Bush met in Jordan last Thursday. Al-Hakim is a leading opponent of anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls the most powerful bloc in Iraq's ruling coalition.

The administration hopes that by urging Hakim and other al-Sadr rivals to support Maliki more forcefully, they can reign in the growing radical influence of al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia, two senior administration officials said Sunday.

Bush's meeting with Hakim, two days before a bipartisan Iraq Study Group issues its recommendations for a new U.S. approach to Iraq, comes in the wake of news leaks reflecting a far more pessimistic outlook about the war among Bush's top advisers than the administration has expressed publicly. In the latest leaked memo, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld wrote two days before his Nov. 8 resignation that the U.S. strategy was "not working well enough or fast enough" and that "a major adjustment" was needed, the New York Times and Washington Post reported.

On NBC's "Meet the Press" Sunday, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley dismissed Rumsfeld's memo as "a laundry list of ideas" that was submitted in response to Bush's request to a number of agencies for new approaches.

Hadley said the president is reviewing his Iraq policy and that the study group's report will be "an important input," but that Bush also wants to hear from Congress, his military commanders and Iraqi leaders before making any policy decisions.

While conceding administration mistakes in Iraq, Hadley insisted that the United States has "not failed" in the war. He warned that a pullout of U.S. troops would create "a safe haven" for al-Qaida.

The two senior officials, who insisted upon anonymity because their remarks were not cleared by the White House, said the administration has seized on the central proposal in a leaked, Nov. 8 Hadley memo to Bush that urged an end to Maliki's reliance on al-Sadr.

"The idea is to use the rivalry between Hakim and al-Sadr to encourage Hakim and Badr (the Badr Organization militia of Hakim's Supreme Council) to support the government more energetically and to stand up to Sadr's push for control of Baghdad," one of the officials said.

While both the Supreme Council and Sadr's organization are strongly backed by Iran's Shiite regime, al-Sadr is considered to be more anti-American, reluctant to compromise and more unpredictable.

"They both have issues, but Hakim is more of a grown-up," said the second official.

The officials said that the administration's effort to strengthen Maliki and prod him to resist the Sadrists also would include contacts with other Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish leaders whom it considers moderates. They will be offered unspecified "consideration" for their support, the officials said.

Some within the administration regard the Iraqi prime minister as a lost cause, one official said, because as Hadley's memo suggested, Maliki appears either unwilling or unable to combat the rising power of the Shiite militias, especially al-Sadr's. Some officials at the CIA, State Department and Defense Department worry that it already may be too late to head off Sadr's offensive in Baghdad and against Maliki, the officials said.

But both of the senior officials said the administration has concluded that it has no choice but to try to strengthen Maliki, whose election it hailed as a victory for Iraqi democracy. On NBC, Hadley said that representatives of the Sunnis, who are fighting the Shias, "absolutely" would remain a full partner in the unity government.

Sheikh Jalal al-Sagheer, an Iraqi legislator, senior cleric at the Bratha Mosque and close ally of Hakim's, said that his U.S. visit has been in the making for a year and contended it "has no relation with the latest events in Iraq."

Bush also is expected to meet with vice president Tariq al-Hashimi, who is a Sunni, in the coming month, he said.

A "Civil War" Puts Words On Trial (NYT)

By David Carr

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

Decades ago, I wrote an article about a police officer who was notorious for roughing up suspects before he took them in for booking. The term-of-art within the Minneapolis police department for that kind of officer was “thumper,” and there was plenty in the public record to suggest that the noun fit him nicely.

He called me after the story ran, livid about being labeled a “thumper.” He was a scary guy and I equivocated for a bit before I was finally able to stammer out, “is it worse that I said it, or worse that it’s true?”

That did not calm him down much. But in the current debate over the use of “civil war” — which began in earnest a week ago when Matt Lauer of NBC said the network would begin using the term to describe the conflict in Iraq — that story serves as a reminder that to name something is not to invent it.

The war over words and definitions is not a new one. The current administration has fought to maintain custody of the Iraqi conflict by defining insurgents as “terrorists” and prisoners of war as “unlawful combatants.” During Vietnam, the administration defined civilian casualties as “collateral damage.”

And even the term civil war remains freighted with meaning in American culture. When I was traveling in the South and used the term to describe the war between the North and South, an elderly woman corrected me, saying, “Do you mean the war of Yankee aggression?” And that was only a few years ago.

There are those who suggest that there is something vaguely seditious in describing the situation in Iraq as a civil war. (The Los Angeles Times preceded NBC across the threshold by a few days but did not blow the trumpets when it did so.) Bill O'Reilly of Fox News has been critical of the actual conduct of the war, but saves much of his powder for those who would doubt — or he would argue, erode — American resolve by defining the conflict as one that is occurring between native combatants.

"First of all, it doesn't matter whether there is a civil war there," he said Thursday on his show. "That's a media-driven situation." He then suggested that defining the conflict as a civil war was a way of turning words into weapons. "We have a press that is invested in seeing that President Bush is humiliated in Iraq," he said. "They may not be rooting for an American defeat, but most are certainly antiwar and anti-Bush."

Others have compared NBC's choice of words to Walter Cronkite's deadpan declaration that the Vietnam war could not be won after the Tet offensive in 1968. But of course, Mr. Lauer made no such bald assertion and much has changed in public discourse since Vietnam. For one thing, the evening news is no longer the force it was, and the term "civil war" has been in rotation on the Web since the beginning of an organized insurgency.

On closer inspection, what seems like a bold, transgressive step by the media is considerably less. It is not a coincidence that some members of the mainstream media were only willing to attempt to redefine the terms of the current debate after a massive electoral setback to the current administration.

All the way back in March — the point when many commentators say an actual civil war began — a Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 80 percent of respondents believed that sectarian violence would lead to a civil war. The willingness to use "civil war" now is less a brave declaration than a wet, sensitive finger in the wind because mainstream media is much more likely to follow, than lead, political debate.

The people who have covered the war and decide how it gets covered at The New York Times have no problem with the phrase, as far as it goes.

"When you stand in Baghdad with the sand under your feet, you are in the middle of a civil war," said Ashley Gilbertson, a veteran freelance photographer who spent three years in Iraq taking pictures for The New York Times, among other publications, and who is currently writing a book about the American experience there. "In January, I met with insurgents and they only talked about Shiite militias and Sunni violence. They did not even mention the American presence.

"In my years there, it tilted closer and closer to civil war until it became one. There is nothing else to call it," he said, calling from a train in Italy where he is working on his book. "If this were Paris and you had dozens of bodies turning up on the street with well-financed militias composed of French nationals and French Arabs, you would call it a civil war."

Bill Keller, the executive editor of The New York Times, has said in public statements that he had no interest in having the paper handcuffed by "reductionist shorthand" for a war that he called "colossally complicated." For months, The Times has been using modifying phrases like "on the brink of" and "on the verge of" before civil war. But in an e-mail last Friday, Mr. Keller said the endless discussion about removing the modifiers was beside the point.

"I bristle at the way a low-grade semantic argument has become — at least among the partisan cud-chewers — a substitute for serious discussion of what's happening in Iraq and what to do about it," he wrote. He added, perhaps for the benefit of a columnist busy putting rubber on a bald tire, "maybe this argument is a symptom of intellectual fatigue in the punditocracy. Don't get me wrong, obviously I believe words matter. We try to choose them carefully. Sometimes our choices cause offense."

One of his war reporters, Dexter Filkins, is now back home on a journalism fellowship after three years on the ground in Iraq. Mr. Filkins said he rode into Iraq in March of 2003 (in a car he rented in Kuwait, by the way) to cover an American invasion, but left behind a civil war.

"For much of the time, you had a Sunni insurgency, with Sunnis killing Americans and Sunni's killing Shiites, until the big bombing at the Shiite shrine last February," he said. "At that point, the restraint was gone, the Shiites took the gloves off and you had a full-on civil war.

"We were using phrases like 'on the verge of' and 'on the brink of' so it wasn't like we were not deciding. We were deciding," he said. "I think 'civil war,' used judiciously and sparingly, is a much more accurate description of events. We're in the business of calling things by their real names."

Annan Adds His Voice To A Growing Chorus That Is Calling The Situation In Iraq A "Civil War" (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 3 — Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, said Sunday that Iraq had descended into a civil war that was even deadlier and more anarchic than the 15-year sectarian bloodshed that tore Lebanon apart.

"When we had the strife in Lebanon and other places, we called that a civil war; this is much worse," Mr. Annan said in an interview with the BBC.

Meanwhile, the American military announced on Sunday the deaths of 10 service members, an unusually high toll.

In making his remarks, Mr. Annan joined a growing number of foreign and Iraqi leaders, policy makers and news organizations who say that Iraq is in the grip of civil war. Former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said last Wednesday at a conference in the United Arab Emirates that Iraq was in a civil war. A former Iraqi prime minister, Ayad Allawi, said the same in March.

The Bush administration has not characterized the conflict as a civil war.

The debate over the term raged last week in the United States, after NBC and other major news organizations said they were ready to apply it to Iraq. The discussion is highly political because backers of the war fear that calling Iraq a civil war would erode support among ordinary Americans. Scholars say that the widening sectarian conflict meets the common definition of a civil war and that when measured by deaths per year, Iraq is among the top civil wars of the past half-century. The civilian death toll is believed to be at least 50,000.

Last week, Mr. Annan suggested holding an international conference on Iraq that would include all of the country's major political groups and representatives from around the region.

In Baghdad on Sunday, President Jalal Talabani rejected the call by Mr. Annan, saying the Iraqis were working to stanch the bloodshed through their own political process.

"We have an ongoing political process and a council of representatives that is the best in the region," Mr. Talabani said in a written statement, using the formal name of the Iraqi Parliament. "We became an independent sovereign state, and we decide the issues of the country."

In addition to Mr. Annan, a number of American advisers have suggested that the United States and Iraq should hold a conference that would bring together all the countries in the region to try to re-establish stability in Iraq. Such a meeting might include Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia, all accused by various American and Iraqi leaders of fomenting violence here.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton is expected to recommend in a report this week that the United States open up diplomatic channels with Iran and Syria to discuss the subject. That suggestion has already been coolly received by the White House, where some senior officials say opening talks with those two countries would in itself be a major concession to their authoritarian, anti-American governments.

On Saturday, a powerful Shiite leader, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, also rejected Mr. Annan's call for a conference. In the past, Mr. Hakim has chafed at the idea that countries in the region dominated by Sunni Arabs could get more involved in Iraq. Mr. Hakim comes from a prominent religious family and has close ties to Iran, which is largely Shiite.

Mr. Hakim is scheduled to meet with President Bush in Washington this week to discuss the rapid deterioration of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's government.

Like virtually all Kurds, Mr. Talabani is wary of interference here by Turkey, which has warned that it will invade the autonomous region of Iraqi Kurdistan if the Kurds make any move toward independence or try to take control of the oil city of Kirkuk. In his statement, Mr. Talabani also said that it was not the government's top priority to disband militias, and that it was more important to tamp down on the Sunni-led insurgency. The United States has pressed the government to disband militias.

The United States military said Sunday that American forces killed two women, one child and six insurgents on Saturday in assaults on two buildings in the town of Garma, in the hostile Anbar Province. The women and child were killed, along with five insurgents, in an airstrike on one house, the military said.

Two soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in Anbar on Saturday, and three marines died the same day in Anbar from combat wounds. Another soldier was killed Saturday by a roadside bomb near Taji. A soldier died in combat in Baghdad on Sunday, and two others were killed by a roadside bomb in northern Iraq. The Air Force said Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, a pilot listed as missing after his F-16 crashed last Monday in Anbar, had been killed.

In Baghdad, the police found at least 50 bodies across the city. The body of Hideab Majhool Hasnawi, the leader of a famous soccer club, was identified in the morgue. A leader of the Mandean sect, Talib Salman Areebie, was kidnapped from his home in the Ur neighborhood and killed soon afterward, said a spokesman for the Mandeans.

A car bomb killed three civilians and wounded 10 in northern Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. In the city of Mosul, a suicide car bomber rammed into a police station, killing two policemen and wounding four others, he said.

West of Basra, British soldiers fought Shiite militiamen as the British searched buildings in the town of Hayaniya, a stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia, a police official said. At least one Shiite fighter was killed.

What The US Has Learned (so Far) In Iraq (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

Listing things done wrong in Iraq, one veteran US policymaker put it bluntly: Pentagon leaders ignored analyses that indicated they needed more troops to keep order. The military was slow to develop a clear plan to counter the insurgency. For too long, US generals kept assuming that the day when Iraqi troops would be able to stand on their own was just around the corner.

Furthermore, neither the Americans nor the Iraqis moved fast enough to counter the rising influence of the radical Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia.

Is this critic a Democratic lawmaker, perhaps? A senior fellow from a liberal think-tank? No, he's Paul Bremer, President Bush's choice to head the Coalition Provisional Authority, who makes these points and more in an updated version of his book about his year in Iraq.

"The biggest obstacle [to progress] has been the failure to provide adequate security for the Iraqi people," writes Mr. Bremer in a new afterword.

Bremer isn't despairing - he insists Iraq is (slowly) moving toward real democracy. But neither is he alone in assessing the recent past. Even as Washington looks forward to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, expected this week, many experts and policy organizations are looking back to try and glean crucial lessons from the three-plus years of the US experience in Iraq.

It's an unorganized process that involves everything from Army field manuals to the Council on Foreign Relations, and it may never reach consensus, given the range of opinions involved. But even exchanging ideas could be important, since - as hard as it is to believe now - the interests and power of the US mean that at some point it could find itself weighing new sorts of military interventions.

"If we learn from our mistakes, our next engagement to help rebuild a collapsed state might have a more successful outcome," writes Larry Diamond, a democracy expert and former senior adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority, in his book on his Iraq experience. Military lessons

The US military, for its part, has been examining lessons learned in Iraq about tactics and operations for some time. This fall, the Army published a new field manu-al for counterinsurgency operations that draws extensively on research conducted from returning Iraq veterans.

Among its conclusions: The best counterinsurgency weapons do not shoot. Tactics that work this week might not work next week. The more force protection you use, the less effective you are. Sometimes doing nothing is the best reaction. The most important decisions are not made by generals.

"Clearly, there has to be much more specific preparation for these very challenging counterinsurgency operations," said Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, commander of the Army Combined Arms Center and Fort Leavenworth in Kansas, at a recent Brookings Institution seminar on military training.

The US reconstruction effort has undergone similar scrutiny. The special inspector general for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, has issued a series of stinging reports that both track individual projects and make recommendations for how the reconstruction process might be improved.

The scale of reconstruction needs simply overwhelmed the scanty preparations made prior to combat operations, according to Mr. Bowen. Among his suggestions: Create a cadre of reserve contracting officials, similar to the military reserve, who could be plucked from civilian life and deployed overseas in a crisis.

The White House has said less publicly what conclusions top administration officials have drawn from Iraq. However, during his stop in Vietnam last month, President Bush did say that the US involvement in the Vietnam War demonstrated something relevant to the nation's current situa-tion.

"One lesson is that we tend to want there to be instant success in the world, and the task in Iraq is going to take a while," Mr. Bush said.

Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona has also compared Vietnam to Iraq and said that the current generation of US leaders has ignored or forgotten two things learned the hard way in southeast Asia: The White House needs the public's support to wage war, and the military needs to use overwhelming force when fighting it.

But if there is one principle that virtually every expert who reflects upon Iraq might agree on, it might be the obvious point that the US experience there has turned out to be very difficult.

To supporters of the war, it is a hard task at which the US must prevail. To opponents, it has spiraled into something beyond the American ability to influence.

"Regime change, as we've seen in Iraq, is an incredibly risky bet," said Toby Dodge, a Middle East expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, at a recent Council on Foreign Relations event on the impact of Iraq on future US policies. Personal experience

Beyond that, the lessons one draws from Iraq depend crucially on political belief and personal experience.

Thus Bremer, the civilian administrator who oversaw the development of Iraq's constitution and the beginning of its current political process, staunchly defends the overall US effort - but does criticize the military for its failure to counter the Iraqi insurgency.

"For too long the military assumed that Iraqi forces would be able to carry on the fight themselves in short order," writes Bremer in the new edition of his book "My Year in Iraq."

Mr. Diamond, the expert in democratic process who tried to jump-start Iraqi democracy in the spring of 2004, judges that Iraq may yet emerge from its current chaos, but that the costs of the US invasion and occupation will be higher than necessary and greater than US leaders had imagined.

Among the lessons learned in Iraq, writes Diamond, is that you can't construct a democratic state unless a state already exists and can control its internal security.

"We cannot get to Jefferson and Madison without going through Thomas Hobbes," writes Diamond in his book "Squandered Victory."

A second lesson is that success in circumstances such as Iraq requires a commitment of substantial human and financial resources for five to 10 years, according to Diamond. A third lesson is that the US needs to organize itself more effectively for postconflict reconstruction.

"The final, overriding lesson of Ameri-ca's misadventure in postwar Iraq is not 'don't do it' but 'don't do it alone,' and 'don't do it with an imperial approach,' " concludes Diamond. Power no substitute for friends

The need for a more coalition-based foreign policy is something that many experts might agree with, as the US proceeds with the difficult tasks of countering Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs.

As great as US power is, it cannot substitute for coalitions and the effective use of international organizations, said Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in his 2004 testimony to Congress on the lessons of Iraq and Afghanistan.

The US now faces a generation-long period of tension and crisis in the Middle East and much of the developing world, said Mr. Cordesman - a different kind of sustained "cold war."

DOJ_NMG_0101497

Given that context, one of the broader strategic lessons of Iraq and Afghanistan may be a deceptively simple-sounding one: the US needs to take the world as it is.

"Policy, analysis, and intelligence must accept the true complexity of the world, deal with it honestly and objectively, and seek 'evolution' while opposing 'revolution,' " said Cordesman in 2004.

'Fear Took Over' In Baghdad Raid (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

U.S. advisors lament Iraqi troops' conduct. America's exit strategy hangs in the balance.

BURSTS of AK-47 fire hissed past them from several directions at once, showering the U.S. and Iraqi soldiers with pulverized cement and slapping spider-web fractures into their Humvees' bullet-resistant glass turret-guards.

The joint security forces, undertaking what officials described as a major counterinsurgency operation, were in pursuit of 70 "high-value targets" in Baghdad's crowded Fadhil quarter, a Sunni Arab neighborhood of multistory tenements along the east bank of the Tigris River.

Instead, the soldiers of the Iraqi army's 9th Mechanized Division and their American trainers had walked into a deadly ambush Friday. From upper-story apartments, insurgents stopped the soldiers' advance with grenades and shoulder-fired rockets. Others launched coordinated mortar strikes, hitting one of two nearby Iraqi field posts.

By the time the 11-hour battle was over, one Iraqi soldier had been killed and six others wounded, including one who shot himself in the foot. A U.S. soldier was also wounded and, according to American troops interviewed, additional casualties were averted only because U.S. Apache attack helicopters were called in and American trainers shot their way out of the ambush.

"Fear took over" among the Iraqis, Staff Sgt. Michael Baxter said.

"They refused to move. We were yelling at them to move," he said. "I grabbed one guy and shoved him into a building. I was saying, 'God get me out of this, because these guys are going to get me killed.' "

The offensive was initially billed by U.S. officials in Baghdad as an Iraqi-led success and a case study in support of the Pentagon's increasing reliance on using American troops as military advisors as a way to shift security responsibilities to Iraqi soldiers.

Expansion of teams

U.S. officials say an imminent expansion of the Military Transition Teams — squads of American military advisors traveling with Iraqi army units — will meet demands Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki made of President Bush at their meeting in Amman, the Jordanian capital, last week for more authority over his own security forces.

But interviews at their joint Rustamiya base with U.S. advisors and Iraqi soldiers involved in Friday's battle revealed a different story. The operation was hastily prepared and badly executed, they said, and plans to let the Iraqis take the lead in the battle were quickly scrapped.

"It started out that way," Baxter said. "But five minutes into it, we had to take over."

Staffed with veterans of the Iraq-Iran war of the 1980s and equipped with a complement of refurbished Soviet tanks and American Humvees, the 4,000-soldier 9th division is considered Iraq's best hope for an eventual U.S. troop withdrawal.

But confusion swiftly reigned as insurgents in Fadhil pummeled dismounted Iraqi troops and their American advisors. U.S. radio jammers seeking to hinder communications between insurgents ended up blocking the Iraqi soldiers' walkie-talkies, forcing them to use unreliable cellphone signals to stay in contact. Voice commands were lost amid the explosions and gunfire echoing off the walls.

At one point, U.S. and Iraqi troops piled into a Humvee to escape the hail of insurgent bullets pinging off the armor cladding.

"I was pulling people in," said Army Sgt. 1st Class Kent McQueen. "We were all bunched in there together with the gunner. It was like a game of Twister."

An insurgent tried to throw a grenade into a Humvee's top hatch, but it bounced off and exploded on the ground.

At times, the overwhelmed Iraqi soldiers fired wildly, sweeping their machine-gun barrels across friendly and insurgent targets alike, witnesses said.

DOJ_NMG_0101498

"I had to throw bullet casings at them to get their attention," said Sgt. 1st Class Agustin Mendoza, another U.S. trainer who manned a Humvee gun turret during the battle. "They had no weapons discipline."

"A round hit the glass shield of my turret behind me," Mendoza said. "I hit a guy down the alley and a propane tank. It exploded in a big fireball."

The number of insurgents in the area was estimated at more than 100. Soldiers said they killed 20 and detained 43 others, including three foreign fighters.

No count was made of the number of civilians killed in the densely populated neighborhood, but U.S. and Iraqi soldiers acknowledged a significant amount of "collateral damage."

Apache helicopters beat down on the dilapidated tenements, drilling hundreds of .50-caliber rounds into concrete walls and rooftops. At least twice they unleashed Hellfire missiles, shattering walls and rooftops with flashing thunderclaps. On the ground, Iraqi T-55 tank commanders fired their main guns down the narrow alleyways, smashing structures into an avalanche of bricks.

McQueen felt something jerk his head back violently and then pressed his finger into a bullet-sized dent in his Kevlar helmet.

At one point he noticed Iraqi soldiers in their armored Humvees pulling away in panic.

"I tried to halt the Iraqi army trucks to stop the trucks to give us cover," he said. "The driver gives me this dumb look."

The U.S. military is ramping up its training program to add 30,000 Iraqi troops by mid-2007 to make up for soldiers who have abandoned their posts or died. The new recruits are also intended to supplement the small number of Iraqi troops willing to travel away from their home bases despite dangerous conditions or the possibility of being ordered to fight against members of their own sect.

Most soldiers in the 9th division, for example, are Shiites, and U.S. and Iraqi officers said they doubted the troops would obey if ordered to fight in Shiite neighborhoods of Baghdad such as Sadr City.

"In August, when we started Operation Together Forward to secure Baghdad, we called on a bunch of units to assist," said U.S. Army Col. Douglass S. Heckman, the commander for the 9th Division Military Transition Team. "This division was the only one that moved into the operation. The others balked."

But Friday's battle suggested that even Iraq's best trained and equipped division is far from having the ability to operate independently. Heckman said attrition and liberal leave policies meant that only 68% of the 9th division is even on duty at any given time.

Another American advisor complained that the division had only 65% of the weapons and other equipment that it had been allocated by the U.S.

"And it's not just my guys," said the advisor, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "As I look across the division MiTT teams, they all tell me the same thing. Some of them have 50% of their equipment, some have 75%, but it's the same thing all over Iraq."

Despite efforts to get more financial support from the Iraqi Defense Ministry, the division stays operational only with help from the U.S. military, which provides everything from food to batteries.

Iraqi unit well regarded

Still, the division had conducted a number of successful joint U.S. and Iraqi operations north of Baghdad, officials say, and is well regarded by American commanders. The U.S. military believed the unit was ready to conduct the latest operation with minimal American ground support.

The operation was proposed by the Iraqi Defense Ministry and approved by U.S. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, only hours before it was carried out.

"We could have used two more days to plan," said U.S. Army Maj. Thomas J. Boczar, who organized the strike with Iraqi division commanders.

Iraqi army Col. Bassim Mohammed, assigned to the division's reconnaissance company, said he learned about the mission only three hours before it began at 4 a.m. Friday.

"We didn't do any reconnaissance. Nobody was briefed on the area. We didn't know the area 100%," Mohammed said. Units that went into Fadhil hadn't plotted egress routes, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0101499

U.S. advisors said impending operations were often kept secret because of infiltrators within Iraqi ranks.

But Boczar suggested that insurgents knew the attack was coming. Aerial drone footage captured before the assault appeared to show them positioning themselves in preparation for the raid, he said.

"This was a coordinated, complex attack," Boczar said of the insurgent ambush. "And the way they maneuvered shows us that they were ready for us."

Having learned from previous encounters that rooftop snipers would be exposed to U.S. helicopters, insurgents fired out of second- and third-story apartments. And like the U.S. troops who called in helicopters for air support, the insurgents staging the ambush called on others to strike Iraqi army positions with mortar rounds.

U.S. Army Lt. Col. Mathew Stanton acknowledged that it was a tough fight, but said he was all right with that.

"It was hard. I understand that," Stanton said shrugging his shoulders. But he was satisfied. "You know what? We're not going to be here forever."

Toddler Killed In Airstrike Targeting Militants In Iraq (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD — A U.S. airstrike flattened a building in a volatile province west of Baghdad, killing two women and a toddler, as well as six militants, the military said Sunday.

The U.S. military also said nine U.S. troops were killed in weekend fighting around Iraq.

The military said it was targeting buildings believed to be harboring foreign fighters Saturday night and intelligence reports had verified that several men were inside during the time of the raid in Anbar province. U.S. forces have accused the militants of taking over buildings for use as safe houses and of using civilians as human shields.

Coalition ground and air forces killed six insurgents while destroying two buildings that militants were using in the town of Karmah, west of Baghdad, the military said.

While searching through one of the destroyed buildings, coalition forces also found a weapons cache and the bodies of two women and a boy, who was believed to be under the age of 2, the military said. Three suspected insurgents also were detained.

In other Iraq news:

•Iraq's president on Sunday rejected suggestions that an international conference be held to address the violence racking his country. “We are an independent and a sovereign nation, and it is we who decide the fate of the nation,” President Jalal Talabani said.

The international conference was suggested last week by United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

•The U.S. combat deaths announced Sunday included one in Baghdad on Sunday, one near Taji, north of the capital Saturday, and five in Anbar province on Saturday. Two soldiers were killed by an explosion near their vehicle in northern Iraq on Sunday.

•The pilot of an F-16 fighter jet that went down in Anbar last Monday was declared killed in action by the U.S. Air Force on Sunday. It said DNA analysis had confirmed remains found at the crash site 20 miles northwest of Baghdad were those of Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, 34.

•Saddam Hussein's lawyers formally appealed the death sentence against their client for the killing of 148 Shiites.

Five Iraqi judges sentenced Saddam and two other top members of his regime to death by hanging on Nov. 5 for the killings in the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad.

Under Iraqi law, death sentences are automatically appealed before a higher court within 10 days of their pronouncement. However, defense lawyers must file a formal appeal within 30 days, detailing the legal grounds for their action and presenting new evidence that could support their clients' claims of innocence. The lawyers could also make a plea for leniency.

6 Militants, 3 Others Die In Iraq Raids (AP)

Associated Press, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- U.S. soldiers destroyed two buildings being used by insurgents in a town in Anbar province, killing six militants, two women and a child, the military said Sunday.

It was the latest of several recent raids during which women or children have been killed or wounded by U.S. forces as they attacked insurgents in residential areas. In some of the attacks, the U.S. command accused the militants of using civilians as "human shields" or buildings as "safe houses."

On Saturday night in the town of Karmah, coalition ground and air forces killed six insurgents while destroying two buildings that militants were using, the military said. Searching through one of the destroyed buildings, coalition forces also found a weapons cache and the bodies of two women and a child, the military said, without providing the age of the women or the age and sex of the child. Three suspected insurgents also were detained.

Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad, is in Anbar province, the large area of western Iraq where many of the country's Sunni Arab insurgent groups operate.

"Coalition forces take precautions to mitigate risks to civilians while in pursuit of terrorists. However, terrorists continue to put innocent civilians in danger by operating among them," the U.S. military statement said.

On Friday, near Taji, just north of Baghdad, American soldiers killed one insurgent and wounded a woman in her 50s "who was being used as human shield by the terrorist," the U.S. command said. "Terrorists continue to deliberately place innocent Iraqi women and children in danger by their actions and presence," it said.

On Wednesday, two Iraqi women died when U.S. forces backed by aircraft killed eight al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents during a raid near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, the military said.

The day before, American soldiers fought with suspected insurgents in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province, killing six Iraqis: one man and five girls, ages 7 months, 12, 14, 15 and 17, the U.S. command said. Another Iraqi woman was wounded. The military quoted residents as saying the building attacked "was a known anti-Iraqi force safe house."

Iraq War Has Cost US 350 Billion Dollars (AFP)

AFP, December 4, 2006

The war in Iraq has cost the United States more than 350 billion dollars since the March 2003 invasion, according to an AFP review of Congress figures.

About 290 billion dollars, including 254 billion for military operations, were allocated for the war in fiscal year 2006, which closed on September 30, according to a September 22 report by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO).

The Congressional Research Service estimated the cost at 319 billion dollars, representing 73 percent of US spending for the "war on terror" launched after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States.

Congress has approved 70 billion dollars for the "war on terror" in the 2007 defense budget that includes about 50 billion dollars for the Iraq conflict, bringing the three-and-a-half-year spending over 350 billion dollars.

A Democratic senator said last month that the Defense Department will request an additional 127 billion dollars for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, an amount that would bring the cost of the "war on terror" over 500 billion dollars.

The new funding request would make the "war on terror" more expensive for the United States than Washington's spending during the Vietnam War that ended in 1975.

The Congressional Research Service said in a September report that the cost of the war in Iraq rose this year to eight billion dollars a month, compared to 6.4 billion a month last year.

F-16 Pilot Downed In Iraq Listed As KIA (AP)

AP, December 4, 2006

An American pilot whose F-16 fighter jet went down in Iraq was listed as killed in action following DNA analysis of remains recovered at the crash site, the U.S. Air Force said Sunday.

Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, 34, was supporting troops fighting in Anbar province, where many of the country's Sunni-Arab insurgent groups operate. Videotape footage obtained by Associated Press Television News after the crash appeared to show the wreckage of the F-16CG in a field and a tangled parachute nearby.

Remains recovered at the crash site 20 miles north of Baghdad were identified as Gilbert's, the Air Force said.

DOJ_NMG_0101501

U.S. forces investigating the crash have said insurgents reached the site before American forces could. The cause of the crash is under investigation, but officials said they did not believe Gilbert was shot down.

Hussein Death Penalty Is Formally Appealed (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 3 -- Attorneys for former president Saddam Hussein on Sunday formally appealed his death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s, a spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal said.

The case will now go to a higher court, which can rule on it at any time. If the court upholds Hussein's conviction, his execution, by hanging, must occur within 30 days, according to Iraqi law.

Raid Juhi, spokesman for the tribunal, said Sunday that two of Hussein's attorneys had submitted the appeal papers.

Hussein was convicted on Nov. 5 of crimes against humanity for the Dujail killings, which took place after an attempt on his life in 1982. Hussein and two of his seven co-defendants, including his half brother, were sentenced to death. Four defendants received prison terms ranging from 15 years to life, and an eighth was acquitted.

Under Iraqi law, death sentences are automatically appealed within 10 days. But defense lawyers must still file a formal appeal within 30 days of the verdict.

A recent report by New York-based Human Rights Watch concluded that Hussein's trial was so seriously flawed that the verdict could be called into question.

Hussein is currently on trial in another case, involving the killing of tens of thousands of Kurds in the late 1980s.

Deadly violence continued Sunday in many parts of Iraq.

In the northern city of Mosul, a car bomb exploded at a police station, killing two people, a police official said. Four officers were wounded in the attack.

In Baqubah, 35 miles northeast of the capital, the bodies of 16 people were found handcuffed and blindfolded, said Ali al-Khayam, a spokesman for Diyala province.

In Gharma, near the violence-ridden city of Fallujah, U.S. forces raided a safe house used by foreign fighters, the U.S. military said in a statement. The troops fired on the building, killing five suspected insurgents, two women and a child. Two other buildings used by insurgents were destroyed in the raid on Saturday night, the statement said. Another suspected insurgent was also killed in the operation.

The U.S. military announced that a soldier was killed Sunday in Baghdad. Two soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in Anbar on Saturday, and two soldiers and a Marine were killed in a separate incident in the volatile western province. One soldier died Saturday when his convoy struck a roadside bomb near Taji, about 12 miles north of Baghdad.

The U.S. military also announced that Air Force Maj. Troy L. Gilbert was killed last week when his F-16 fighter jet crashed in Anbar province. A DNA analysis positively identified his remains Friday.

Gilbert, 34, had been flying in support of ground troops fighting insurgents when his jet crashed Monday. Officials said the incident was under investigation, but Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said last week there was no indication that the jet had been shot down.

Gilbert, of Litchfield Park, Ariz., was assigned to the 309th Fighter Squadron at Luke Air Force Base in Arizona and deployed to the 332nd Air Expeditionary Wing at Balad Air Base. He was married and had children.

"He served with courage and commitment and believed in duty, honor and country," Brig. Gen. Tom Jones, commander of Luke's 56th Fighter Wing, said in Arizona.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki condemned a triple car bombing that killed 51 people in Baghdad on Saturday and said families of the victims would receive compensation.

Report Faults Training Of Afghan Police (NYT)

By James Glanz, David Rohde

DOJ_NMG_0101502

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work, and that managers of the $1.1 billion training program cannot say how many officers are actually on duty or where thousands of trucks and other equipment issued to police units have gone.

In fact, most police units had less than 50 percent of their authorized equipment on hand as of June, says the report, which was issued two weeks ago but is only now circulating among members of relevant Congressional committees.

In its most significant finding, the report said that no effective field training program had been established in Afghanistan, at least in part because of a slow, ineffectual start and understaffing.

Police training experts who have studied or had first-hand experience with the American effort in Afghanistan said they agreed with the report's findings, and some said they had warned for years that field training was the backbone of a strong program. But they said additional problems needed to be investigated, including the quality of private contractors and the cost and effectiveness of relying on them to train the police officers. In particular, the experts questioned why the report focused on United States government managers and only glancingly analyzed the performance of the principal contractor in Afghanistan, DynCorp International of Virginia.

Considering the state of the police force, an estimated $600 million per year will be needed indefinitely to sustain it, says the report, undertaken by the offices of the inspectors general at the Pentagon and the State Department. Howard J. Krongard is the inspector general at State, which led the work on the 97-page report, and Thomas F. Gimble holds the office at the Pentagon.

American advisers will also have to combat endemic corruption in the force, the report says.

Efforts to respond to some of the issues that the report identifies are already under way. Afghan and American officials recently announced that they had instituted an "auxiliary police" program at the end of the summer, which aims to hire 11,200 officers in parts of the country beset by Taliban attacks, primarily in the south.

But those officers receive only two of the standard eight weeks of training, and the police training experts say the program could worsen the situation. They say the new hastily created program could place ill-trained and poorly vetted officers in the field and allow militias and criminals to infiltrate the force.

An American official involved in the new effort said the program became necessary after southern governors besieged by Taliban attacks began hiring police officers on their own. American officials feared they were seeing the beginnings of de facto private militias.

"This was designed to avoid the creation of the militias," said the official, who was not authorized to comment publicly.

The training experts say the United States made some of the same mistakes in training police forces in Afghanistan that it made in Iraq, including offering far too little field training, tracking equipment poorly and relying on private contractors for the actual training. At the same time, those experts say, the failure to create viable police forces to keep order and enforce the law on a local level has played a pivotal role in undermining the American efforts to stabilize both countries.

In Afghanistan, the failure has contributed to the explosion in opium production, government corruption and the resurgence of the Taliban.

In Iraq, the challenge is even larger: Sectarian death squads have infiltrated the police force and helped push the country to what many are now calling a civil war.

"In both places we were extraordinarily late getting started," said Robert M. Perito, a policing expert at the United States Institute of Peace and a former National Security Council, State Department and Justice Department official. "In both places you have a dysfunctional Interior Ministry in control, and in both places the United States has tried to stand up a ministry advisory group to bring order out of chaos."

In an interview this fall, the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, said the violence in the country's south was partly a result of the lack of a viable force. He called for "much more support" from the United States and for an expansion of the country's force of roughly 70,000 officers.

"It is not that they are strong," he said, referring to the Taliban. "It is that we are not strong enough to defend ourselves."

Most of the $1.1 billion the United States has spent on the training program in Afghanistan has gone to DynCorp, a technical services company based in Falls Church, Va., with 14,000 employees in about 33 countries. DynCorp also won the largest part of the training work in Iraq; it received a total of $1.6 billion for its training and security work in Iraq and Afghanistan in the 2004, 2005 and 2006 fiscal years, according to Gregory Lagana, a company spokesman. The work accounted for roughly 30 percent of the company's revenue during those years. In May, the company raised $375 million in an initial public offering of its stock.

Under orders from the Defense Department, the company has deployed 377 police advisers to Afghanistan, roughly half the number the United States has deployed in Iraq. Police training experts say far more police advisers are needed in Afghanistan, which is roughly the same size as Iraq. The report says that management of the DynCorp contract by United States government officials in Afghanistan has fallen into a state of disarray; conflicting military and civilian bureaucracies could not even find a copy of the contract to clarify for auditors exactly what it called for.

The report does not suggest that DynCorp held any responsibility for the program's failures, but former Afghan officials and several American policing experts who have examined DynCorp's training on the ground say that the company is partly to blame for long delays and that the use of private contractors for training should be reviewed. Afghan officials have complained about the high cost of the advisers and have said that some have too little experience.

Ali Jalali, an Afghan-American military historian who served as interior minister from 2002 to 2005, said the expertise level of some DynCorp advisers sent to his ministry was mixed. He said he rejected the first group he was offered because their résumés were unimpressive. When a second group arrived, some were retired officers not up to the demands of working in Afghanistan, he said. Others knew virtually nothing about the country.

"They were good on patrols in Oklahoma City, Houston or Miami," said Mr. Jalali, now a professor at the National Defense University in Washington. "But not in a country where you faced rebuilding the police force."

Mr. Lagana defended the company's work and said State Department officials closely monitored their activities. He said the Interior Ministry advisers who drew complaints regarding their experience level were removed.

"We filled positions based on the requirements and salary levels authorized by the State Department," Mr. Lagana said. "As we went along, everyone realized we needed people with experience at higher levels in law enforcement."

Seth Jones, an Afghanistan expert at the RAND Corporation who has made eight trips to Afghanistan since 2003 to study army and police training, called for a review of the company's performance. He said he had repeatedly heard complaints from both Western and Afghan officials in Afghanistan about the quality and experience of DynCorp's advisers.

"I was surprised, based on what I have seen on the ground, that DynCorp was let off the hook so easily," he said of the report. "I think a very frank assessment of DynCorp needs to be done."

Mr. Krongard, the State Department inspector general, acknowledged the seriousness of the report's criticisms. But he said in a statement in answer to questions about the report that in the face of obstacles like largely illiterate recruits, low pay and corruption, the program was "generally well conceived and well executed," but that for the police force to be self-sustaining, "long-term U.S. and international assistance and funding will be required at least beyond 2010."

The report concluded that the official figure of 70,000 trained police officers was inflated and that only where American advisers were present was the counting reliable to some degree.

As a best estimate, the report said that 30,395 Afghan officers — fewer than half the official total — were "trained and equipped to carry out their police functions."

The report also says that the vetting process for recruits, intended to keep the Taliban and people with powerful sectarian or tribal loyalties out of police ranks, has not been effective. After recruits are trained, they are often assigned by local police commanders to menial tasks like guard duty.

The international effort lost critical time when it initially mounted a token effort to train officers in Afghanistan, according to Afghan officials and policing experts. For the first two and a half years after the fall of the Taliban, no systematic police training program existed outside of Afghanistan's capital, according to American and Afghan officials. The United States focused on training a new multiethnic army and paid little attention to the need for policemen. Germany pledged to train a new force but sent only 40 police advisers to Kabul.

Then, in 2004, the State Department issued a contract to DynCorp to deploy 30 police advisers across Afghanistan and construct seven regional training centers.

The United States spent $164 million building and running the training centers; recruits received two to four weeks of training. The effort was poorly monitored and achieved mixed results, according to a June 2005 report by the Government Accountability Office.

In April 2005, the Defense Department took over police training in Afghanistan and drastically expanded the number of American police advisers; the number is 377 today. Still, police training experts said the Afghanistan effort remained far too small, with small teams of advisers each expected to field train thousands of Afghan policemen.

The small corps of advisers also makes it more difficult to track equipment, and the report said that just 3,000 of 5,000 vehicles issued to the police nationwide could be accounted for. Although the report does not explicitly connect its warnings on corruption to the loss of equipment, the two appear to be closely related.

The weakness of the police has contributed to Afghanistan becoming the world's largest producer of opium, accounting for 92 percent of the world's supply, experts said. A report issued by the United Nations Office of Drug Control and the World Bank on Tuesday found that corruption had stymied efforts to counter opium production and that a handful of politically connected traffickers increasingly dominated the drug trade.

"The drug industry in Afghanistan is becoming increasingly consolidated," the report says. "At the top level, around 25-30 key traffickers, the majority of them in southern Afghanistan, control major transactions and transfers, working closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

The report on police training strongly recommends expanding the advising program to take care of some of those problems but points out that an expansion would cost the United States much more money "as well as increasing the risk to U.S. personnel."

At Least 3 Die In Afghanistan As Bombing Incites Shooting (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 3 — British troops opened fire on civilians in the southern city of Kandahar on Sunday, after a suicide bomber rammed a minibus into their military convoy, wounding three soldiers and setting a vehicle on fire, officials and witnesses said.

At least three people were killed and 15 wounded in the bombing and the shooting afterward, hospital officials said. By late evening [a news service] was reporting that as many as eight people had been killed.

The bomber struck around 11 a.m. on the main road through the city. One military vehicle was ablaze as a helicopter lifted out the wounded soldiers. As crowds and cars started pushing to get past the blocked road, the troops, fearing a second suicide attack, opened fire on at least one civilian vehicle that did not obey hand signals to keep back, said a NATO spokesman in Kabul, Maj. Luke Knittig. At least one person was killed and one was wounded, he said.

Witnesses said that up to 10 people had been wounded by NATO gunfire. Six or seven people were killed or wounded by the bomb blast, relatives said.

"My cousin and I were on the way from Nelgham village to the city in a taxi when British troops came along," said Dost Muhammad, 35, who was at the Kandahar city hospital looking after his cousin, Abdul Khaliq, 30, whom he said had been wounded by British soldiers. "Our driver reduced his speed and tried to stop on the side of the road, and the British came very near and started firing. My cousin and the driver were shot by them. I saw six other men shot by them."

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the suicide attack, a spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmedi, told The Associated Press by telephone. The bomber was driving in the same direction as the convoy when he exploded his vehicle, said Ahmadullah Faizi, a spokesman for the NATO security force in Kandahar. Three British soldiers were wounded in the attack, he said.

"I saw a Town Ace minibus was moving very slowly just as a British convoy came near to it and it exploded," said Qassim Alokozai, 25, a shopkeeper. "After that I was trying to get myself away from the area because the British started firing on local people. The British took out the injured men from the damaged vehicle, and after that they left their vehicle and escaped."

A civilian supply helicopter working for NATO went down in bad weather in the mountains of southern Afghanistan on Saturday, according to a NATO statement. A search and rescue team found the helicopter at noon Sunday but was not able to reach the crash site or establish the status of the eight-member crew.

NATO forces on a routine patrol in the Musa Qala district of Helmand Province fought with insurgents for four hours on Saturday night, a NATO statement said Sunday. British troops had negotiated a cease-fire with the Taliban and local tribal elders there in recent weeks, but called in airstrikes on the insurgents on Saturday.

A Troubled 'Afghan Model' (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - As Iraq has descended into chaos over the last three years, Washington policymakers have often pointed to Afghanistan as the success story in the war on terror. Even those who worry about the situation on the ground agree that the United States and its NATO allies have the right strategy in place; they just think we've devoted too few resources to the problem. In fact, Afghanistan is in danger of becoming a version of Iraq, where the central government has collapsed, disorder is rife and a Qaeda-backed insurgency controls large swathes of the country. In addition, the policies that the United States has in place are at best inadequate. We have tried to handle Afghanistan with an Afghan strategy. But it is now clear that the only way to stabilize the country is to have a Pakistan strategy.

In a forthcoming article in Foreign Affairs, Barnett Rubin, a leading Afghanistan expert, reports after four visits this year that the country is "approaching a tipping point." The Taliban-led insurgency is gaining ground. In some areas, parallel Taliban-run governments have their own courts and administrations. The insurgents now conduct suicide bombings—unprecedented in Afghanistan—and use improvised explosive devices like those in Iraq. In their southern strongholds, 35 percent of schools are closed. "As a result of the government's shaky legitimacy and weak powers," Rubin writes, "the international troop presence is coming to resemble a foreign occupation—and an occupation that Afghans will ultimately reject."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai and his counterpart in Pakistan, Pervez Musharraf, have openly quarreled about the cause of the Taliban's re-emergence. Musharraf blames Karzai's incompetence and weakness. Karzai argues that Pakistan has been tacitly—and often actively—supporting the Taliban along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, and in Pakistan itself. Having spoken to a number of senior Western officials and independent observers in both countries, I think it's clear that, in the words of a senior U.S. administration official who wished to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of the subject, "the weight of the evidence supports President Karzai."

Americans want to believe that all good things go together. But here is a telling example of why that's not always true. President Musharraf is a genuine modernizer who has saved his country from becoming a failed state. Despite the compromises he has had to make, he has been more forward-looking on economics, law, religion and even women's rights issues than any government in Pakistan since the early 1970s. But having confronted Islamic extremists on such matters, Musharraf seems to believe that one area where he need not actively thwart them is in their goal of jihad against Karzai's government and its Western backers.

This attitude is part of a traditional Pakistani world view. The Islamabad strategic elite, which essentially means its top military officers, believes that establishing "strategic depth"—having some sway over events in Afghanistan—is crucial for Pakistan. This mechanistic view comes out of the cold war, when India and Afghanistan tilted toward the Soviet Union, and has gained ground as India and Afghanistan have both become pro-American. There are even those in Islamabad who believe that to counter these trends, Pakistan should help drive Western forces out of Afghanistan— even establish a pro-Pakistan, Taliban government in Kabul. That would explain Islamabad's constant refrain that the Taliban must be rehabilitated within the Afghan political system.

At the dinner that Bush threw for both presidents in September, Karzai was extremely blunt, according to those familiar with the discussions (who wish to remain anonymous because of the private nature of the event). Karzai warned that if the United States was forced to leave Afghanistan, Kabul would ally far more closely with India and Russia, which would not be in Pakistan's interests. He also urged Musharraf to recognize that in supporting the Taliban and its doctrine of ethnic Pashtun nationalism, Musharraf was creating a problem for himself since there are millions of dissatisfied Pashtuns within Pakistan.

The United States and its NATO allies should push Musharraf to recognize that what Pakistan needs right now is not strategic depth but stability. Its economy is on a roll thanks to a strong reform program established and overseen by its savvy prime minister, Shaukat Aziz. With India and Pakistan growing at 8 percent a year, the Subcontinent could move into a win-win world in which peace and prosperity reinforce each other in an upward spiral of success. South Asia could then look a whole lot more like Southeast Asia, a region where economic growth has alleviated historical tensions and border disputes.

For the United States, too, there is an upside to success but, more important, a real downside to failure. If Washington is not able to persuade President Musharraf to crack down on the Taliban, it will inevitably mean the renewal of Al Qaeda, the only organization that has launched terror attacks across the globe directed at America and Americans. That's not just a problem for the United States' credibility. It is a problem for the safety and security of its citizens.

By The Book: Taliban Fighters Play By Their Own Rules (NSWK)

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

In case a Taliban fighter wonders what is expected of him, he can now refer to a nine-page, blue and white, pocket-size pamphlet called the Layeha, which Mullah Mohammed Omar began distributing last month. The book (NEWSWEEK obtained a copy, and has seen Taliban fighters carrying it in several parts of Afghanistan) lays down 29 strictures for conduct on the battlefield and in villages, as well as sanctions faced by those who break the rules: strict Islamic justice.

CLASS DISMISSED Government teachers—seen as tools of the "puppet regime"—should be warned to stop teaching and beaten if they refuse. If "found to be teaching against Islam" they should be killed by the unit's commander.

VILLAGE CONDUCT Jihadis are forbidden to "disturb innocents," "raid houses," "take weapons from civilians" or "take people's money or personal property" (rules which seem to be frequently broken).

DELETEAFTERMEVICE Under anti-vice guidelines, smoking is banned, as is the practice of bringing "young boys without beards" to the combat zone or to a fighter's home.

RANSOMS Fighters cannot ransom prisoners without the agreement of a senior commander.

SPY JUSTICE Spies cannot be punished until judged by an Islamic court.

Slain Nevada Soldier At Last Gets Wiccan Plaque (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, December 4, 2006

RENO, Nev. -- The widow of a soldier killed in Afghanistan saw a Wiccan symbol placed on a memorial plaque for her husband Saturday, after fighting the federal government for more than a year over the emblem.

Roberta Stewart, widow of Sgt. Patrick Stewart, and Wiccan leaders said it was the first government-issued memorial plaque with a Wiccan pentacle, a five-pointed star enclosed in a circle.

More than 50 friends and family dedicated the plaque at Northern Nevada Veterans Memorial Cemetery in Fernley, Nev., about 45 miles east of Reno.

They praised Gov. Kenny Guinn (R) for his role in getting the Nevada Office of Veterans Services to issue the plaque in September. The agency cited its jurisdiction over the state veterans' cemetery.

The U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs has approved the symbols of 38 other faiths for use in national veterans' cemeteries; about half are versions of the Christian cross.

The Jewish Star of David, the Muslim crescent, the Buddhist wheel, the Mormon angel, the nine-pointed star of Bahai and an atomic whirl for atheists are also permitted, but not the pentacle.

VA officials have said they are rewriting rules for approving emblems, but the process requires a public comment period.

About 1,800 active-duty service members identify themselves as Wiccans, according to 2005 Defense Department statistics, and Wicca is one of the fastest-growing faiths in the country. Its adherents worship the Earth and believe they must give to the community. Some consider themselves "white" or good witches, pagans or neo-pagans.

Iraq: The War Without Honors (TIME)

By Sally B. Donnelly

Time, December 4, 2006

Are there fewer heroes in the Iraq war than in previous wars? That's the message the Pentagon is sending, say critics, by not awarding today's soldiers nearly as many of the nation's highest military honors. Three and a half years of combat in Iraq, for example, have produced only two winners of the Medal of Honor, the country's highest military award for bravery in combat. There were, by contrast, 464 Medals of Honor handed out during America's involvement in World War II, which lasted the same amount of time. If the government had been as stingy then as it is now, adjusting for the number of Americans who served, there would have been only 30 Medals of Honor won in the fight against fascism. The same applies to the second highest honor, the service crosses: there were 8,716 of those given out during World War II and just 26 so far in Iraq.

So what's different in this war? For one thing, the process for getting medals has become more cumbersome. Some commanders are reacting against what they see as medal inflation in recent wars, especially Gulf War I. And there may be fewer opportunities for Audie Murphy--style heroics when your enemy is planting improvised explosive devices (IEDs) or driving a car bomb. But the nearly 3,000 war dead testify to the peril of those fighting in Iraq, and a growing chorus has been speaking out against the Pentagon's parsimony. They're asking why there have not been more Ã©lite medals and why there have been huge disparities in the number of awards given by different branches of the military. "We need to look into the criteria used and the timing. There are obvious inequities," says Congressman John McHugh, a Republican from New York.

The House Armed Services Subcommittee on Military Personnel that McHugh chairs is launching an inquiry this week into the way medals have been awarded in Iraq. The Department of Defense may be required to issue new standards or even reopen cases in which medals have been turned down or downgraded. The Pentagon, meanwhile, says it needed its own review to consider how combat--and how the military quantifies heroism--has changed since 9/11. It is considering whether there should be new guidelines set for consistency across the services. The Army, for example, has displayed a stunning generosity in handing out the mid-level Bronze Star medals: it has given out an astonishing 52,000 since 9/11, compared with fewer than 1,500 for the Marines.

Some critics think a kind of political correctness may be at play in the military. Says retired Lieut. Colonel Steve Russell, an infantry officer who served in Iraq: "Many senior officers who decide these awards have succumbed to the notion that every soldier is doing a great job and no one should be held out as better than another."

At the same time, some commanders have raised the bar for the highest awards because they say they have seen medals handed out too easily in the past. Army Lieut. General Tom Metz says he remembers clearly how a few soldiers in Vietnam took advantage of the system and won "air ribbons" often simply for taking flights in country. "[In Iraq] I was an award approver for all but the top two awards, and I was tough," says Metz, who authorized a handful of Silver Stars during his two years in Iraq. "I am confident those who got an award with my signature on it earned it."

Perhaps the biggest reason for the scarcity of top medals is the nature of combat in this war, which is so different from that of previous conflicts. The old saying about waiting to see the whites of the enemy's eyes before shooting doesn't apply when that enemy is a quarter of a mile away, looking at you through binoculars to see when to detonate the IED. Yet there are soldiers in Iraq--and Afghanistan--whose valor at least equals that of past generations of Americans. On April 14, 2004, several Marines were manning a checkpoint in western Iraq when an insurgent jumped out of a car and grabbed Jason Dunham, 22, by the throat. When the Iraqi dropped a live grenade during their struggle, the young Marine jumped on it so that his body would absorb the blast, saving the lives of his comrades. He died eight days later. Dunham was awarded the Iraq war's second Medal of Honor last month. It will be presented to his family at the White House by President George W. Bush on Jan. 11.

Gov't Study: School Killings Up Slightly (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — At least 21 people were killed at school during the 2004-05 academic year, a slight increase from the year before, the government reported Sunday.

The study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics does not include data from fatal shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania this fall. In Pennsylvania, five Amish girls were killed in a one-room schoolhouse by a milk truck driver who then turned the gun on himself.

Overall, fewer students reported being the victims of violent crime at school or school-sponsored events in 2004-2005, the study by the Justice Department agency show. Additionally, school-age children remain far more likely to be assaulted, raped and robbed off school grounds.

The study looked at violent crime against students over several periods of time.

The 21 killings at school-related events, between July 2004 and June 2005, targeted victims between age 5 and 18, said Katrina Baum, co-author of the 2006 Indicators of School Crime and Safety. Over the previous year, 19 people were killed.

It was not immediately clear whether all the victims were students. Still, the preliminary data indicates that students were about 50 times more likely in the 2003-04 school year to be killed away from school than at school, the report shows.

The number of deadly shootings has risen and fallen over the past 15 years. Overall school violence has shown a declining trend, although it has increased lately.

The study notes that four of every 1,000 students in 2004 reported being the victim of violent crimes — compared with six of every 1,000 in 2003. Researchers polled students between 12 and 18 for that part of the survey, co-written by the Education Department's National Center for Education Statistics.

Younger students were found to be more likely crime victims — including those injured by bullies, the report showed. Last year, 28 percent of students polled said they had been bullied.

Also in 2005, 24 percent of students questioned said that gangs were at their schools — up 3 percent from 2003. The rates of fights, drinking alcoholic beverages, and weapons found at schools remained at 2003 levels, the report noted.

The Next Crime Wave (TIME)

By Kathleen Kingsbury

Time, December 3, 2006

It's as if Milwaukee, Wis., had reverted to a state of lethal chaos. A Special Olympian is killed for his wallet as he waits for a bus. An 11-year-old girl is gang-raped by as many as 19 men. A woman is strangled, her body found burning in a city-owned garbage cart. Twenty-eight people are shot, four fatally, over a holiday weekend.

These are the kinds of crimes American cities expected never to see in high numbers again. In the 1990s police departments nationwide began applying the so-called broken-windows theory: arrest the bad guys for minor offenses, and they wouldn't be around to commit more serious ones. This zero-tolerance approach--combined with more cops on the street to enforce it, a strong economy and a fortuitous demographic change that reduced the population of young men who typically cause the most trouble--lowered the rates of murder, robbery and rape for 10 consecutive years. Until last year. Not only did crime suddenly begin to rise in 2005, but the most violent crimes led the trend. Homicides shot up 3.4%. Robberies, 3.9%. Aggravated assaults, 1.8%. Hardest hit were not metropolises like New York City and Los Angeles but cities with populations between 400,000 and 1 million--such as Baltimore, Md.; Charlotte, N.C.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Oakland, Calif.--and this year looks to see similar rates of increase, if not worse.

Few places have suffered more than Milwaukee. The homicide count for the city of 590,000 fell from 130 in 1996 to just 88 in 2004. But last year, according to FBI figures, Milwaukee saw the country's largest jump in homicides--up 40%, to 121. This year's total will probably be lower, but as the killings over that bloody holiday weekend and other crimes show, violence has returned to the city. "You'll be able to read about something even more heinous tomorrow," laments Milwaukee Archbishop Timothy Dolan. "People are scared."

DOJ_NMG_0101509

Like the residents of dozens of other recently crime-afflicted midsize cities across the country, people in Milwaukee are trying to figure out why their town has suddenly become so dangerous. While the cohort of young adults is ground zero for violent crime, the reason isn't as simple as a rapidly growing population. Since the late 1990s, the number of Americans under 30 has increased at a rate consistent with that of the general U.S. population, about 6%. Some other likely explanations have emerged.

FEWER COPS ON THE BEAT

Most municipalities count on grants from the Justice Department's State and Local Law Enforcement Assistance and Office of Community-Oriented Policing Services, or COPS, program to help pay for officers on their force. But $1.9 billion, or 45%, of that funding has disappeared since the Sept. 11 terrorism attacks, as federal resources are increasingly directed toward homeland security and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Midsize cities, which depend more heavily on federal funds than larger ones do, have nearly 25% fewer officers than they did in 2001, and the White House's budget proposal for next year would sweep away an additional $1.5 billion. In Milwaukee, COPS universal hiring funds dropped from more than $1 million in 2002 to zero last year. That has left more than 200 police vacancies out of a force less than 2,000 strong. The city is hard pressed to fill the gap, since the police budget eats up nearly the entire Milwaukee tax levy of $213 million. Mayor Tom Barrett is hoping that the feds will start pitching in again. "We've spent five years on homeland security," Barrett says. "Now we need to focus on a little hometown security."

Further exacerbating the city's police shortage is the redeployment of cops from the streets of Milwaukee to those of Baghdad, Mosul and Kabul. As many as 135 officers at one time have gone on leave to serve in Wisconsin's National Guard or military reserve units in Iraq and Afghanistan. "It's difficult to manage a force that's always coming and going," says police chief Nanette Hegerty. Those left to hold down the fort at home feel overstretched and underappreciated. "Morale is low," says Officer John Balcerzak, head of the police union. "We're racing to a new crime before we've investigated the last. That leaves criminals out there on the streets."

Residents feel equally frustrated. "The police simply showing up can be half the battle in many people's minds," says Steve O'Connell, who lives in the working-class Sherman Park neighborhood. This summer, Milwaukee's 911 dispatchers received, on average, 1,700 calls a day. As police captain Donald Gaglione told a community meeting, "If your 911 call is not a high priority, it may take several hours before we respond, if at all." But people who live in volatile neighborhoods say they need police to intercede before minor disturbances become serious matters.

If police are struggling to answer 911 calls, they have even less time to patrol neighborhoods, so they can't build the trust essential to preventing crime. Tensions between the city's African-American community and police are particularly high--40% of the population is black and 47% is white, but there are three times as many white cops on the force. As Alderman Ashanti Hamilton explains, "If the only time people in black neighborhoods see a police officer there it is to arrest somebody, then, of course, they're going to be nervous." Chief Hegerty says repairing this relationship is critical. "We have to count on law-abiding residents to tell us what's going on in their neighborhoods," she says.

Ester Hodges learned that the hard way. A former construction worker who moved into a west-side Milwaukee home three years ago, she says a neighbor's young daughters terrorized her street and, more personally, bullied her children. Hodges, 48, became a one-woman block watch, calling the police regularly, buying surveillance cameras with her own money and speaking out at community meetings. "I let the police know time after time that trouble was coming," she says. Briefly last spring the police monitored her area more closely. Three weeks after the patrols stopped, however, Hodges says, a threatening group showed up at her house. Police still haven't sorted out exactly what happened next, but by the end, Hodges had been shot in the stomach. No charges have been brought in her shooting. She survived, and her neighbors eventually moved, but police are investigating whether Hodges may have taken justice into her own hands by firing at her antagonizers. No one else was hit.

Barrett's administration has tried to address unemployment through a huge investment in real estate development and tax incentives to attract business. The mayor says those efforts have created more than 10,000 local jobs. Most of them, however, are either high-tech positions beyond the skills of many Milwaukee residents or low-wage service slots in retail shops and chain restaurants that pay less than needed to support a family.

"People who have put in a full day's work are generally too tired to go out and terrorize the neighborhood by night," alderman Willie Wade says. Employment can assuage other social ills. It leads to more homeownership--meaning fewer absentee landlords and the drug houses that can go with them. And a job can anchor an entire family. Says Wade: "A little money in his pocket can convince a man to be a father to his children instead of stealing his neighbor's Cadillac."

2 Charged In Fine-payment Scheme (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

The D.C. Office of Inspector General is investigating a reported scheme in which stolen credit cards were used to pay fines for parking and moving violations in the District, court records show.

Federal authorities last week filed arrest warrants that state two persons engaged in the scheme to pay off tickets for people at half the face value of the tickets, according to court records.

An affidavit from a D.C. Inspector General investigator states the scheme involved a man identified as Lonnell Damon Duckett offering to pay off people's unpaid parking and moving-violation tickets. In return, he sought cash for up to half the value of the unpaid D.C. Department of Motor Vehicle tickets, court records show.

In other words, Mr. Duckett, a Transportation Department employee, would offer to wipe out $1,000 in tickets if he received $500 in cash, authorities said.

The second person in the reported scheme has been identified as Ladonna Gray and described as Mr. Duckett's "DMV connection," according to court records.

Investigators say once Mr. Duckett received the cash, he used stolen credit-card information -- reportedly obtained from Miss Gray -- to pay the tickets.

The payments were made over the Internet, a common practice by most municipalities.

The investigation began after four persons who had accounts at the same storage business in the District told authorities their credit cards were being used to pay strangers' fines, records show.

Investigators say Miss Gray worked at the storage business.

Neither Mr. Duckett, 36, nor Miss Gray, 27, could be reached for comment.

The pair was charged under a criminal statute titled fraud and related activity in connection with access devices last week in federal court. The inspector general's office has declined to comment on the case, including whether others were involved.

Co-workers at the Transportation Department said Mr. Duckett described Miss Gray as his inside contact, charging documents show.

In one case, Mr. Duckett's co-worker gave him $500 in cash, then Mr. Duckett gave the co-worker a phone number to a woman he identified as "Donna," his "DMV connection," according to the affidavit.

"Donna" then asked for the person's vehicle tag number before providing the person with a receipt showing that $1,500 in fines had been paid, court records show.

The U.S. attorney's office filed complaints Nov. 27 against Miss Gray and Mr. Duckett.

Janis Hazel, a motor vehicles department spokeswoman, said motorists with tickets should be suspicious of such offers.

"If it sounds too good to be true, it probably is," she said.

Miss Hazel said agency staffers are trained to detect fraud and that the security code on the back of a credit card helps prevent such problems.

She could not say whether the people who had their fines paid through the credit cards would face penalties.

"That's up to the authorities," she said. "It's a criminal investigation at this point. Maybe there's something they can do."

LA Man Sentenced To 7 Years In Prison In Movie Piracy Case (AP)

By Gary Gentile

AP, December 4, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A man convicted of sneaking camcorders into movie screenings and selling the pirated tapes in video stores was sentenced to seven years in federal prison Friday.

"It is hoped the sentence will deter further unlawful conduct and protect the public," said U.S. District Judge Dean D. Pregerson.

Johnny Ray Gasca was convicted in June 2005 of three counts of copyright infringement as well as using a fake Social Security number and of an escape charge for fleeing his attorney's custody while awaiting trial.

Gasca gained notoriety as the first person to be charged in a federal crackdown on video piracy. He represented himself during a weeklong trial, saying he didn't intend to profit from his actions. He said evidence was embellished to make him appear to be a "prince of piracy."

Federal prosecutors showed the jury Gasca's diary in which he wrote that he earned up to $4,000 a week by attending the screenings. Prosecutors alleged he sold the films through small video stores or on the street.

During the sentencing hearing, Gasca accused prosecutors of lying during his trial. Gesturing with his hands and often pointing to prosecutors and the judge, Gasca called the courtroom a "den of snakes" and asked for a new trial, a motion the judge denied.

At one point, Gasca pointed to an FBI agent in the courtroom and said, "I'm going to prove to you he's a liar, your honor."

Before being sentenced, Gasca's voice broke as he thanked courtroom employees for being helpful during his trial.

Gasca was arrested by Burbank police and first charged with misdemeanor burglary after sneaking a camcorder into a screening of "The Core" in September 2002.

The next month, security officers at a Los Angeles theater found him with a camcorder at an MTV screening of the Eminem movie "8 Mile."

And in January 2003, a theater camera meant to record audience reaction at an "Anger Management" screening caught Gasca in the front row with his camcorder trained on the screen.

"Camcorded films are a major source for pirated films that are distributed on the streets and on the Internet costing the film industry billions each year," Dan Glickman, chairman and CEO of the Motion Picture Association of America, said in a statement. "We are pleased that the court recognized Gasca's crimes today with a fitting punishment."

The judge also ordered three years of supervision after Gasca is released and ordered him to attend anger management classes as a condition of release.

Movie Piracy Puts Man Behind Bars For 7 Years (SDUT)

By Matt Krasnowski, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 4, 2006

He's unapologetic for videotaping films in theaters

LOS ANGELES – The first person charged by the federal government for making camcorder copies of films as they were shown in theaters was sentenced yesterday to seven years in prison.

“It is hoped the sentence will deter further unlawful conduct and protect the public,” said U.S. District Judge Dean Pregerson.

Johnny Ray Gasca, 36, the so-called prince of movie piracy, was convicted in June 2005 on three misdemeanor counts of copyright infringement, and felony counts of making threats, witness retaliation, escape and using a fake Social Security number.

His reputation as a less-than-legitimate videographer started in 2002 when he got the attention of employees of a company that conducts movie screenings. Not long after, law enforcement began its investigations.

That year Gasca was arrested after sneaking a camcorder into a screening of the science-fiction movie “The Core.” Security officers at another theater found him weeks later with a camcorder at a pre-release screening of Eminem's “8 Mile.” In 2003, a theater camera that was supposed to capture audience reaction to the Jack Nicholson film “Anger Management” also caught Gasca with a camcorder pointed at the screen.

At the sentencing hearing, Gasca was unapologetic and maintained his innocence. He thanked lawyers who have aided him and court staff, but also took time to note “lies” he alleged prosecutors made during his trial.

The movie industry says piracy costs filmmakers billions of dollars annually. Last year, Congress approved legislation that made camcording a movie a felony with a possible three-year sentence.

In an FBI search of Gasca's Hollywood apartment, agents found video duplication equipment and diaries in which he reported making as much as $4,500 a week selling pirated, prereleased movies.

DOJ_NMG_0101512

He was arrested in April 2003 but was released temporarily to the custody of one of his lawyers before his trial.

Gasca escaped and was a fugitive for 16 months before being captured in Florida – reportedly in a hotel room containing stacks of DVDs and recording equipment.

Jurors were told he threatened a witness in the case and Motion Picture Association of America investigators. He allegedly said he could flood the market with not-yet-released movies if they did not help get back the equipment seized by the FBI.

During his trial, the tough-talking native New Yorker told jurors that prosecutors were embellishing evidence and witnesses were lying. He portrayed himself as a "kung fu" movie enthusiast who distributed foreign-made films but broke no laws.

He said he came to Los Angeles to follow his "true passion" – he wanted to get into the movie business and be a director.

Ag Crime Wave Grows In California (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, December 4, 2006

LOS ANGELES — In a rising wave of rural larceny, thieves are tracking commodity prices to steal everything that grows, plows or sprinkles on the USA's farms.

California, the No. 1 state in agricultural production, reports the biggest problems. Theft rings that kept police busy last year chasing stolen artichokes, pomegranates and diesel fuel switched this year to nuts, avocados, citrus, tractors, irrigation pipe and copper wiring, says Bill Yoshimoto, the supervising prosecutor for a 13-county Central California task force on farm crime.

The task force arrested two men in a Sacramento warehouse Nov. 26 on suspicion of possessing 136,000 pounds of stolen almonds and walnuts valued at $403,000. The bust supplied leads in thefts this year of 14 truckloads of processed nuts worth $2 million, says Detective Vince Gallagher of the Merced County sheriff's department.

The nuts were in 40-foot shipping containers ready for export. Only two containers were stolen in the area in 2005, Yoshimoto says.

Rural thievery "is increasing year by year," Yoshimoto says.

In areas far from cities, farms are often wide-open targets after dark, "with nothing more than a fence on an isolated road barring criminals from bins full of harvested crops," says Danielle Rau, director of rural crime prevention for the California Farm Bureau Federation.

In Alabama and other southeastern states with vast pine forests, the leading theft problem is illegal timber-cutting, according to police reports.

In Minnesota, Ohio and elsewhere, thieves siphon anhydrous ammonia, a fertilizer that can be used to make methamphetamine, from farmers' tanks.

Other targets include ginseng in Michigan, Japanese radishes in Hawaii and irrigation valves in Washington state.

The thefts are "putting our food supply under attack," says California state Sen. Jeff Denham, a Republican from the Central Valley.

No national statistics are kept on rural thefts, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the American Farm Bureau Federation. Yoshimoto estimates that crops and equipment worth $1 billion will be stolen nationwide this year.

Research shows that farmers report only one in 10 thefts, he says. Reported thefts in the Central Valley totaled nearly $9 million last year and will top $10 million in 2006, indicating $100 million in actual thefts there, he says.

Thieves check commodity prices when deciding what to go after, Yoshimoto says.

Herndon Warned Of Accused Pedophile (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

An afternoon of football watching and holiday decorating took a strange detour yesterday for some Herndon residents when they opened their doors to find strangers confronting them with troubling information: One of their neighbors is an accused pedophile.

Members of two groups representing victims of abusive Catholic priests went door-to-door in the neighborhood, distributing packets of information accusing a former Catholic priest who has lived there for 10 years.

"Community notification: Protect your children from a credibly accused serial sex offender," the packet's cover reads.

The 38-page sheaf of material contained information about Edward F. Dudzinski, 56, who last month was among 20 former priests accused by the Catholic Diocese of Wilmington, Del., of sexually abusing children. He served in the priesthood in the 1970s and 1980s.

The diocese disclosed the names in its weekly newspaper, saying that it had found "credible or substantiated complaints of sexual abuse of minors" against the priests. It said eight, including Dudzinski, are living. Dudzinski has not been convicted of -- or charged in -- any sex-abuse crime.

In a letter accompanying the list, Bishop Michael Saltarelli of the Diocese of Wilmington said he released the names at the recommendation of a diocesan review board. A spokesman for the diocese did not return phone calls and e-mails seeking comment.

Yesterday, Dudzinski did not return calls to numbers listed for his address. Two of his roommates, who said the former priest was not at home, defended him and denounced the groups' tactics.

"He's in recovery from his issue. He's not a danger to the community," said one roommate, who would identify himself only as Peter. "All they've done is create a hysteria in the neighborhood for no reason."

As the man spoke to journalists on the front lawn of the two-story, mint-green house where he said Dudzinski lives with several roommates, organizers of the leafleting campaign -- who said they were victims of other abusive priests -- interrupted.

"We are not talking about shoplifting here," called out Paul Steidler, a Reston consultant and a member of Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests. "We are talking about the sexual abuse of children."

As Steidler spoke, a woman emerged from the house, carrying blue gift bags and frosted cupcakes to a worn station wagon at the curb.

"Do you see what they're doing?" she said to the roommate, brushing aside SNAP members and journalists. "They're putting these things in people's mailboxes in our neighborhood."

The woman, who would not identify herself in an interview later, said that she and her 10-year-old son have rented a room in the house for the past eight years and that she trusts Dudzinski. She said the groups' tactics are a violation of Dudzinski's privacy.

"It's very upsetting for him because other than 30 years ago, he's never done anything inappropriate," she said. "That's what I've been told, that's what I've observed, and that's what I believe."

For some in the close-knit community, where block parties and gatherings are common, it was a disturbing afternoon.

Members of SNAP and Voice of the Faithful, another support group for those abused by priests, walked from home to home for close to an hour in the December chill, talking to residents who answered their knocks.

Stella Matthes, who has two teenagers, thanked SNAP board member Mark Serrano and Voice of the Faithful member Evelyn Mercantini as they handed her a packet of information and gave her a synopsis of Dudzinski's alleged past.

Along with the Diocese of Wilmington's accusations, the packet contained copies of records showing that Dudzinski, who moved to Fairfax County in the 1990s to work as a substance-abuse counselor, gave up his license as part of a settlement with the Virginia Board of Counseling in 2003. Those records, available online, show that the board said that Dudzinski had become "personally involved" with teenagers he was counseling.

After Serrano and Mercantini had moved on to the next house, Matthes said the encounter had made her uncomfortable.

"I'm a little surprised that people are going door-to-door," she said. "I think it would be more appropriate if they were to mail something out."

A few doors away, John and Kathy Wilson, who have a 3-year-old daughter, said they were grateful for the information.

"It's always important to know who's living around you," Kathy Wilson said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Back To The Supreme Court: Racial Balance In Schools (CSM)

By Warren Richey

DOJ_NMG_0101514

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON

America is one of the most racially and ethnically diverse countries in the world. Yet 52 years after Brown v. Board of Education - the landmark Supreme Court decision that struck down segregation - US classrooms are growing increasingly segregated.

In part, the racial divide reflects the persistence of segregated housing patterns and the stifling grip of poverty. But it also reflects national disagreement and confusion over how best to address the issue of race.

Monday, the US Supreme Court takes up two cases that confront the heated debate over race. On one side are those who believe affirmative action and other race-conscious programs are necessary to fight the effects of discrimination and inequality. On the other side are those who believe the Constitution mandates a colorblind approach to race relations - that government programs granting benefits based on a person's race are just as illegal as withholding benefits because of a person's skin color.

At issue in the two cases are race-based student enrollment plans at public school districts in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky. Both plans were designed by the local school boards to voluntarily achieve racial integration to provide a diverse learning environment for the benefit of all students. Both plans are under attack by local parents who say the use of race to maintain a racial balance amounts to an unconstitutional form of government discrimination.

The cases confront fundamental issues that stretch back to 1954, when the high court ruled in the Brown case that racial segregation violates the constitutional principle of equal protection.

"This is about what is left, if anything, of Brown v. Board of Education," Theodore Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said in a recent debate hosted by the Century Foundation. If the high court strikes down the Seattle and Louisville programs, "it will be a reversal of historic proportions," he said.

The Brown decision is also the starting point for those challenging the plans, including the Bush administration. But they draw a different lesson from the landmark case.

"In Brown v. Board of Education the court held that intentionally classifying students on the basis of race violates the equal protection clause, and declared the ultimate objective ... to be achieving a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis," writes Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief to the court.

The Supreme Court last considered a similar issue in a 2003 case over race-based admissions procedures at the University of Michigan Law School. The court split 5 to 4, with then-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor casting the deciding vote upholding the affirmative-action plan as a means to bring racial diversity to the elite law school.

Justice O'Connor's retirement earlier this year opens the door for a possible shift at the high court, with Justice Anthony Kennedy now potentially in position to cast the deciding vote in the Seattle and Louisville cases, legal analysts say. Justice Kennedy dissented in the Michigan Law School case and was sharply critical of what he said was an overly permissive standard of review used by O'Connor.

"Were the courts to apply a searching standard to race-based admissions schemes, that would force educational institutions to seriously explore race-neutral alternatives," Kennedy wrote.

The enrollment plans under challenge in Louisville and Seattle are similar in that they are both attempts to address de facto segregation tied in part to housing patterns. The voluntary desegregation programs are aimed at preventing the school districts from sliding into a starkly segregated environment with minority students isolated in inner-city schools and white students isolated in suburban schools.

To achieve a meaningful mix, both school boards decided they would have to use race as a factor in deciding which students should attend particular schools.

In Seattle, the school board set student enrollment at the district's most popular high schools within 15 percentage points of the overall racial balance of the district's students. The balance was 40 percent white and 60 percent nonwhite.

Students were permitted to apply to attend any of the district's 10 high schools. But because some schools were more popular than others, the board created a racial tiebreaker to determine eligibility at the most popular schools.

If a new student would cause that particular school's white or nonwhite student population to increase above the 55 percent cutoff, the student was barred from attending that school. In the plan's first year, more than 300 white students were denied admission to their preferred school because of their skin color. Thirty students left the public school system rather than attend their assigned school.

Parents who oppose the plan say Seattle schools are already diverse and that the race tiebreaker is an attempt to achieve unconstitutional racial balancing.

Lawyers for the school board counter that the desire to integrate public schools is not the constitutional equivalent of seeking to maintain a segregated system.

Supporters say the Seattle plan is consistent with the promise made by the high court in Brown v. Board of Education. There is a fundamental difference between using race to segregate students and using it to integrate them, they say.

The same debate is under way in Louisville. There, the Jefferson County School Board established a broad goal that each of the district's schools should have black student enrollment set between 15 percent and 50 percent of the school's total enrollment. African-American enrollment districtwide is about 35 percent. It is up to school administrators to determine the exact racial mix at each school.

The program is aimed at encouraging students to attend schools outside their own neighborhood, but flexibility is the key to the Jefferson County plan. It seeks to offer options for those parents who want their children to attend school close to home, yet it also seeks to achieve meaningful diversity in every school throughout the district.

The impact of being denied admission to a particular school for racial reasons is cushioned by an approach that urges parents - both black and white - to work with district officials to identify acceptable alternative schools. "You just keep working the process through with parents," says Pat Todd, director of the Jefferson County Schools student assignment plan.

"I don't mean to tell you it works perfectly. I have [some] dissatisfied parents. It is controversial. It is imperfect," Ms. Todd says. But in a broad way, the program is a microcosm of how democracy works, she says. "It is not about perfection. It is about managing the imperfections to people's greatest level of satisfaction. That is what this process is all about."

Not all schools in the Jefferson County system use race as a deciding factor. A federal judge has ordered that four schools offering unique educational programs cannot use race in selecting students - including Louisville's historically black Central High School. Since the judge's ruling six years ago in a case brought by African-American students, black enrollment at Central has risen steadily and now stands at 83 percent.

In addition, districtwide "traditional" schools use a random computer-drawn list to decide who attends those schools.

Todd says she and her staff work to ensure that the proportion of black applicants to white applicants at traditional schools reflects the districtwide goal for black enrollment. That is done in the hope that the random draw will subsequently reflect the desired black-white mix, Todd says.

A similar random draw would not work at the elementary school level, Todd says. It would eliminate the flexibility to allow dissatisfied parents to choose a second, or third, or fourth school option. It is that follow-up effort that helps blunt the impact of being denied admission to a first-choice school because of a student's race.

Todd says although the district uses some race-neutral alternatives, meaningful integration requires using race. "I don't think we can keep our school desegregated over time without the yardstick and vision of some racial guidelines," she says.

Others disagree. The school district's approach "denigrates a 5-year-old's self-worth and self-esteem by comporting him to be color coded throughout his educational career," says Teddy Gordon, who represents Crystal Meredith, a mother who is challenging the Louisville plan.

Mr. Gordon says in his brief that the school district may only use a race-conscious plan to remedy intentional discrimination. Anything else is unconstitutional racial balancing, he says.

The school district's lawyer, Francis Mellen, says that since all schools in Louisville receive similar funding and offer similar programs, students are not deprived of a benefit when they are denied enrollment in their chosen school.

"The student has not been denied an education, only a choice," Mr. Mellen says.

Decisions in the two cases - Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Crystal Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education - are expected by the end of the court's term next summer.

Cases Retread Brown Vs. Board Of Education Steps (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0101516

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — For the first time in a decade, the Supreme Court will revisit the legacy of a landmark: the Brown vs. Board of Education decision of 1954 that declared unconstitutional the racial segregation of public schools.

Separate schools for black and white children are "inherently unequal," Chief Justice Earl Warren said in an opinion that helped launch the civil rights movement.

State-enforced segregation laws are long gone, but for school officials today, a key question remains: Did the historic decision commit them to a policy of seeking integrated schools, or did it tell them not to assign students to a school based on their race?

Today, lawyers in a pair of integration cases will debate whether school boards may use racial guidelines to assign students. And both sides will rely on the Brown decision to make their case.

The outcome could affect hundreds of school systems across the nation, including the Los Angeles Unified School District.

With the arrival of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., civil rights lawyers believe there may be a five-member majority determined to strike down race-based integration programs.

In Seattle, the school board adopted a policy — now suspended — that gave "nonwhite" students an edge if they sought to enroll in a popular, mostly white high school. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district said the black student body at each elementary school should range from 15% to 50%.

In both cities, several white parents sued to have the plans declared unconstitutional after their children were barred from enrolling in the school of their choice because of their race. Though they lost in the lower courts, the Supreme Court voted in June to hear their appeals, leading many to predict the justices are poised to outlaw "racial balancing" in the public schools.

"At its core, the issue here is the promise made 52 years ago in Brown vs. Board of Education," said Theodore Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, which won the ruling that struck down racial segregation in the South. "Mandatory desegregation is now a thing of the past. All that's left is voluntary desegregation, and now that is being challenged."

Shaw said school officials should be lauded for their efforts to achieve integration. He said he was particularly troubled by "the ideology that equates any race consciousness with racial discrimination."

Domino effect

Bush administration lawyers, who joined the case on the side of the parents, say the Brown decision sought to move the nation toward a color-blind policy. They say school officials may not open or close the door to particular students solely because of their race. In short, race-based decisions are racial discrimination, even if the officials are pursing a laudable goal, they say.

"The promise of this court's landmark decision in Brown … was to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis," U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement wrote in his brief to the court. "Race-based school assignment does not advance that objective."

A ruling in favor of the parents could have broad effect. Hundreds of school districts across the nation are said to use racial guidelines in at least some of their schools.

About 54,000 students in Los Angeles Unified are enrolled in magnet schools, where spaces are allocated based on racial guidelines. An additional 3,500 students choose to be bused to another school under a second program that encourages integration. Both programs were adopted in 1981 after court-ordered busing came to an end.

Last year, these programs came under challenge in a lawsuit filed in the state courts. Pacific Legal Foundation sued, alleging the programs violated Proposition 209, the 1996 voter initiative that forbids state and local governments from giving "preferential treatment" to any person because of race.

A U.S. Supreme Court ruling striking down the integration policies in Seattle and Louisville could knock down those in Los Angeles as well.

"Our program is at risk. It is expressly race-based," said Kevin S. Reed, general counsel for Los Angeles Unified. "The program is working very well."

The district filed its own brief with the Supreme Court, urging the justices to uphold voluntary integration programs. Loss of the magnet program would be "devastating," its lawyers said. "Nearly 54,000 magnet students would be returned to their home schools. For the majority of those students, that would mean leaving a desegregated school and returning to a school segregated by the residential patterns" within the city of Los Angeles, they said.

But such a dire outcome is not certain, even if the court does rule for the parents in Seattle and Louisville. They are objecting because their children were turned away from a nearby school because of their race. A voluntary busing program that moved children from the city to a suburb, or from a low-income neighborhood to a more affluent one, would not be affected by a ruling striking "race-based assignment" policies.

Nonetheless, the lawyers who are challenging the school integration policies are confident the Supreme Court will agree with them.

Since 1990, the justices have insisted the government may not use "racial classifications" when awarding jobs, contracts or college scholarships. They also have voided congressional districts that shifted black voters with the aim of electing a black candidate. Last year, the court overturned a California prison policy that separated new inmates based on their race.

O'Connor out, Alito in

There was one exception to this trend. In 2003, the court upheld an admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School that gave an edge to black applicants. Speaking for a 5-4 majority, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said race-based, affirmative-action rules for colleges could be justified as the only way to obtain diversity in higher education.

But O'Connor has since retired from the court.

And last month, Michigan voters essentially overturned the university's policy and outlawed "preferential treatment" based on race.

Now that Alito has taken O'Connor's seat, most conservatives are predicting a majority will vote to strike down school assignment policies based on race.

"I think the court will reject these programs and say this kind of racial counting and sorting doesn't make sense in 2006," said lawyer Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a Virginia group that promotes "colorblind public policies."

Harry Korrell, the lawyer for the Seattle parents, also argues that the traditional black-and-white view of race is outdated in a racially diverse West Coast city. The race-based integration policy for Seattle's high schools resulted at most in "trivial changes in pigmentation diversity at a few already diverse schools," he said.

But the minimal impact of these policies could cut the other way.

In a widely quoted concurring opinion, Judge Alex Kozinski of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals said Seattle's voluntary integration policy could be upheld because it did not involve a "racial stigma" or a preference for one race over the over. It "gives the American melting pot a stir without benefiting or burdening any particular group," Kozinski wrote.

Kozinski, an appointee of President Reagan, is also a former clerk to Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the centrist who may well hold the deciding vote.

A decision is unlikely before the spring.

Extra Credit Affluent Families Have Ways To Sway School Assignments (WSJ)

By Daniel Golden

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

SEATTLE -- The Supreme Court is set to hear a case today filed by a predominantly white parents' group from an affluent Seattle neighborhood. Their children were denied admission to a majority-white school, and instead assigned to mostly minority schools.

The case, dating to 2000, has become a lightning rod for critics who say school boards go too far to try to achieve an elusive goal of racial integration. The court's rulings on Seattle and a similar case involving Louisville, Ky., schools are likely to affect hundreds of districts nationwide that use race as a factor in school assignments.

But a close look at Seattle shows that officials have frequently yielded to school-assignment pressure from white parents in pursuing another elusive goal -- middle-class participation in public schools.

In 2004, after the district scrapped race as a factor in assignments because of the legal threat, another group of white parents from the same neighborhood got upset when their children were passed over at the same majority-white school, Ballard High. They were left out not because of race, but because they didn't live near enough.

This time, the school district quietly backed down when the parents started sending their children to private or suburban schools instead of the struggling, majority-black school to which they'd been assigned. Ballard and other supposedly full schools together took about 100 extra students, most of them white.

Even as parents challenge a government action making room for minorities in highly-regarded schools, the later events in Seattle show another side of the picture: the ways that school-assignment practices can work to the benefit of whites. In Seattle as in other parts of the country, schools sometimes accommodate middle-class parents who push to get their children into coveted schools. When these middle-class parents are predominantly white, as in Seattle, the lobbying can tend to sort more white children into the most desirable schools.

Seattle officials say it's vital that district schools seek to retain middle-class parents who provide time, energy, political support, and money -- via taxes and via private giving to public schools. But they are concerned that some of these parents gain an edge in admissions.

"The district would like to have all of our families have equal access to our high schools," says school-district assistant general counsel Shannon McMinimee. "It is disappointing that some families choose to expend their efforts in finding ways around the assignment system based on perception, instead of working with the district to improve all schools."

A high-court decision siding with the parents suing Seattle and Louisville would culminate a judicial withdrawal from the integration efforts of the late 1960s and 1970s. In that era, many urban districts, some under court order, began using mandatory student assignments to desegregate schools.

But starting in the early 1990s, the court sharply limited mandatory plans, prompting many districts to declare their problems solved and drop desegregation efforts. Today, most large urban school districts are no longer under court orders, but many smaller districts still have integration plans.

Since Seattle stopped seeking racial balance in school admissions in 2002, the schools under scrutiny in the parents' lawsuit have become less diverse. At Franklin High, a school in predominantly minority south Seattle to which many of their children were assigned, the proportion of nonwhite students has risen to 91% from 79%, compared with a district-wide nonwhite composition of 60%. (Nonwhite in district statistics includes Hispanics, Asians and American Indians in addition to blacks.)

At Ballard High in majority-white north Seattle, the proportion of white students has risen to 63% from 57% in the same period, while blacks have dipped to 7% from 10%. Ballard offers about 25 advanced-placement courses, as well as programs from filmmaking to a maritime academy. Art donated by an alumni foundation adorns its walls.

Harry Korrell, an attorney for the parent group suing Seattle, maintains that the city high schools remain integrated. "The whitest school in the district is over 30% nonwhite," he says. "I just don't see that as segregation."

The question of how much to bend for middle-class parents in school assignments concerns administrators nationwide. In New York City, Schools Chancellor Joel Klein has centralized high-school admissions to crack down on what a spokesman calls "a long history of parents gaming the system" by shopping among schools and lobbying principals for slots. The city also standardized criteria for schools for gifted students. One such school interviewed parents about their potential to help the school. Mr. Klein stopped the practice this year amid concerns it put low-income and minority parents at a disadvantage.

According to Gary Orfield, a Harvard professor of education, programs such as Seattle's that let students choose schools are usually set up in ways that give an advantage to middle-class and white students. In Seattle, those who miss application deadlines tend to come from a "more transient population" of renters who are disproportionately low-income and minority, says John Vacchiery, the district's former director of enrollment. This year 8,828 Seattle students applied for school assignments on time and 7,039 applied late or not at all, relegating them to the back of the line.

Seattle has long wrestled with how to integrate schools in its heavily white north side and predominantly minority south. Although it wasn't under court order, Seattle adopted a mandatory assignment system in 1977, spurring white flight from the public schools. In 1988, Seattle turned to a "controlled choice" system that sought integration by grouping predominantly white and minority schools in clusters and allowing families some freedom to choose within the cluster to which they were assigned.

A decade later, Seattle implemented an "open choice" plan permitting ninth-graders to request any high school in the district. One aim was to push schools to improve by competing for students. Since the state's achievement test was implemented in 2001, Seattle 10th-graders have boosted scores overall each year.

Race wasn't a factor in the open-choice plan unless schools received more applicants than slots. In that case, students with siblings already enrolled at the school got in first. Then the district considered both how far applicants lived from the schools -- and race. An oversubscribed school's ratio of whites to minorities had to stay within 15 percentage points of the district's average.

In 2000, about 300 ninth-graders, 200 of them white, were denied their chosen schools because of their race. "People just screamed, 'This isn't fair,' " says Kathleen Brose, a parent whose daughter wanted to go to Ballard but was wait-listed there and assigned to Franklin.

The district sought to placate the parents, increasing the capacity of coveted schools by a total of 100 students. That meant they dipped into their waiting lists, known as "moving" the waiting list. Still, the Ballard waiting list didn't move far enough to reach Ms. Brose's daughter. Ms. Brose became president of the parent group that sued the district.

Four years later, many parents in the same affected neighborhoods -- Queen Anne and Magnolia, just north of downtown -- were upset again. Although by then the district had suspended race as a factor, many students from those neighborhoods still didn't get their first-choice schools, which had filled quickly.

One was Lydia Minehan-Tubic. She and most of her friends were assigned to Cleveland High, a school whose student body is 6.7% white and one that she says she had never even heard of.

Her father, Marko Tubic, an investment representative for brokerage firm Edward Jones, was initially willing to give Cleveland a chance. But the school doesn't offer advanced-placement courses and its graduation rate was 44% in 2005, vs. a district average of 60%. Mr. Tubic decided that "it was important for Lydia to have a good stepping-stone to college."

The families began meeting with school-board members and district administrators. Dick Lilly, then on the board representing Queen Anne and Magnolia, proposed giving those areas' children preference at Ballard. The board said no. "A couple of members viewed it as a matter of white privilege," he says.

Behind the scenes, though, board members and district officials were more receptive -- particularly after the Minehan-Tubics and other families enrolled their children in a suburban district, a move that is permitted under state law. In a July 16 email, Steve Wilson, then the district's chief academic officer, instructed principals at seven high schools to enroll up to 30 students apiece from their waiting lists immediately. Three took 30 each and others took fewer.

"We have found out that many of those students have left the district and have registered in neighboring districts or to private/parochial schools," he wrote. "The short range and long range effects of this could be very detrimental to the district's budget as well as our overall relations with our community." To mitigate the impact on predominantly minority south Seattle schools that would lose students, Mr. Wilson added that no teachers would be laid off.

Mr. Wilson, now a dean at Ingraham High here, says he assured parents their children would thrive at schools such as Cleveland and told them "you've got a real bad, stereotyped image of those schools." When he couldn't persuade the parents, he accommodated them.

Seattle schools superintendent Raj Manhas thinks the parents had a legitimate complaint. He says "there is a definite need for more seats in the north."

Ballard absorbed 30 more students, but didn't get as far down the waiting list as Lydia Minehan-Tubic, who was 58th. Her mother pleaded with Mr. Wilson, to no avail, and filed an appeal citing Cleveland's "abysmal academic record." The district said academic quality wasn't an appeal basis.

In September 2004, Lydia began attending a public high school in an adjacent suburb. Fearing she might be erased from Ballard's waiting list if this became known, her father called Cleveland High every morning for several weeks to say she would be absent that day. Lydia's mother, Florence Minehan, says it was "heartbreaking" to drive her to school past friends awaiting the Ballard bus.

Then late in September, Ballard principal Phil Brockman called and invited Lydia to enroll. "I was crying I was so excited," she says. She's now a junior, taking two advanced-placement courses, and her mother is active in the parent association. Mr. Brockman says he didn't make an exception for Lydia but had an opening and was working his way down the waiting list.

Lydia's mother makes no apologies. "I don't want the low level of academic rigor at some schools to affect her opportunity to have a good high-school education. I don't want to feel guilty about having expectations for her," Ms. Minehan says. Besides, she says, "it's in the district's best interest to capture these families that support education" rather than lose them to private or suburban schools.

Ms. McMinimee, the district assistant general counsel, disagrees. "It's unfortunate these families chose to threaten to leave the district instead of to go to Cleveland. Cleveland has so few white students that if these students had gone there, they would have had a significant impact on its ethnic makeup. It would have been a tremendously eye-opening experience for both groups."

Seattle's system also lets unhappy parents appeal for reassignment based on "extreme extenuating circumstances." Parents of one freshman who didn't get into elite Garfield High, where several of his middle-school classmates enrolled, appealed this year on the ground that he had a disability hindering him from adapting to school without his peer group. The appeal, with testimony from a psychologist, got him into the school, where the study body is about 44% white. The district's Ms. McMinimee says federal law obligates the district to accommodate students with disabilities.

When a wait list "moves," money and parental involvement move along with it. At majority-white Montlake Elementary, parents contributed about $225,000 in 2004 -- $900 per student -- for teaching, staff support, field trips and the like.

John Eickelberg, former president of Montlake's parent group, says his son was slated to attend his neighborhood school, mostly black Leschi Elementary, until Montlake admitted him off its waiting list. He says he didn't use influence to get his son in. But the result, says Mr. Eickelberg, a white engineering manager at Boeing Co., is that "people like myself aren't rolling up their sleeves at the PTA at Leschi because we're sending our children somewhere else."

The district funding formula allocates an extra $756.51 for each low-income student qualifying for a free or reduced school lunch. Still, Cleveland principal Donna Marshall says she has learned to budget conservatively to be ready for a loss of students, and thus of budget money, when more-sought-after schools dip into their waiting lists. She says district officials assure her each year that they won't do that, but then do.

Schools Superintendent Manhas says that with the city no longer including race as a factor in assignments, he "will continue to monitor" diversity at Ballard and other schools. He and board members say the district won't necessarily restore race as an admissions factor even if the district wins the suit filed by the parents, but is defending the case because it wants the option.

A few white students did accept assignments to predominantly minority Cleveland in 2004, including Thea Leidel, whose first choice was Garfield High. Her father, Stephen Leidel, a senior computer specialist at University of Washington Medical Center, says he and his wife considered seeking a transfer for Thea or moving to another neighborhood, but are glad they gave Cleveland a try. "When we go there, we're impressed," he said.

Thea says she was disappointed when most of the ninth-graders assigned to Cleveland from the Queen Anne and Magnolia neighborhoods didn't show up. "They were cheating, getting out of something they weren't comfortable with," says the 16-year-old junior, who plays three varsity sports and hopes to attend Seattle University. "If everyone obeyed the system and went where they're assigned, every school would be better."

Breyer: Court Should Aid Minority Rights (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, December 4, 2006

Justice Stephen G. Breyer says the Supreme Court must promote the political rights of minorities and look beyond the Constitution's text when necessary to ensure that "no one gets too powerful."

Breyer, a Clinton appointee who has brokered many of the high court's 5-4 rulings, spoke in a televised interview that aired one day before justices hear a key case on race in schools. He said judges must consider the practical impact of a decision to ensure democratic participation.

DOJ_NMG_0101521

"We're the boundary patrol," Breyer said, reiterating themes in his 2005 book that argue in favor of race preferences in university admissions because they would lead to diverse workplaces and leadership.

"It's a Constitution that protects a democratic system, basic liberties, a rule of law, a degree of equality, a division of powers, state, federal, so that no one gets too powerful," said Breyer, who often votes with a four-member liberal bloc of justices.

On Monday, the court will hear arguments in a pair of cases involving integration plans in K-12 schools. The legal challenge, which is backed by the Bush administration, could be among the most significant school cases since the landmark Brown v. Board of Education ruling in 1954 banned racial segregation.

In 2003, the court upheld race-conscious admissions in higher education in a 5-4 opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, however, has since retired and been replaced by conservative Justice Samuel Alito. Justice Antonin Scalia, meanwhile, has denounced the use of race in school admissions as lacking any support in the Constitution.

In his interview, Breyer argued that in some cases it wouldn't make sense to strictly follow the Constitution because phrases such as "freedom of speech" are vague. Judges must look at the real-world context — not focus solely on framers' intent, as Scalia has argued — because society is constantly evolving, he said.

"Those words, 'the freedom of speech,' 'Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech' — neither they, the founders, nor those words tell you how to apply it to the Internet," Breyer said.

Pointing to the example of campaign finance, Breyer also said the court was right in 2003 to uphold on a 5-4 vote the McCain-Feingold law that banned unlimited donations to political parties.

Acknowledging that critics had a point in saying the law violates free speech, Breyer said the limits were constitutional because it would make the electoral process more fair and democratic to the little guy who isn't tied to special interests.

"You don't want one person's speech, that $20 million giver, to drown out everybody else's. So if we want to give a chance to the people who have only $1 and not $20 million, maybe we have to do something to make that playing field a little more level in terms of money," he said.

Breyer, who has voted to uphold abortion rights, declined to comment on the court's role in deciding abortion. Justices this term are considering the constitutionality of so-called "partial-birth" abortion in a case some conservatives hope will be used to overturn the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling.

"The more the precedent has been around, the more people rely on it, the more secure it has to be," he said.

Breyer commented on "Fox News Sunday," in an interview taped last week.

An Assault On Local School Control (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

More than 50 years after the Supreme Court decided Brown v. Board of Education, the nation still has not abolished de facto segregation in public schools. But thanks to good will and enormous effort, some communities have made progress. Today the Supreme Court hears arguments in a pair of cases that could undo much of that work.

Conservative activists are seeking to halt the completely voluntary, and laudable, efforts by Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to promote racially integrated education. Both cities have school assignment plans known as managed or open choice. Children are assigned to schools based on a variety of factors, one of which is the applicant's race.

The plan that Jefferson County adopted for Louisville has a goal of having black enrollment in every school be no less than 15 and no more than 50 percent. Seattle assigns students to its 10 high schools based on a number of factors, including an "integration tiebreaker." This tiebreaker, which is applied to students of all races, requires that an applicant's race be taken into account when a school departs by more than 15 percent from the district's overall racial breakdown.

Parents in both districts sued, alleging that the consideration of race is unconstitutional. In each case, the court of appeals upheld the assignment plans. In the Seattle case, Judge Alex Kozinski, a Reagan appointee who is highly respected by legal conservatives, wrote that because the district's plan does not advantage or disadvantage any particular racial group — its pro-integration formula applies equally to all — it "carries none of the baggage the Supreme Court has found objectionable" in other cases involving race-based actions.

The Louisville and Seattle plans are precisely the kind of benign race-based policies that the court has long held to be constitutional. Promoting diversity in education is a compelling state interest under the equal protection clause, and these districts are using carefully considered, narrowly tailored plans to make their schools more diverse.

It is startling to see the Justice Department, which was such a strong advocate for integration in the civil rights era, urging the court to strike down the plans. Its position is at odds with so much the Bush administration claims to believe. The federal government is asking federal courts to use the Constitution to overturn educational decisions made by localities. Conservative activists should be crying "judicial activism," but they do not seem to mind this activism with an anti-integration agenda.

If these plans are struck down, many other cities' plans will most likely also have to be dismantled. In Brown, a unanimous court declared education critical for a child to "succeed in life" and held that equal protection does not permit it to be provided on a segregated basis. It would be tragic if the court changed directions now and began using equal protection to re-segregate the schools.

A Different Race Case (WP)

WHEN THE Supreme Court hears oral arguments today about race-based school placements in Seattle and Louisville, the justices may be tempted to see the cases as the latest showdown over affirmative action. One side casts the matter as a simple issue of governmental race-consciousness; the other talks of diversity. Yet the programs at issue are not classic racial preferences. They deserve to be considered -- and upheld -- for what they are.

A society committed to equal protection under law necessarily finds it uncomfortable whenever government considers a person's race in deciding how to treat him or her -- even if the goal is laudable. But these programs use race in a fashion quite different from those that have inspired the court's skepticism in the past. While the Louisville and Seattle programs differ, neither gives members of any particular race a boost at the expense of any other. Rather, the programs respond to residential segregation patterns by giving minority students preference in preponderantly white schools and white students preference in preponderantly minority schools.

In Seattle, for example, students can generally go to whatever high school they want, subject to available space; race is used as one of several tiebreakers for those more popular schools that become overenrolled. Some of these schools are predominantly white, some predominantly nonwhite. To be sure, such a program has victims -- people who get turned away from the schools of their choice because of their race.

But as Judge Alex Kozinski, a conservative member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, wrote in an insightful concurring opinion on the Seattle plan, this type of race consciousness is different from affirmative action, or government-sponsored segregation. It "is not meant to oppress minorities, nor does it have that effect. . . . There is no attempt to give members of particular races political power based on skin color. There is no competition between the races, and no race is given a preference over another."

The irony, in fact, is that the Louisville plan essentially continues a desegregation program the city adopted under court order as a remedy for past segregation. How can it be that the doctrine of equal protection now forbids the very steps it once required? The question here boils down to whether local school boards should be blocked from any race consciousness in taking even the most modest steps to ensure that children growing up in a multiethnic society go to school with people who don't look like them. For a variety of reasons, Americans still tend to segregate themselves residentially, which would prevent many schoolchildren from attending racially diverse schools absent some intervention to encourage it. It makes no sense to construe the Constitution as prohibiting such actions.

Taser Use Again In Dispute (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

An officer's shocking of an NFL player spotlights how black people are more likely to be stunned by Houston police.

HOUSTON — Fred Weary, a pro football player for the Houston Texans, was driving his maroon Chevy Impala SS last month when he was pulled over by police after failing to signal that he was changing lanes.

DOJ_NMG_0101523

What happened next is in dispute. Police say Weary was "verbally combative" and did not put his hands on his car when ordered. The 305-pound offensive lineman says he did what the officers told him. But one thing is clear: Like many black men in this city, Weary was zapped with a stun gun and cuffed as he lay motionless on the ground.

The highly publicized case has brought attention to some stark statistics about police use of Tasers in the nation's fourth-largest city: Nearly two-thirds of those shocked with the high-voltage weapons over the last two years were black.

And the resulting outcry from black community activists and a City Council member has led Mayor Bill White to call for an independent review of Taser use by the Houston Police Department.

"The mayor took a positive first step, but what will he do when the information comes back and clearly shows that race is a direct factor in who gets Tasered?" said Quanell X, a community activist and leader of the New Black Panther Nation. "We already know that African Americans are Tasered more often than whites."

Quanell X saw blatant racism in the split-second decision by an officer to use a Taser on Weary during his Nov. 14 traffic stop: "This was a small white woman who was intimidated by a big black man and panicked," he said.

At a town hall meeting set for today, Quanell X said, he plans to highlight cases of people shocked by stun guns — including one in which a black man who was having an epileptic seizure was Tasered for failing to comply with an officer's orders.

Shortly after the Weary incident, a UCLA student of Iranian descent was repeatedly shocked by campus police after refusing to exit a student library. The two events have revived a national debate about proper use of Tasers, promoted as a tool law enforcement officers can use to subdue unruly people without injuring them.

Houston police officers are permitted to use Tasers any time they feel physically threatened by a suspect. Every such use is then reviewed by top department brass. Since the city began using the weapons in December 2004, no one has been seriously injured by an electrical jolt, department spokesman John Cannon said. "This is the most scrutinized weapon in the Houston Police Department."

Though African Americans make up about 23% of Houston's population, Cannon said, they account for about half of the arrests in the city. Therefore, he said, the fact that 620 of the 982 suspects Tasered since 2004 were black was not statistically out of line. He added that "a handful" of officers had been reprimanded for using the weapons without proper cause.

In an opinion piece in the Houston Chronicle on Saturday, Police Chief Harold L. Hurtt defended his department's Taser policies, saying that using stun guns instead of handguns has saved lives.

Even before Weary's arrest, Houston Councilwoman Ada Edwards had called for a review of the department's Taser policies and a study on the medical consequences of being shocked with stun guns. City Controller Annise D. Parker had planned to audit the stun gun program to analyze officer training and use of the weapons compared with other cities.

Critics in Houston have said that the Tasers are used too often — particularly against black suspects — and that those who were shocked often did not pose a serious threat.

A judge has dismissed charges that Weary, 29, resisted arrest, finding that he did not use force against the officers when he was pulled over about 1 p.m. for failing to use his turn signal and not having a front license plate. Prosecutors have not ruled out filing other charges after re-examining police radio calls and other evidence.

Weary, who expressed anger and frustration after his arrest, has maintained that he did nothing to provoke the officers. His lawyer, Charley Davidson, did not return requests for comment.

Sharpton Wants Inquiry Into Police Shooting Policies (AP)

By Errin Haines, The Associated Press

AP, December 3, 2006

ATLANTA (AP) — Al Sharpton called for a congressional probe of police shooting policies as he joined local activists Sunday outside the home of an elderly woman killed by narcotics police officers who burst into her home.

DOJ_NMG_0101524

The civil rights leader said the death of Kathryn Johnston — along with the death of 23-year-old groom-to-be Sean Bell, who was shot by police on his wedding day outside a Queens strip club — is an example of "a new sense of police recklessness" sweeping the country.

"Something stinks in this case," he said. "In fact, it smelled so bad that I smelled it in New York."

Sharpton called for the incoming Congress to address the issue.

"There seems to be a new spirit in law enforcement that they can become the judge, jury and executioner of the law on the scene," Sharpton said.

"Police apprehend suspects; they don't kill them," Sharpton said. "This cannot be tolerated in a civilized society."

Johnston — described as 92 by her family but 88 by the medical examiner — lived in fear in the crime-ridden Vine City neighborhood of northwest Atlanta.

On the night of Nov. 21, a group of plainclothes officers burst in, searching for drugs. They had obtained a "no-knock" warrant, saying an informant bought drugs at the house.

Johnston opened fire with a pistol, wounding three officers before she was shot to death.

The informant later denied buying drugs at Johnston's home and said police told him to lie about the incident, Police Chief Richard Pennington said. Pennington said the informant is in protective custody and is a key part of the FBI-led investigation into the shootout.

In the New York case, Bell and his friends were leaving his bachelor party on Nov. 25 when a group of undercover police fired 50 shots at their car. Police have said that Bell's vehicle hit one officer and an unmarked police car, and that officers apparently thought one of Bell's companions was about to get to a gun.

Fatal Shootings By Police: Hard To Investigate, Even Harder To Prosecute (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

With Sean Bell now eulogized and buried, the emotions surrounding his death are swirling around the investigation into whether police officers committed a crime when they fired 50 bullets into Mr. Bell's car.

Although every investigation is different, cases like that of Mr. Bell, an unarmed black man who was killed on his wedding day, have come to follow a similar rhythm and pattern. And experts and those involved in the investigation say that through the history of those cases, they have learned that it is very difficult to convince a grand jury or a trial jury that police officers, who are empowered to defend the public with deadly force if necessary, went too far. In many cases of police shootings, with tensions high, the facts and legal fine points are difficult to isolate from a much larger context.

"What makes these cases so hard are issues that go well beyond the incident itself," a high-ranking official in the office of Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, said last week, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

"It's the racial tension that still exists in the city," the official continued. "It's the mistrust in the minority community. It's cops that are faced with danger every day and have to react in seconds. It's safe to say, if they're wrong, somebody dies" — whether a civilian or an officer.

Everyone involved knows the stakes. While the district attorney's office investigates, civil rights activists and lawyers for the victims and the police officers are struggling to shape public opinion and find witnesses who buttress their points of view.

At a news conference yesterday at the scene of the shooting, some of those people called for an independent prosecutor, saying that a district attorney should not be investigating a police department he regularly deals with.

"They work with the cops on a daily basis, and they have a conflict of interest," said Norman Siegel, a civil rights lawyer, at the news conference yesterday. He described the shooting as "an enormous minefield."

But Mr. Brown said in a statement yesterday that calls for a special prosecutor "are neither helpful nor productive — nor are they in any respect justified." He said earlier that his investigation would be "independent of that being conducted by the Police Department."

DOJ_NMG_0101525

One official involved in the investigation said that Mr. Brown had asked his chief of homicide to prepare a list of what was needed to move forward, and had passed it on to police. The list contained about 30 items, like autopsy and toxicology reports; 911 and radio transmission tapes; hospital reports for both the civilians and the police officers involved in the shooting; ballistics reports; the criminal histories, if any, of witnesses; and photos or videos taken by civilians or the police. Mr. Brown has said several times that the investigation is in its earliest stages and it remains unclear what the inquiry and testimony before the grand jury will show. But the investigation will focus sharply on what occurred in the minutes leading up to the shooting, and in those frenzied seconds when the officers fired 50 bullets at a car, killing Mr. Bell, the groom, and wounding two friends as they left the Club Kalua, a strip club in Jamaica, nine days ago.

The recent history in such cases is mixed.

In the case of Amadou Diallo, fired on 41 times by the police as he stood in his Bronx vestibule in 1999, four officers were tried on criminal charges, including second-degree murder and manslaughter, and acquitted. In the case of Patrick M. Dorismond, killed in Manhattan in March 2000 during a scuffle with an undercover narcotics detective who said he thought the man was a drug dealer, a grand jury declined to indict.

But a year ago, a State Supreme Court justice convicted Bryan Conroy, an undercover officer, of criminally negligent homicide in the death of Ousmane Zongo, shot during a raid in a Chelsea warehouse.

"When you listen to people in the community talk about a case like this, it doesn't take long before the conversation goes well beyond the incident in question," said the official in the Queens district attorney's office. "It goes to other incidents in the past. It goes quite frankly to the general interaction between cops and people in the community."

Michael Hardy, who along with Sanford A. Rubenstein is representing the shot men's families, said they had not ruled out seeking a federal civil rights investigation, but he said the evidence of racial bias was not clear-cut. Of the officers who fired on Mr. Bell's car, two are black, one is black and Hispanic, and two are white.

The police pursuing the inquiry are playing a complex role. On the one hand, they profess impartiality; on the other hand, they are put in the position of investigating their colleagues' own conduct while showing that they take a stand against excessive violence.

The investigators will knock on doors at different times of the day and different days of the week to try to find everyone who may have seen or heard something early that Saturday, one official involved in the investigation said. "Ideally, you want to know as much as you can know before you talk to the key witnesses," another official said.

But to a large degree, investigators for Mr. Brown will be working parallel with the Police Department, which is conducting an internal investigation and may have already knocked on the same doors.

One of the issues the district attorney is considering, the official in Mr. Brown's office said, is at what point a mistake by police officers becomes a criminal act. The answer, prosecutors say, is more complicated than a layman might expect, because state law gives police somewhat more latitude in using deadly force than it gives civilians.

Mr. Bell, 23, and the two wounded men — Joseph Guzman, 31, shot at least 11 times, and Trent Benefield, 23, hit three times — were not armed, and no gun was found. But moments before the shooting started, an undercover detective outside the strip club heard one man in Mr. Bell's party say, "Yo, get my gun," according to a person briefed on the detective's account.

The detective said he positioned himself in front of the car, identified himself as an officer — a point lawyers for the victims dispute — and ordered the men to show their hands. After Mr. Bell clipped the officer with his car and rammed into a minivan where other officers were waiting, the detective began to shoot, said the person briefed on his account.

Police officials have acknowledged that the conduct of the undercover detective — for example, in taking action rather than relying on backup, and in firing at a moving car — was unusual.

"This is a real question," one official involved in the inquiry said. "But it doesn't mean that what the undercover did was bad."

This official said that some of the five officers who fired shots probably faced greater potential criminal liability than others. Although the number of shots fired has provoked outrage, 50 shots can be squeezed off in a matter of seconds, making the number of bullets fired less important than what started the shooting.

DOJ_NMG_0101526

"There is nothing in the law that says you can use deadly force but only fire a certain number of shots," that official said. "The number of bullets is certainly startling to the general public, but the key question is why was the first shot fired by each of them.

"You can't view this as monolithic," the official said. "It's five individuals who made five individual decisions.

"The most important thing is the first shot," he said, "not that the others aren't important. But the most important is the first shot."

The perception of the officer firing the first shot — whether he felt his life was in danger — will weigh more heavily than what Mr. Bell and his companions inside the car saw or heard, lawyers said. "It's a twofold test," Kyle B. Watters, a criminal defense lawyer, said. "First you look at the subjective part: What does the officer believe from what he sees? Then you put against that, what would a reasonable person believe?"

Investigators will also look at the tactical plan for the unit on the night of the shooting, the official in the district attorney's office said.

When the grand jury gets the case, another question is if the officers will testify, and if so, what they will say.

Philip E. Karasyk, the lawyer representing the undercover detective who fired the first shots, and whose name has not been publicly disclosed, said that he intended to have his client speak voluntarily to the prosecutors, and testify without immunity to the grand jury because he wanted the panel members to hear the man's story from his own mouth.

"I want people to understand exactly what he was experiencing and why he did what he did," Mr. Karasyk said. "There is no better way to know what was going in someone's mind than to have them get up there and tell you. Then they can judge his credibility. I want him to put the grand jurors in his shoes and to recreate what he was experiencing at the time, because, unless you've been there, you have no idea what it's like."

Stephen L. Worth, the lawyer for Michael Carey, a white backup officer who fired three times, said that his client had not yet decided whether to testify before the grand jury. "We're keeping our options open," Mr. Worth said. "The truth is the truth, and it's really a matter of when it will come out. It may be at the grand jury. It may be talking to investigators."

Presumed Guilty (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

The death of Sean Bell at the hands of undercover police officers, who also wounded his two companions in their 50-shot barrage in Queens nine days ago, brought to mind a case from a few years back in which undercover cops, acting on bogus information, attacked an innocent group of young people in a car in Manhattan.

The cops in the Manhattan case assumed that the people in the car were lowlifes. They were all Ivy League graduates, and one is currently clerking for U.S. Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens.

The incident occurred about 11:30 p.m. on Jan. 10, 2000. Two men and two women who were running their own startup Internet company, MagicBeanStalk.com, were parked outside a subway station on East 14th Street, near Union Square. Without any warning, a plainclothes officer leaped out of a yellow cab with his gun drawn and rushed the car with the four young people in it.

Thinking he was being carjacked, the driver put the vehicle in reverse and tried to get away. He was blocked by an unmarked police car that had pulled up behind him. He ended up hitting both the unmarked car and the cab (which was also a police vehicle) in his unsuccessful effort to flee.

The driver, Jason Rowley, who was 25 at the time, had no idea that the man with the gun was a cop. "I thought he was going to shoot me," he said in an interview last week. "I was trying to get out of there."

The passenger in the front seat, Sheldon Gilbert, said, "We thought we were going to die, plain and simple."

The first cop was joined by two others, also in plain clothes. The officers apparently were enraged by Mr. Rowley's effort to get away. One smashed the window on the driver's side of the car and dragged Mr. Rowley through it, ripping his thumb in the process. Mr. Gilbert said his door was yanked open and he was punched in the face and then dragged from the car. The two men were then beaten.

The two women, Lauren Sudeall and Marie Claire Lim, were in the back seat, completely terrified. They were taken from the car at gunpoint and handcuffed. All four occupants were arrested.

It turned out that the cops were acting on a mistaken computer report that Mr. Rowley's car was stolen. As frightening as the incident was, the four people in the car were lucky that none of the cops opened fire. "I spent that night in jail," said Mr. Rowley, "and a lot of the officers told me that if this had been elsewhere — for example, if this has been in the Bronx or Harlem — I'd have been dead."

As the case was processed, the police learned that the car indeed belonged to Mr. Rowley, that all four occupants had recently graduated from college (Mr. Rowley from Brown and the others from Yale), that Ms. Sudeall was carrying an acceptance letter from Harvard Law School, and that they had all been coming home from a long day's work at their company. None of that protected them from being treated by the police like trash.

Mr. Rowley and Mr. Gilbert are black. Ms. Sudeall is of mixed parentage, black and white, and Ms. Lim is from the Philippines. The officers who rushed their car were white.

Jonathan Abady, a lawyer who represented the four in a subsequent lawsuit (which the city settled), believes that the race of the victims in that case and in the Sean Bell case — in which some of the cops were black — was a major factor in the way the police behaved.

"Our case was a classic example of disproportionate force being used against entirely innocent civilians," he said. "It was an example of egregiously overaggressive police conduct that I think ultimately is based on stereotypes and perceptions. This case and the shooting of Sean Bell are examples of a very ignominious history of the police taking certain liberties, essentially in communities of color. It's hard to believe that they would have fired 50 shots into a vehicle on Park Avenue and 57th Street in Manhattan."

The four people who were in the car in the Manhattan incident have since done extremely well. Ms. Sudeall, for example, graduated from law school and is now a clerk for Justice Stevens. Mr. Gilbert has established a new Internet venture based on a program he invented that predicts people's buying patterns online. It's very creepy to think how easily one or more of the four could have been killed in their encounter with the police.

As Ms. Sudeall said yesterday, "It seems like it's inviting disaster to be not in uniform, not showing identification and attacking people who may or may not have done anything wrong."

As Md. Court Weighs Same-Sex Marriage, Plaintiffs Hear Echoes Of Previous Fight (WP)

By Mary Otto

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Those days in Alabama are seared into Charles Blackburn's memories: the bombings, a friend's death by bludgeoning, the marches and prayers for deliverance.

He went to Huntsville in 1964 with a wife and a small daughter, a new minister bent on helping to turn back centuries of injustice. A sheriff locked him in a foul jail cell for trying to register black voters. Vandals smashed the windows of his church when he joined marchers in Selma. In the years since, the prophecies of the civil rights movement have continued to unfold.

And with them has Blackburn's journey of self-acceptance. Over time, he would leave the ministry and his marriage, and come to terms with the fact that he is gay.

Blackburn has resumed his march for civil rights, this time beside his partner of 28 years, Glen Dehn, and 17 other gay and lesbian plaintiffs in a lawsuit asking Maryland to legalize same-sex marriage. "It is self-affirming to be part of this civil rights continuum," said Blackburn, 73.

Today, the case goes before Maryland's highest court, where lawyers will debate whether a 33-year-old law defining marriage as between a man and a woman violates constitutional protections against discrimination. The court is not expected to rule immediately.

In January, a Baltimore Circuit Court judge ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, finding that the state's definition of marriage was discriminatory and could not withstand a constitutional challenge.

"When tradition is the guise under which prejudice or animosity hides, it is not a legitimate state interest," wrote Judge M. Brooke Murdock in a 20-page opinion.

The state appealed Murdock's decision and will argue at today's hearing that the law meets constitutional muster and that questions concerning the definition of marriage would be better handled by the state legislature.

Del. Donald H. Dwyer Jr. (R-Anne Arundel) said he is planning to resubmit a constitutional amendment for voter approval that would effectively ban same-sex marriage.

"If the state of Maryland legalizes same-sex marriage," he said, "there will be nothing to prevent it from being taught in the public schools as a normal sexual lifestyle."

Historically, the federal government has allowed states to define marriage. For years, Maryland banned interracial marriage. In 1973, it defined marriage as the union of one man and one woman. Currently, only Massachusetts recognizes same-sex marriage, but several states and the District allow domestic partnerships or civil unions that offer some of the rights of marriage.

Meanwhile, many other states, including Virginia, have passed laws banning same-sex marriage.

In Maryland, Blackburn, Dehn and the other plaintiffs who have applied for and been denied marriage licenses throughout the state say they are not asking for the creation of a new right, just the chance to share in one that has been fundamental for heterosexuals.

Blackburn compares this suit for real marriage -- as opposed to some form of civil union -- as akin to breaking down segregation in the nation's schools.

"The schools could not be separate without being inherently unequal," said the veteran civil rights campaigner, sitting in the home he and Dehn have carefully restored in Baltimore's Bolton Hill neighborhood.

He acknowledged that some people become angry when gay men and lesbians liken their struggle for equality to that of blacks. Blackburn was listening to a radio talk show on gay rights recently when a caller complained about such comparisons.

"I'm black every day of my life. They can hide," the caller said.

"But why should 'they' have to?" Blackburn asked in response. "We're not saying we've suffered as long, or as much. But we have rights that need to be defended."

The way Blackburn sees it, a person compelled to live in a closet of secrecy also suffers the effects of segregation. "The closet is a very fearful place, a very lonely place. You are living a lie," he says. "It eats you up inside."

In addition to the intangible benefits, marriage also confers such rights as spousal immigration benefits, hospital visitation privileges and the right to inherit property. Among the plaintiffs is a lesbian couple forced to live separately because of immigration law. After another plaintiff lost his longtime partner to suicide, he also lost the home they had shared. Others in the suit have been denied the ability to extend insurance coverage to their partners and children.

More than 15,000 same-sex couples live in Maryland, and between a quarter and a third of them are raising children, according to the Baltimore-based Advocates for Children and Youth.

As they have grown older together, Blackburn and Dehn have gotten specialized help in estate planning. But they are still haunted by concerns about issues such as medical decision making or being separated in a nursing home.

"We have heard of this happening to two old guys at the very end," Blackburn said.

Attorneys for the state are not speaking about their case until after today's oral arguments. But in briefs filed in November, they laid out their case.

"No appellate court in the country has declared a right to same-sex marriage to be fundamental," the state argues, pointing to recent decisions in New Jersey and California that emphasize the importance of state legislatures in helping to resolve the matter.

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled in October that the state constitution guarantees same-sex couples the same rights as opposite-sex couples. However, a four-justice majority of the court left it to the state legislature to decide whether same-sex unions should be known as marriage or given some other name.

Also in October, a California appeals court ruled the state's ban on such marriages did not violate the state constitution and pointed to the state's domestic partnership law to counter claims of discrimination.

DOJ_NMG_0101529

"The legislative forum is the most appropriate to address the issue of same-sex marriage and extension of benefit to same-sex families," attorneys for the state of Maryland argue in their brief.

Dwyer, an outspoken critic of same-sex marriage, agrees.

"The legislature in Maryland must deal with this issue," he said. Last year he unsuccessfully pushed the "Marriage Protection Act," which would amend the state constitution to prohibit same-sex marriages and civil unions. He plans to take up the cause in the session that begins next month.

In 2001, Maryland passed a law banning discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. And in 2005, the legislature created a life partnership for medical decision making and authorized an exemption from recordation and transfer taxes for domestic partners. Both bills were vetoed by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) as undermining "the sanctity of traditional marriage."

That's why, said David Rocah, an ACLU lawyer for the plaintiffs, "You resort to the courts."

Religious Liberty Group Takes Up 'Marriage' Case (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

A national religious-freedom group has chosen the same-sex "marriage" case to be argued today in Maryland's highest court to file its first legal argument.

The Beckett Fund, a nonprofit legal group supporting religious freedoms, argues that legalized same-sex "marriage" could result in civil suits against churches that refuse to marry same-sex couples or refuse to hire homosexual employees.

"It's such a controversial issue that we weren't going to move until we were certain the threats were real and pervasive," said Roger T. Severino, a lawyer with the District-based group. "And now we are confident they are."

The group also says the government might strip such churches of their tax-exempt status and of their power to license marriages.

The case before the Maryland Court of Appeals comes from a lower court ruling in January, in which a judge decided a 1973 statute defining marriage as between a man and woman violated the state constitution. The ruling by Baltimore Circuit Judge M. Brooke Murdock was stayed until the appeals court could hear the case. The appeals court ruling is expected in the coming weeks.

The Becket Fund -- which has defended Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus, Jews and Protestant Christians in the United States and abroad -- filed one of nearly two dozen "friend of the court" -- or amicus curiae -- briefs in the closely watched case.

The court may consider arguments presented in such briefs, but is not required to do so.

An attorney for the 19 plaintiffs, who filed their lawsuit in 2004, called Mr. Severino's claim a "false alarm bell."

"There are sometimes tensions between religious liberty and nondiscrimination mandates," said Kenneth Y. Choe, an attorney for the plaintiffs and the American Civil Liberties Union's lesbian and gay rights project. "Regardless of what happens in this lawsuit, that tension already exists, and there exists a legal framework for how to resolve it."

Mr. Severino disagrees, saying the existing definition of marriage as between one man and one woman pervades the law of the land.

"The issue is so fundamental it's almost hard to see the intricate web of connections that marriage has with religious liberty and the thousands of government regulations that affect religious institutions," Mr. Severino said.

Churches or pastors also could be penalized for teaching sacred texts that state homosexuality is a sin, the Becket brief states.

Dan Furmansky, executive director of the Equality Maryland lobbying group, said churches would not be sued or prosecuted for refusing to "marry" homosexuals.

"We're not talking about forcing clergy to recognize marriages they don't want to," he said. "Of course there is a vast body of clergy that won't provide weddings for same-sex couples, and that's fine."

The Becket brief cites a Colorado woman's 2002 suit against the Episcopal Church that fired her on scriptural grounds for practicing homosexuality. The suit was unsuccessful, but was offered as proof that churches that take action based on their holy texts will face lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0101530

"It will be ultimately up to the courts as to whether or not they will respect the First Amendment and protect religious liberty when it comes in conflict with gay rights," Mr. Severino said.

"But recent precedents don't give us a high level of comfort."

The Becket Fund also pointed to a Swedish pastor who was imprisoned for one month after he preached that homosexuality is sinful, though the country's highest court overturned his conviction.

One year ago, the Becket Fund held a conference in which scholars for and against same-sex "marriage" concluded that legalizing the practice would put it on a "collision course" with religious liberties.

Chai R. Feldblum, a law professor at Georgetown University who called herself "part of an inner group of public intellectual movement leaders committed to advancing [homosexual] equality in this country," took part and wrote a paper for the conference.

"We are in a zero-sum game," she wrote. "Again for one side necessarily entails a corresponding loss for the other side."

Voters in 27 states, including seven in the most recent election, have voted to define marriage in their state constitutions as between a man and a woman only. In November, Arizona became the first state in which residents voted against a ban on same-sex "marriage."

In July, five state courts and one federal court issued rulings that upheld traditional marriage laws similar to those in Maryland.

To date, the only state to legalize same-sex "marriage" is Massachusetts by court fiat. After Maryland, pending right-to-"marry" lawsuits remain in California, Connecticut and Iowa.

The Becket Fund is filing briefs in all of the remaining cases.

What's Wrong With My Voting Machine? (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

To the long list of recent Election Day horrors from butterfly ballots to six-hour lines, add "vote flipping."

In Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey and other states last month, there were reports — some confirmed by election officials — that when voters touched the screen for one candidate, the machine registered it for another. One Florida Congressional race, in which the Republican won by fewer than 400 votes, is in the courts because paperless electronic voting machines may have failed to register as many as 18,000 votes.

This year's election had voters across the country once again asking why voting machines are so lousy. Their technology is similar to A.T.M. technology, but when was the last time your A.T.M. flipped a $200 withdrawal into a $200 deposit?

Voting machines, unlike home electronics, are not sold in a competitive consumer market, which is ruthlessly unforgiving of low quality. The officials who buy them generally do not know much about technology. They listen to sales pitches from vendors who relentlessly push the most expensive models. Sometimes, well-connected lobbyists apply pressure. The process is rife with conflicts of interest, from free meals to future jobs with the manufacturers.

Since quality is not the deciding factor, it's not surprising there isn't a lot of it.

Voters who complain about their own machines don't often get a chance to compare them with other options. But New York's boards of elections are replacing the old lever machines, and I recently went to demonstrations the city held to allow the public to try out the five finalists.

There are many important things about a voting machine you can't tell from a quick inspection. But what was clear was almost all disturbing. Here are the ratings:

Avante Touch-Screen (no stars)

This is one of two A.T.M.-like touch-screen machines in the running. Even if they were reliable, touch-screens would not be practical for populous areas. Configured to hold New York's ridiculously large ballot, this five-foot-wide, 280-pound machine is so expensive, at about $8,000, that there might be only one per polling place, and lines could extend for hours. One machine I sampled cut off parts of words. And the bottom half of the name of one of the political parties was missing. A bigger problem is that this machine appears to run afoul of a New York law requiring that all voting machine computer code be given to the state. It runs on Windows, and Microsoft keeps its code secret.

Sequoia Touch-Screen (no stars)

Like the Avante, this machine should be ruled out simply because it is a touch-screen. But there is a lot more to dislike. The paper records produced by a voting machine should be secured in a lockbox. On this one, they fall into a small bag that could easily be snatched. Not that a thief would need to bother. The bag has a zipper on the bottom. Like Avante's, this touch-screen runs on Windows, which probably means it cannot satisfy New York's code-sharing law.

Sequoia Optical Scan (no stars)

With optical scans, many voters can fill out paper ballots at the same time. They are then fed into an optical scan reader, which goes very quickly. Unfortunately, this machine has other problems. Instead of blackening an oval next to their choice, voters connect a broken arrow. I have filled in thousands of ovals, but I had never before connected a broken arrow. As we saw with the butterfly ballot in 2000, the voting machine is not a good place to ask voters to acquire new skills. New York law requires that candidates of the same party be listed in a single column, to make it easier to vote by party. This machine scatters candidates of the same party all over the ballot.

Diebold Optical Scan ?

When I fed my ballot into this machine, it jammed twice. The sales representative expressed shock, but this is a frequently heard complaint. Even a balky optical scan is better than a touch-screen, but how hard is it to make one that doesn't jam?

Diebold has been the most infamous name in elections since its chief executive wrote that he was committed to helping deliver Ohio to President Bush, in an election in which his machines were counting the votes. The company has a long list of misdeeds, including installing unapproved and uncertified software in California.

ES&S Optical Scan ?½

This seemed like the best of the five machines on display, but that wasn't saying much. ES&S machines were used in Florida's 13th Congressional District, where they are still looking for the 18,000 votes that may have gone missing.

New York's official testing agencies notified election officials last week that none of these five machines fully meet the state's standards. New York has been the slowest state to adopt new voting machines, and the fact that the manufacturers were displaying products that still did not comply with state law says a lot about the basic level of competence in the industry.

No one in New York has much patience for more delay. But if it comes down to waiting longer or sticking voters with illegal or unreliable machines that will undermine democracy for years to come, officials should wait, and insist on better machines. New Yorkers, and all Americans, deserve better choices than the voting machine industry is offering.

US Air, Delta Launch PR Battle (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, December 4, 2006

Delta Air Lines' creditors and a bankruptcy judge will decide whether US Airways buys Delta, but that isn't stopping both airlines from battling for public opinion.

Both airlines have hired big names in the financial public relations business to help shape the views of Wall Street analysts, airline employees and airline customers as well as the creditors and judges. US Airways hired New York communications firm Joele Frank, Wilkinson Brimmer Katcher. Delta is using Kekst and Co., a large New York financial PR firm with longstanding ties to the airline.

In a surprise announcement Nov. 15, US Airways publicly offered Delta's bankruptcy creditors $8 billion in stock and cash for Delta, which is in Chapter 11. Delta's management has rebuffed the offer.

The unveiling was well-orchestrated. That morning, US Airways' PR team, along with a team from Joele Frank, placed predawn phone calls to dozens of reporters and Wall Street analysts to alert them to an 8:15 a.m. conference call with CEO Doug Parker.

DOJ_NMG_0101532

A new electronic newsletter, For the Record, now spins every small development in the pending deal in the most favorable light to US Airways.

"They do aggressive financial PR, and they are very good at it," US Airways Senior Vice President Elise Eberwein said of the Joele Frank firm. Frank could not be reached.

Meanwhile, Delta bought a full-page advertisement opposing the merger in its hometown newspaper, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. And at the urging of its own employees, Delta ordered and distributed 50,000 red "Keep Delta My Delta" lapel buttons. US Airways has scheduled meetings with influential newspaper editorial boards.

Experts on the PR industry say it's common in hostile takeovers for the pursuer and pursued to hire specialized PR firms. PR Week reporter Hamilton Nolan says the firms know their audiences, and the stakes.

"They ask: 'What's the message to the creditors, to the media, to analysts, to customers, to shareholders?' All those groups get targeted messages."

Not all PR is for public consumption, however. Right after last month's announcement, Delta placed countless private phone calls to its unsecured creditors to argue that a merger would be risky and that Delta is better off alone.

The takeover fight between Delta and US Airways won't be over anytime soon. Delta hopes to show creditors its business plan as a stand-alone airline later this month.

Michael Freitag, the Kekst partner overseeing the Delta account, says financial PR is a long-term project. Delta's efforts to win support from all its crucial constituents "is a marathon, not a sprint."

Steering A New Course Through The Skies (MINNST)

By Liz Fedor, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 4, 2006

Airline mergers could face tough scrutiny in Congress as U.S. Rep. James Oberstar takes over a key House committee.

U.S. Rep. James Oberstar intends to take a hard look at potential airline mergers in the coming months because he knows that fusing two carriers together often causes pain for employees and hurts some consumers.

The Minnesota Democrat already is scrutinizing the proposed US Airways-Delta merger.

Next month, Oberstar will assume the chairmanship of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, where he will be well-positioned to raise concerns in the event that a wave of consolidation sweeps the airline industry next year, as some observers predict.

While airlines don't need congressional approval to merge, Oberstar's post gives him the ability to spotlight antitrust issues that the Justice Department is legally obliged to examine.

"People are saying there is overcapacity" and that some seats should be removed from the market, Oberstar said. But he sees carriers flying with many full planes and argues "there is a lack of substantial competition" on many routes.

Oberstar, who was reelected to a 17th House term last month, gave his assessment of the state of the airline industry and talked about his oversight role during an interview last week with the Star Tribune.

The only member of the Minnesota delegation who was serving in Congress when the airline industry was deregulated in 1978, he sees that move as a success.

"There's no question about the success of deregulation," Oberstar said. "It has created seamless travel, more nonstops, more destinations, more opportunities." By taking the government out of the pricing business, consumers are saving about $6.5 billion a year on fares, he argued.

"So when mergers and acquisitions and leveraged buyouts are considered," Oberstar said, "my first thought is: Is the result going to be undoing the consumer benefits of deregulation?"

The latest round of merger speculation began Nov. 15, when US Airways CEO Doug Parker made a hostile move to acquire bankrupt Delta Air Lines. On Thursday, US Airways executives had their first meeting with Delta's creditors committee in an attempt to win their support for the deal.

"US Airways has hardly digested the merger with America West," Oberstar said, referring to the lingering labor and operational issues from the combination of those two carriers in the fall of 2005.

US Airways and Delta now compete on about 155 domestic routes, and Oberstar said he has directed his staff to examine the impact of a merger on those routes.

"What does this do in markets where the two carriers are now competing? Who are the other competitors in those markets? Will some cities lose out? Will travelers [end up] paying higher fares? Those are the questions that I think have to be evaluated before you can make a judgment on whether this proposed merger would be in the overall best public interest," Oberstar said.

Eagan-based Northwest Airlines also is considered a merger candidate, with Continental and American considered as potential partners -- or Delta, if the deal with US Airways doesn't happen.

After current Northwest board chairman Gary Wilson and businessman Al Checchi led a leveraged buyout of Northwest in 1989, Oberstar said they spent a lot of time and money examining possible mergers. Ultimately, he said, Northwest chose instead to pursue code-sharing agreements with carriers such as Continental. Those alliances allow passengers to travel on two airlines for a single trip, but gain the ticketing and baggage-handling convenience of flying on one.

Northwest's last merger was 20 years ago when it combined with Republic Airlines, and Oberstar said he saw a "clash of cultures," which is typical of any merger.

In the days after the merger, Oberstar said, "I'd stop and ask station managers how things were going, and they'd whisper, 'I am a Republic guy and Northwest is a long-haul [airline]. We are a short-haul [airline]. They don't understand how to do things.' "

Oberstar did not say which airline he believes might emerge as the most likely merger partner for Northwest, but he did indicate that he sees the Eagan-based company facing stiffer competition to expand U.S. flights to China. Specifically, he doesn't believe that the U.S. Department of Transportation will grant Northwest authority for a hotly contested new route to China.

There is a four-way competition for the China route, and Northwest has proposed that it be between Detroit and Shanghai. Oberstar categorized Northwest and Continental as "second-tier players" in the competition.

"From the standpoint of competition, it might be a better decision by DOT to award service to American [Dallas to Beijing], provided their service will challenge United," Oberstar said. By mid-December, he intends to make a recommendation to the department, and he said that he will likely suggest the route go to American or United.

Oberstar said he has talked often this year with Northwest and Mesaba Airlines employees as they've faced big concessions, which he said have "left very deep resentment." Now, he said, it is "incumbent upon management at Northwest and Mesaba" to sit down with their employees "and win their trust."

Blackstone, KKR, Bain Capital Shop In South Africa (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

Edgars Consolidated Stores Ltd. of South Africa is in talks with Blackstone Group, Bain Capital and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. on a potential $3 billion deal that would be the largest private-equity buyout in that country, according to people familiar with the situation.

The emergence of the largest U.S. private-equity firms as possible buyers of one of South Africa's biggest retail groups illustrates how the booming sector is scouring further afield to deploy the billions in cash raised in recent years.

Edgars Consolidated Stores, known as Edcon, said in October that it was approached by private-equity firms interested in acquiring the fashion chain, which has more than 900 stores in South Africa, Botswana, Namibia, Swaziland and Lesotho. Founded in 1929, the Johannesburg company has more than 20,000 employees and a market value of about 19 billion rand ($2.6 billion).

Some of the U.S. firms working on a potential acquisition may make a combined bid, but final decisions haven't been made, the people close to the matter said. The company has asked for firm proposals to be made in January, they said.

Edcon couldn't be reached for comment, nor could representatives from the private-equity firms.

Edcon would be the latest in a string of potential private-equity takeovers in South Africa. Financial-service provider Alexander Forbes Ltd. received a bid by a group of investors led by Actis Capital LLP, and grocery chain Shoprite Holdings Ltd. has drawn potential private-equity bids.

DOJ_NMG_0101534

After raising record sums from public pension plans, university endowments, insurance companies and wealthy individuals, private-equity firms have been pursuing ever-larger deals in the U.S. and Europe. But as the amount of money they manage swells, they are looking to new economies in Asia and Africa to acquire large businesses.

In addition to the South African targets, the world's largest private-equity firms have been attempting big deals in Australia and are venturing into China and elsewhere. Private-equity firms are partnerships that use investors' money and large amounts of borrowed money to buy companies, improve them and sell them again, typically in about three years.

Earlier this year, Edcon competed in an auction to purchase the Myer department-store chain in Australia from Coles Myer Ltd. but lost to Texas Pacific Group and one of its affiliates.

Bush Mulls Resumed Energy Drilling Off Alaska (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — President Bush is considering whether to lift the 17-year-old moratorium on energy drilling in the waters off southwestern Alaska, a White House spokeswoman said Sunday, which would allow oil and gas companies to try to tap into more than five trillion cubic feet of natural gas that lies beneath rich fishing grounds.

The push to market oil and gas leases in these waters, which oil and gas companies favor, is part of a larger national effort to expand domestic supplies of fossil fuel by opening up areas of the outer continental shelf, long off-limits to energy development.

Last summer the Interior Department recommended reopening several areas of the outer continental shelf, including the southern part of Bristol Bay, which lies just north of where the Aleutian Islands meet the Alaskan mainland, to energy exploration. The report said that 14 oil and gas companies had supported the idea. The department has estimated that such a move could create up to 11,500 jobs, part of what it describes as "net benefits" of $7.7 billion.

In a letter to President Bush on Friday, a coalition of environmental groups, including the Wilderness Society, the Sierra Club and the Natural Resources Defense Counsel, citing the impact of the Exxon Valdez oil spill, called the bay "an economically critical salmon fishery," adding that "it provides essential habitat for the endangered northern right whale."

The executive director of Greenpeace, John Passacantando, said Sunday that the Bering Sea was "the most intact marine ecosystem in United States waters" and that Bristol Bay was "among the most important parts of the Bering Sea."

Asked about the potential impact of an outer continental shelf leasing program confined to the southern waters of the bay, Mr. Passacantando said: "The energy industry ultimately gives you things that look like the Exxon Valdez. It was because of the threat of this kind of spill that that leases were initially rescinded."

He was referring to a handful of oil leases that were granted in the southern part of Bristol Bay in 1988, then bought back by the federal government after the Exxon Valdez supertanker, with a captain who had been drinking, ran aground on Bligh Reef in March 1989. The tanker ruptured and spilled 11 million gallons of crude oil into the sound.

The Alaska Economic Development Commission has supported opening the area to expand economic diversification, and has concluded that the impact on marine life can be "fully mitigated," the Interior Department reported.

When Congress, acting at the urging of Alaska's senior senator, Ted Stevens, a Republican, rescinded its protections for Bristol Bay in 2003, the area remained protected by earlier presidential decisions, first by President George Bush in 1991 and then, in 1998, by President Bill Clinton, who put the area off-limits to energy leasing until 2012.

There has been widespread speculation among environmental groups and fishing industry representatives that President Bush would end the moratorium during the lame-duck session of Congress, allowing the Interior Department to proceed with its plans to market oil and gas leases in the southern section of the bay, along the north coast of the Aleutian Islands.

The Associated Press reported over the weekend that the administration was considering ending the moratorium, a report that was confirmed by a White House spokeswoman, Emily Lawrimore. She would not comment on the merits of the debate but said the president was considering whether to end the leasing moratorium.

DOJ_NMG_0101535

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, said in a statement Sunday that "executive withdrawal on oil and gas leasing in Alaska's Bristol Bay, one of our nation's most sensitive fisheries, combined with House Republicans scheduling a vote next week to expand offshore drilling off Florida's coast, only underscores that G.O.P. stands for Gas and Oil Party."

Mr. Markey added, "The administration should be leading efforts to increase fuel economy standards, which would dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil."

An Important First Step (WT)

By Newt Gingrich

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

In the remaining days of its lame-duck session, the House should adopt Sen. Pete Domenici and Sen. Mary Landrieu's narrowly drawn bill to expand Gulf Coast oil and gas production. If adopted, it would give the Gulf states a greater share of oil revenues to rebuild and restore the vanishing coastline. The Domenici-Landrieu bill is a good first step toward a process in which other states could apply for permission to develop new offshore oil and gas reserves in exchange for a share of the revenues.

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita decimated the Gulf Coast, and after federally built flood-control systems failed, flood waters ravaged the city of New Orleans and the surrounding region. But the levees were not the only system that failed. Mismanagement and neglect over the last half century have contributed to the serious erosion of the coastal wetlands, the first line of defense against such devastating hurricanes. The wetlands and barrier islands act as a natural sponge to soak up storm surges but are disappearing at the rate of 25 square miles a year. Hurricanes Rita and Katrina are estimated to have lapped up an additional 217 square miles with 1,900 square miles already lost. The effects of this ecological disaster cost us thousands of lives and hundreds of billions of dollars, too high a price to ever be paid again.

Meanwhile, it has become abundantly clear that America's dependence on foreign oil is dangerous. We must seek out new energy sources in the near and long term. Our offshore petroleum reserves hold great promise for the near term as we pursue longer-term solutions in alternative renewable technologies.

Congress must act to provide the infrastructure necessary to prevent a Katrina-scale disaster from ever reoccurring along the Gulf Coast while providing for our growing energy needs.

The Domenici-Landrieu Bill -- "The Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act" (S. 3711) -- has the endorsement of both the Democratic and Republican Senate Leadership but is being held up in the House. House Republicans are pushing for a much stronger bill that would open the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to drilling but has no chance of passing the Senate.

The Senate bill expands current offshore drilling by 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico and shares the revenues from that new production with the four states (Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama) that the drilling would affect. The federal government would still get 50 percent of the royalties accrued from the new production while 37.5 percent of money will go directly to the four coastal states for restoration of the disappearing wetlands, and infrastructure projects aimed at flood control and hurricane protection. The remaining 12.5 percent would go toward the joint state and federal Land and Water Conservation Fund projects to benefit all 50 states.

The Domenici-Landrieu bill also gives the coastal states a fairer deal on offshore drilling. Under current law, revenues from land-based drilling -- even on federal land -- are split evenly between the states and federal government to compensate the states for the use of state infrastructure that contributes to oil production. These revenue-sharing provisions currently exclude offshore drilling and allocate zero revenue to the states. Revenue sharing under the Domenici-Landrieu bill would not cut into current federal revenues as the revenue-sharing provisions apply only to new production.

The fairness embodied in this bill should be expanded beyond just the Gulf Coast states. Congress should open up the revenue sharing option to all states without removing the blanket federal moratorium on new offshore development. With the prospect of new revenue streams as a powerful incentive, states could then apply to Congress for permission to drill offshore. This reasonable compromise would still give Congress the final say over any offshore expansion while opening the door to future offshore production.

Instead of holding out for an impossible bill, the House Republicans would be wise to see the Senate bill as an important first step toward energy self-sufficiency through expanded offshore oil and gas production, disaster prevention and ecological restoration. Completing this in the next few weeks is an important step in the right direction.

White House Opens Up Energy Agenda (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Facing increased political pressure on environmental policy at home and abroad, the Bush administration is signaling new interest in promoting alternative energies and curbing greenhouse gases.

As part of President Bush's energy agenda for the rest of his term, administration officials may push U.S. auto makers to make more vehicles that can run on ethanol and other alternative fuels. To boost availability, they are also considering a call to cut tariffs on imported ethanol.

White House aides are also suggesting new openness to global-warming solutions, including the broad emissions limits they have resisted so far. The ultimate aim is to begin piecing together a framework to replace the Kyoto accord after it expires in 2012.

"Would we support a one-size-fits-all, economy-wide mandate? Presently it's not feasible or necessary," White House environmental adviser James Connaughton said in an interview. "But it's not off the table" post-2012, he added. While Mr. Bush's presidency ends in early 2009, he can influence negotiations under way for the next global climate-change treaty.

Environmental issues have gained urgency since Democrats won control of both the House and Senate in last month's elections. While many congressional Republicans shared Mr. Bush's skepticism toward environmental regulations, Congress's new Democratic leaders are more likely to push for action, particularly on climate change.

After the election, George Banks, a senior aide to Mr. Connaughton, sent an email to a top aide of Sen. Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, congratulating Ms. Boxer on the election, which elevated her to chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee. Mr. Banks added that he would like to meet to discuss climate change. Ms. Boxer called the overture an encouraging sign, after years of White House indifference.

Foreign leaders also are stepping up calls for Mr. Bush to move on the issue. Germany is trying to restart international talks on climate change in its role as host of the 2007 annual summer summit of the Group of Eight industrial powers. The White House has indicated a willingness to explore the idea, according to German officials. The U.S. response has been a "major step forward," says the German official in charge, Bernd Pfaffenbach. "We are going to explore whether it's possible to find a post-2012 formulation," he added.

Meanwhile, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has taken an active interest in energy and environmental policy, having been an advocate for curbing carbon emissions in his previous job as Goldman Sachs Group Inc.'s chief executive.

While Mr. Paulson hasn't spoken publicly about the issue since taking office in July, he is part of a group of administration officials looking at ways to reduce dependence on foreign oil and stimulate the market in the U.S. for alternative energy. The group is expected to present ideas to Mr. Bush in the next few weeks. Among the options: lifting tariffs on imported ethanol and providing more subsidies for those who make and sell alternative fuel.

Mr. Paulson also is intent on bringing China into future climate-change solutions, and plans to make greenhouse gases a focus of his talks with Chinese leaders when visiting Beijing this month.

Many American skeptics of global treaties on the environment have said they are meaningless unless China and India can be persuaded to join the next round.

On the domestic front, the administration has been pressing U.S. auto makers to ramp up production of so-called flex-fuel vehicles that can run on either gasoline or alternative fuels such as ethanol or biodiesel. The CEOs of the Big Three manufacturers -- General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group -- pledged after a recent meeting with Mr. Bush to make 50% of their new vehicles capable of running on alternative fuel by 2012. But they said they want assurances of adequate "incentives" for production of flex-fuel vehicles as well as for production and distribution of renewable fuels.

DOJ_NMG_0101537

At the same time, the administration is pursuing a strategy of encouraging technological innovation -- instead of regulation and mandated caps -- to reduce overall carbon-dioxide emissions. Last week, administration officials announced the awarding of $1 billion in tax credits to nine companies to develop cleaner coal-burning power plants around the U.S.

But Mr. Connaughton, in the interview, suggested that the administration is weighing other strategies, possibly including tougher mandates, for after 2012, when the Kyoto accord expires. The Bush administration rejected the 1997 Kyoto accord in 2001, viewing its limits on carbon-dioxide emissions as a recipe for economic disaster.

Now, Mr. Connaughton said, even carbon mandates aren't out of the question. "Everyone is looking at what's achievable beyond 2012," he added, and the U.S. must "calibrate its policy to the science" on global warming.

Any new U.S. framework is unlikely to "replicate the mistakes of Kyoto," Mr. Connaughton said. But "as for the shape of what the future looks like, there are lots of ideas swirling around." Critics say the Kyoto accord was too ambitious in seeking to hold carbon-dioxide emissions below 1990 levels before technology was available, and also because it excluded rapidly developing economies such as China and India.

Some Democrats remain skeptical of the administration's interest in climate change and say they don't expect major progress on things like fuel efficiency or greenhouse-gas emissions.

"Recently, the administration has begun to change its rhetoric on global warning and climate change, but given their history it's easy to suspect that only their rhetoric is changing," said Rep. Henry Waxman, a Democrat from California and incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee.

Greener, Cleaner ... And Competitive? (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

The last time renewable-energy entrepreneurs were this gung-ho, in the early 1980s, subsidies - not sales - buoyed their business plans. This time may be different. For example:

• So many utility customers signed up for the "GreenChoice" program in Austin, Texas, that the city organized a raffle to decide who would get the last 1,400 slots. The reason: The program's wind-powered electricity was actually cheaper to generate than traditional power.

• Midwestern ethanol plants this summer were producing renewable fuel at a cost of $1.27 a gallon or less, making it competitive with gasoline even without tax subsidies, notes Vernon Eidman, a University of Minnesota professor of agricultural economics.

• A recent study by the RAND Corp. shows the nation's economy would be likely to benefit, rather than be slowed, if the nation achieved the goal of supplying 25 percent of its energy needs from renewable sources by 2025.

While most renewable fuels can't yet compete with their traditional counterparts, their costs of production are falling steadily. If the trend continues, America's energy mix by 2025 could be far greener and cleaner - without damaging the economy - than most analysts could have antici-pated a few years ago.

That development would not only reduce the nation's dependence on oil, it would mean a substantial start on capping its greenhouse-gas emissions, which most scientists link to global warming. And such a move, if the RAND analysis proves correct, would come at little or no cost to the economy.

"At this point, the lines haven't crossed yet where renewables are cheaper than coal power," says Jonathan Naimon, managing director of Light Green Advisors, an institutional money manager focused on environmental investing. "But we do see a lot of opportunity as this process of renewable power getting steadily cheaper continues.... There have been reports over the years saying the long-term costs of renewables are cheaper than fossil simply because you don't pay for fuel." New findings, new hope for renewables

The RAND Corp. report - issued in November - estimated that if the cost to produce renewable energy continued to fall at its current rate, renewables could provide 25 percent of the nation's power by 2025 at no additional cost to the economy and perhaps even save money.

If current trends continue, for example, renewable energy will be 20 percent less expensive to produce in 20 years. But the study, which examined 1,500 scenarios, goes further. If renewable costs fell at a faster rate, the nation could save $30 billion in energy costs by 2025, the report found. Even if renewable-energy costs grew slightly and oil prices fell further than expected, any negative economic drag on the economy would be slight, the study concluded.

Beyond the economics, such a shift would have a big impact on US emissions of greenhouse gases, eliminating 1 billion tons of carbon emissions - about one-seventh of total US emissions - by 2025. The US "can achieve significant reductions in greenhouse-gas emissions without significant effects on energy expenditures," the study found.

Such studies are part of a growing body of research that indicates the cost of renewables may not be an economic drag after all.

"There is an emerging consensus that we need to enter a rapid transition to clean energy technology," Reid Detchon, executive director of the Energy Future Coalition, a nonprofit energy advocacy group that requested the RAND study. "For years there has been this myth of an expensive and painful transition. This report helps knock that down."

President Bush rejected the Kyoto climate accords because of projected high costs to the economy from capping carbon emissions and tapping alternative energy. Some US studies a few years ago estimated Kyoto's potential cost at $1 trillion to $2.5 trillion by 2010. Building consensus in the business world

Business is also warming to renewables.

"We've reached the same conclusion as this study and so have the capital markets," says energy expert Amory Lovins, who cites $63 billion in global investment in renewables this year. "Anybody who's paying attention to the cost performance of renewables will find many that compete quite nicely now."

For example, renewable power can play a key role in stabilizing energy prices.

Having substantial wind power in a portfolio moderates rates during price swings in natural gas and coal, says Shimon Awerbuch, a British energy economist at the University of Sussex who has studied the moderating impact of wind power on electric rates.

Others agree. "No matter which way costs go as the shift to renewable energy occurs, we're not talking about a gigantic change in the energy bill for the country," says Michael Toman, director of environment, energy, and economic development program at RAND. "There's no reason to look at it as if the economy is going to grind to a screeching halt."

Inquiry Turns To Humans On Pollutant, Hormone Tie (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Growing evidence that chemicals in the environment can interfere with animals' hormone systems -- including the discovery that male Potomac River fish are growing eggs -- has focused the attention of environmentalists and scientists on a new question: Are humans also at risk?

A decade ago, the very idea that pollutants could interfere with a body's chemical messages was near the fringes of science. But now, it is an urgent topic for lawmakers and researchers around the world, and especially in the Washington area.

In recent years, researchers have linked some common chemicals to troubling changes in laboratory rodents and wild animals, including reproductive defects, immune-system alterations and obesity.

For now, no connections to human ailments have been proved. But some studies have provided hints that people might be affected by crossed hormones, and activists wonder if this kind of pollution could contribute to diabetes, birth defects and infertility.

"There's a lot of concern that a lot of chemicals to which we are exposed routinely, and without our knowledge, are interfering with the way hormones work," said R. Thomas Zoeller, a professor of biology at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

The Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments is planning to host a public forum about hormone-disrupting pollution this spring. U.S. Reps. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) have said they plan to press the

Environmental Protection Agency about its failure to develop a program to test chemicals for hormonelike effects, as ordered by Congress in 1996.

The idea that natural hormone messages can be tampered with is not new; for decades, women using birth-control pills have been counting on a man-made chemical to do just that.

But the current concern is much wider: Some fear that modern chemistry might have unwittingly created other compounds with hormonelike effects and that they might have spread widely around the globe.

In the past few years, scientists working with animals have found potential problems with several pollutants, among them rocket-fuel components, pesticides and additives to soap. Among the most heavily researched:

Â· Phthalates, a family of additives used to make vinyl plastic flexible and prevent perfume from evaporating, have been linked to lower sperm counts and other sexual problems in male rats, as well as to heightened allergic reactions in the animals. Chemical industry officials have said that these tests used unrealistically high doses and that the results are not likely to translate to humans.

Â· Bisphenol A, used as a building block for hard plastic goods like bottles and as a resin to line food cans, has been connected in some experiments to abnormal sexual development in male lab rodents, as well as a predilection for obesity. Officials from the chemical and pesticide industries have vigorously criticized these results, saying that other studies have shown the chemical to be harmless.

Â· Treated sewage, which carries human estrogen and birth-control pill components excreted in waste, has been linked to "feminized" male fish in waters around the world. In the St. Lawrence River in Canada, a recent study found that a third of male minnows had female characteristics. Another example might be the Potomac, though the cause of its problems has not been officially pinpointed. The EPA and sewage-plant officials have said they are working on ways to better clean the wastewater.

The study of endocrine disruptors began in the late 1980s and early 1990s, with scientists struggling to add up such oddities as male birds with female organs in the Great Lakes and sexual defects in Florida alligators.

They eventually found that some chemicals were turning on hormone switches in the body's endocrine system that trigger biological processes. Others blocked the switches so natural hormones couldn't get through.

That revelation meant that a pollutant could be harmful even if it wasn't poisonous and didn't cause cancer. Even small doses could cause major damage, if they came at a key time when hormones were guiding pregnancy or early development.

"We have to ask different questions," said John Peterson Myers, an activist and former scientist based in Charlottesville. He joined with scientist Theo Colborn and writer Dianne Dumanoski to write a book laying out their concerns, 1996's "Our Stolen Future."

Today, despite the wealth of studies in animals, the implications for human health are unclear. One of the most dramatic studies examined the sons of mothers whose bodies contained phthalates. It found no major birth defects but did show that the higher the phthalate level, the greater chance that the boys' bodies would show subtle signs of being "undermasculinized," according to researcher Shanna Swan, director of the Center for Reproductive Epidemiology at the University of Rochester.

Still, that falls well short of a smoking gun: Humans are not laboratory rats, so scientists say it is exceedingly hard to craft a study that shows a particular chemical caused a particular problem, and not genetics, diet or some other factor.

"They're nowhere near cause-and-effect," L. Earl Gray Jr., a senior research biologist at the EPA, said of human studies. "We're showing correlations and associations" between pollutants and human health effects, he said, but no indisputable sign that one causes the other.

Officials from the chemical and pesticide industries have vigorously defended their products, saying they see no reason for concern about products in the environment interfering with human hormones.

Some scientists have also pointed out that human diets have always included some estrogen-like compounds: They occur naturally in wine and soy-based products, for example.

Stephen H. Safe, a professor of veterinary physiology and pharmacology at Texas A&M University, said that overall, despite our poor diets, "what does the data say about our health in this country? We're living longer . . . You know, where are these endocrine threats?"

DOJ_NMG_0101540

Still, concerns that human health might be in danger have led to recent bans on certain phthalates in young children's toys imposed by the European Union and the City of San Francisco.

Activists in the United States have attacked the EPA for what they believe is a delayed response to the problem. The agency has defended itself by saying that it has spent millions on other research programs looking at ways to identify and limit endocrine disruptors and that it hopes to begin the long-delayed chemical testing program next year.

Some activists fear that damage is already being done. They caution avoiding plastic baby bottles, which could contain bisphenol A, and reducing consumption of animal fat, where some environmental pollutants can concentrate.

"I feel terrible because we haven't moved on this faster," said Colborn, the activist who has served as an unofficial leader among endocrine-disruptor researchers. "This is a transgenerational problem that is undermining the integrity of humans."

But Paul Foster, an official who evaluates risks to human reproduction at the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, said it was hard to give useful advice at this point because the chemicals being investigated are so ubiquitous.

"There's very little that they can do," said Foster, whose agency is part of the National Institutes of Health. "That's why you can't be too alarmist about it, because you can't stop people living."

Global Warming Gag Order (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

Washington has no shortage of bullies, but even we can't quite believe an October 27 letter that Senators Jay Rockefeller and Olympia Snowe sent to Exxon Mobil CEO Rex Tillerson. Its message: Start toeing the Senators' line on climate change, or else.

We reprint chunks of the letter here1 and the full text on OpinionJournal.com2, so readers can see for themselves. But its essential point is that the two Senators believe global warming is a fact, and therefore all debate about the issue must stop and Exxon Mobil should "end its dangerous support of the [global warming] 'deniers'." Not only that, the company "should repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history." And in extra penance for being "one of the world's largest carbon emitters," Exxon should spend that money on "global remediation efforts."

The Senators aren't dumb enough to risk an ethics inquiry by threatening specific consequences if Mr. Tillerson declines this offer he can't refuse. But in case the CEO doesn't understand his company's jeopardy, they add that "Exxon Mobil and its partners in denial have manufactured controversy, sown doubt, and impeded progress with strategies all-too reminiscent of those used by the tobacco industry for so many years." (Our emphasis.) The Senators also graciously copied the Exxon board on their missive.

This is amazing stuff. On the one hand, the Senators say that everyone agrees on the facts and consequences of climate change. But at the same time they are so afraid of debate that they want Exxon to stop financing a doughty band of dissenters who can barely get their name in the paper. We respect the folks at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, but we didn't know until reading the Rockefeller-Snowe letter that they ran U.S. climate policy and led the mainstream media around by the nose, too. Congratulations.

Let's compare the balance of forces: on one side, CEI; on the other, the Pew Charitable Trusts, the Sierra Club, Environmental Defense, the U.N. and EU, Hollywood, Al Gore, and every politically correct journalist in the country. We'll grant that's a fair intellectual fight. But if the Senators are so afraid that a handful of policy wonks at a single small think-tank are in danger of winning this debate, they must not have much confidence in the merits of their own case.

The letter is so over-the-top that we also wonder if Mr. Rockefeller in particular has even read it. (He and Ms. Snowe didn't return our call.) The Senator hails from coal-producing West Virginia, where people know something about carbon emissions. Come to think of it, Mr. Rockefeller owes his own vast wealth to something other then non-carbon energy. But perhaps it's easier to be carbon free when your fortune comes from a trust fund.

The letter is of a piece with what has become a campaign of intimidation against any global warming dissent. Not only is everyone supposed to concede that the planet has been warming -- as it has -- but we are all supposed to salute and agree that human beings are the definitive cause, that the magnitude of the warming will be disastrous and its effects catastrophic, that such problems as AIDS and poverty are less urgent, and that economic planners must therefore impose vast new regulatory burdens on everyone around the world. Exxon is being targeted in this letter and other ways because it is one of the few companies that still thinks some debate on these questions is valuable.

Every dogma has its day, and we've lived long enough to see more than one "consensus" blown apart within a few years of "everyone knowing" it was true. In recent decades environmentalists have been wrong about almost every other apocalyptic claim they've made: global famine, overpopulation, natural resource exhaustion, the evils of pesticides, global cooling, and so on. Perhaps it's useful to have a few folks outside the "consensus" asking questions before we commit several trillion dollars to any problem.

Imagine if this letter had been sent by someone in the Bush Administration trying to enforce the opposite conclusion? The left would be howling about "censorship." That's exactly what did happen earlier this year after James Hansen, the NASA scientist and global warming evangelist, complained that a lowly 24-year-old press aide had tried to limit his media access. The entire episode was preposterous because Mr. Hansen is one of the most publicized scientists in the world, but the press aide was nonetheless sacked.

The Senators' letter is far more serious because they have enormous power to punish Exxon if it doesn't kowtow to them. A windfall profits tax is in the air, and we've seen what happens to other companies that dare to resist Congressional intimidation. It's to Exxon's credit that, in its response to the Senators, the company said that it will continue to fund free market research groups because "there is value in the debate" that helps promote "optimal public policy decisions." Too bad that's not what the Senators care about.

The 'Obfuscation Agenda' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

The following are excerpts from an Oct. 27 letter to Rex W. Tillerson, chairman and CEO of Exxon Mobil, from Sens. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia and Olympia Snowe of Maine. A related editorial appears nearby:

We are convinced that Exxon Mobil's longstanding support of a small cadre of global climate change skeptics, and those skeptics' access to and influence on government policymakers, have made it increasingly difficult for the United States to demonstrate the moral clarity it needs across all facets of its diplomacy. Obviously, other factors complicate our foreign policy. However, we are persuaded that the climate change denial strategy carried out by and for Exxon Mobil has helped foster the perception that the United States is insensitive to a matter of great urgency for all of mankind, and has thus damaged the stature of our nation internationally…

We fervently hope that reports that Exxon Mobil intends to end its funding of the climate change denial campaign of the Competitive Enterprise Institute (CEI) are true. Similarly, we have seen press reports that your British subsidiary has told the Royal Society, Great Britain's foremost scientific academy, that Exxon Mobil will stop funding other organizations with similar purposes. However, a casual review of available literature, as performed by personnel for the Royal Society reveals that Exxon Mobil is or has been the primary funding source for the "skepticism" of not only CEI, but for dozens of other overlapping and interlocking front groups sharing the same obfuscation agenda…

Large corporations in related industries have joined Exxon Mobil to provide significant and consistent financial support of this pseudo-scientific, non-peer reviewed echo chamber. The goal has not been to prevail in the scientific debate, but to obscure it. This climate change denial confederacy has exerted an influence out of all proportion to its size or relative scientific credibility. Through relentless pressure on the media to present the issue "objectively," and by challenging the consensus on climate change science by misstating both the nature of what "consensus" means and what this particular consensus is, Exxon Mobil and its allies have confused the public and given cover to a few senior elected and appointed government officials whose positions and opinions enable them to damage U.S. credibility abroad…

A study to be released in November by an American scientific group will expose Exxon Mobil as the primary funder of no fewer than 29 climate change denial front groups in 2004 alone. Besides a shared goal, these groups often featured common staffs and board members. The study will estimate that Exxon Mobil has spent more than $19 million since the late 1990s on a strategy of "information laundering," or enabling a small number of professional skeptics working through scientific-sounding organizations to funnel their viewpoints through non-peer-reviewed websites such as Tech Central Station. The Internet has provided Exxon Mobil the means to wreak its havoc on U.S. credibility, while avoiding the rigors of refereed journals…

We would recommend that Exxon Mobil publicly acknowledge both the reality of climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it. Second, Exxon Mobil should repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history. Finally, we believe that there would be a benefit to the United States if one of the world's largest carbon emitters headquartered here devoted at least some of the money it has invested in climate change denial pseudo-science to global remediation efforts.

When Is A Fish Like A Carrot? (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

The answer is: When it is a farmed fish.

The Department of Agriculture routinely distinguishes between organic carrots and the regular kind when it decides whether to grant an "organic" label. But it has gotten into trouble recently over how to decide whether a fish — especially a fish like salmon — is organic or not. The fishing industry is eager to call wild salmon "organic," as a way of denoting quality to consumers.

But there's a problem. Carrots are either grown organically — without conventional pesticides — or they're not. A wild carrot, to most people, is barely a carrot, but the flower called Queen Anne's lace.

A wild salmon is a glorious thing, and every bit as delectable as its cousins raised in fish farms that are, or are not, organic. But to call a wild salmon organic is to demean it, since it comes from a place where the word has no meaning. That is a little like calling the ocean "natural." The trouble is, there is no U.S.D.A. "wild" label, nor should there be, for that would represent some final surrender to ourselves.

There are really two answers to what is, after all, a problem of terminology. The first is consumer education. There are few shoppers out there who know as much as they need to know about the fish they buy, how the fish are harvested or what effect industrial fishing is having on the oceans. The other answer is to continue to be strict and judicious with the U.S.D.A. "organic" label, and use it as a tool to help distinguish between fish farming that is done responsibly and fish farming that is not.

Too often, consumers assume that fish farms are inherently "organic," perhaps merely because they are aquatic. Nothing could be further from the truth. They can be as organic as the finest pasture-raised organic pig farm or as inorganic as a hog confinement operation. Let's use the word "organic" as a way to distinguish between them, all the while hoping that there remain wild salmon out in the oceans, beyond any of our categorizing.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Deadly Meth Marching Toward New England: DEA Battles Midwest Scourge Before It Hits (BOSH)

Boston Herald, December 1, 2006

The Hub is winning the war on crystal methamphetamine thanks to lessons learned from battles waged in the meth-gripped West and Midwest, a top federal drug official said yesterday, but she warned that the addictive drug is on a destructive march toward the East Coast.

"We've been fortunate in New England," June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, said on the first National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

"We were told methamphetamine abuse was spreading eastward. We learned from the West Coast and the Midwest. The main thing is to keep the key ingredients out of the hands of the people who manufacture meth," she said.

Last year, federal agents uncovered 16 clandestine meth labs in the six New England states, including five in the Bay State. This year, 17 labs have been found in New England, including three in Massachusetts, a DEA spokesman said.

Those numbers pale compared to lab discoveries in other parts of the country that face a more devastating struggle with meth addiction.

DOJ_NMG_0101543

The Combat Methamphetamine Act of 2005 has tremendously curbed the production of home-grown meth now that common cold medications containing the ingredients ephedrine, pseudoephedrine and phenylpropanolamine must be kept behind pharmacy counters, Stansbury said.

Those active ingredients are extracted from the cold medicines, combined with chemicals like iodine and anhydrous ammonia, and cooked over high heat to make meth. As of Sept. 30, consumers are now limited to buying no more than nine grams of cold remedies like Sudafed every 30 days, and must show picture identification and sign a log book when doing so.

"It's so important that people aren't able to go in and buy this in bulk," Stansbury said.

Conniving drug dealers have also been known to sell crystal meth to buyers while claiming that they are giving them cocaine or ecstasy in hopes of hooking them on another fix, Stansbury said."Greedy drug traffickers try to make a market," Stansbury said. "It's buyer beware. You never know what you are getting."

DEA Discusses Meth Problems At JALC (SO)

By Andrea Hahn

The Southern, December 2, 2006

CARTERVILLE - Just a couple of years ago, questions about methamphetamine were basic - what is it? where does it come from? What are the symptoms of use?

Roger Ehler, a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent, answered much more specific questions Thursday when he came to address a criminal justice class at John A. Logan College on Thursday. It was National Meth Awareness Day, and many of the students were already quite aware.

The types of questions reflected this more sophisticated knowledge of the drug. Students asked about long-term effects on the environment from meth lab dumps, about the potential for health problems created by meth labs inside rental or lodging properties, about new problems that could arise from the importing of a more pure form of the drug.

Meth has become enough of a household name that Saturday Night Live mocked "the meth lifestyle" during a recent episode. Ehler used the skit to demonstrate some of the problems associated with meth addiction.

"Obviously that was exaggerated - but then, it wasn't very exaggerated," he said.

The skit covered a host of meth-related symptoms and problems - days of sleeplessness, obsession with the drug, the rotting teeth associated with "meth mouth," the sores associated with "crank bugs" imagined to be crawling under the skin, household meth labs with questionable meth cooks, paranoia, hallucinations, compulsive behavior, extreme irritability and weight loss and risky sexual behavior.

The bit of comedy, Ehler said, was to take the edge off before showing a more serious film featuring meth addicts talking about the same elements from SNL but without the satire.

Ehler followed up by discussing current trends in meth use in Southern Illinois. The good news is small-batch meth labs are declining in the wake of legislation limiting the availability of pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient in meth production.

The bad news is imported meth, a more pure form known as ice or Mexican dope, is slowly on the rise.

Ehler said much is still unknown about meth use, even though law enforcement has been battling it for several years in this region. Consequently, he was unable to give definite answers to questions about relative availability of ice versus locally made "dirty meth," or whether the more pure, imported meth was more addictive or more likely to lead to drug overdoses.

He did have some encouraging new information, however. Education seems to be working - numbers of new users are declining, especially among younger people, he said.

And there is new hope for meth addict recovery. One of the most serious physical problems that results from long-term meth use is the inability of the brain to create dopamine, the chemical that makes a person feel pleasure. Not only is the need for longer rehabilitation to resist meth addiction now better understood, Ehler said there is also new evidence indicating the body's production of dopamine can be restored after one or two years of abstinence from meth.

"Even if you don't use the drug or don't know anyone who does, you can be impacted by meth," Ehler said. "We're looking at an epidemic."

The Meth Menace (NYDN)

By Austin Fenner And Tina Moore, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, December 3, 2006

Methamphetamine - once considered the drug of choice in the backwoods - is moving up in society.

Experts say methods for "cooking" the drug have become less noxious over the past decade, making meth labs a friendlier fit for apartment buildings like the one on Manhattan's East Side, where federal agents announced a bust last week.

"Back in the day, cooking meth was a very smelly process," said Steve Robertson, special agent and spokesman for the DEA. "That's why meth labs would go into rural areas. You would have them out in little shacks out on farms or ranches."

Agents from his agency announced Thursday - National Meth Awareness Day - that they had busted a clandestine meth lab at a high-rise on E. 39th St. They also announced nine other meth lab busts in the city and on Long Island.

The local meth labs highlight a change in the face of methamphetamine use - long a rural drug consumed most often by lower-income men and women.

"There's no question that there has been an increase of meth use in the city," said Dr. Petros Levounis, who runs the Addiction Institute of New York. "The transformation from Sudafed to meth is extremely, extremely easy."

The busts announced last week added another twist to the meth dilemma: Two of the men arrested, both professionals, were making the drug for personal consumption.

Meth labs - even rural mom and pop labs - are usually run to turn a profit.

Michael Knib, an information technology vice president for Citigroup, told agents he started producing the drug because he lost his sources when he moved to the city from Seattle, investigators said.

Mehmetcan Dosemeci, a 28-year-old doctoral student in history and Fullbright Scholar at Columbia University, told agents that he was making the drug in his Manhattan Ave. flat to stay awake. He researched cooking meth on the Internet.

The production of meth puts the people making the drug and those around them in danger. Meth labs - where vaporous chemicals are hard to detect - are known to explode.

"It's unsettling," said a neighbor in the Manhattan Ave. building where Dosemeci lived. He did not want to be named in this story. "He was taking a risk with other people's lives."

A retired 69-year-old clerk, who also did not want to provide his name, was dumbfounded.

"If it blows up, what is he going to say to the people who wind up in the morgue?" he said. "Who needs to stay awake for up to three days?"

The ease with which the drug can be made has prompted action in Washington.

A federal law that took effect in September bans over-the-counter sales of certain cold medicines with ingredients used to make meth, including pseudoephedrine and ephedrine.

The law requires buyers to show photo identification and allows them to purchase only a 30-day supply.

Robertson, who started out as a clandestine-lab investigator in the Southwest in the mid-1990s, said changes in the meth culture shifted into high-gear when recipes were posted on the Internet.

"Then all of a sudden it was there," he said. "People were cooking in the backs of cars, in hotel rooms and apartments. It was everywhere."

Authorities Braces For Meth Invasion (JI)

Journal Inquirer, December 1, 2006

Methamphetamine is known in drug circles as ice, crank, or speed, it smells like cat urine when it's being cooked, and makes chronic users' teeth fall out and blood pressure soar.

Despite that, the cheap street drug most commonly referred to as "meth" is popular and is continuing its creep towards Connecticut and the Northeast.

"Meth is a major, major problem" in other parts of the country, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor says.

But, "If we put our heads in the sand, and think it will never come here, we are terribly wrong," O'Connor said. "If we ignore it, it soon will become a major problem."

DOJ_NMG_0101545

O'Connor was joined by Gov. M. Jodi Rell, State's Attorney Kevin Kane, and officials from state and federal law enforcement and public health agencies on Thursday, the first annual National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

DEA officials say meth, which affects the central nervous system, has "a phenomenal rate of addiction, with some experts saying users often get hooked after just one use."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says 80 percent of meth is smuggled into this country from Mexico.

Meth isn't grown, like marijuana, poppy, or other organic substances, but manufactured. Federal authorities say the most common ingredient in meth is pseudoephedrine or ephedrine - ingredients found in common over-the-counter cold medicines.

To make meth - it can be smoked, snorted, injected, or taken orally - the legal drugs are cooked and processed using other common chemicals, such as lye, brake cleaner, alcohol, ether, battery acid, and battery lithium.

But the very existence of meth labs is worrisome, officials said Thursday, because chemicals used to make the drug are volatile.

Vapors produced during manufacturing permeate the walls and carpets of houses and buildings, making them uninhabitable, the DEA says, and one pound of meth can yield five pounds of toxic waste.

Because of the distinctive odor - "like a lot of cats," Department of Public Health Commissioner J. Robert Galvin said - meth labs are hard to hide. They are most often found in secluded, rural areas.

That may be one reason Connecticut has been largely spared from what many say is an epidemic in western and midwestern rural areas.

According to the DEA, in 2001, there were 1,480 meth lab "incidents" in Washington state, 1,883 in California, 806 in Oklahoma, 2,180 in Missouri, and 852 in Kansas, compared with one incident in Connecticut.

The western numbers have declined in recent years, as the public has become more aware of what to look for, authorities said Thursday.

However, the drug's march east has continued: While there were eight meth lab "incidents" in New York in 2001, there were 80 in that state last year.

And on Thursday, DEA officials announced the arrest of 10 people who they say operated meth labs in New York City and on Long Island.

The DEA's Assistant Special Agent in Charge in Connecticut, Brian R. Crowell, said authorities are currently investigating cases involving two meth labs.

There were arrests in three labs last year, including two in East Hampton.

In 2002, Enfield police had to close off the police station and surrounding streets for several hours when a local couple drove a packed-up meth lab - later found to belong to their daughter's boyfriend, who would serve a federal sentence - from their basement to police headquarters.

And Windsor Locks police in 2003 were alerted by local residents to a meth lab that was set up in a wooded area on land owned by a water company. A subsequent search of the man suspected of the setting up the lab yielded lye, sulfuric acid, and other chemicals used to make the drug.

Residents who notice suspicious activities, like those in Windsor Locks who notified police, are important to catching and stopping the manufacturing of meth, authorities said.

In one of the East Hampton cases, police were notified by a suspicious store clerk who reported young people were legally buying large amounts of a chemical.

Eastern states may be luckier than those out west because, after recognizing that over-the-counter drugs were being used, federal authorities this year enacted a law governing the sale of certain cold medicines used to make meth.

The law requires people to show identification before buying pseudoephedrine and ephedrine, and limits the amount that can be purchased to a 30-day supply. The buyer's name and information is also kept in a log for two years.

Stiff punishment for meth manufacturers and sellers is again on the legislative agenda, Rell said, and she intends to revive legislation calling for 15-year prison sentences for first-time offenders, and up to 30 years for second-offenders.

"We need to send that message that the sale and possession of this drug will land you in jail," she said.

Federal Agents Round Up Ten Suspects In Meth Ring (NY1)

By Lindley Pless

NY1, December 4, 2006

A drug factory in the next apartment. That's what federal agents say some New Yorkers were running unbeknownst to their neighbors. NY1's Lindley Pless visited one building where a tenant was allegedly cooking up a potentially explosive mixture.

Neighbors say they didn't have a clue. The DEA says here at a posh Murray Hill high-rise, Michael Knibb, a vice president with Citibank, had created an illicit methamphetamine drug lab in his penthouse apartment.

"I would never have suspected in New York City, particularly in a big building like this, with so many people coming in and out. I guess it happens. I am glad we didn't get blown up or a bad fire started or anything of that nature," said a building resident.

The DEA says Knibb was among ten people arrested for cooking up potentially explosive drugs in Manhattan and on Long Island. They allegedly used things like household cleaning products, kerosene, and even a lava lamp.

Agents say another arrest was made at the Potamkin Dealership on 11th Avenue, where two mechanics are also accused of setting up a lab.

"It's frightening that these labs are operating in a city with a population as dense as New York City," said DEA Special Agent in Charge John Gilbride. "These labs are highly volatile. They are highly explosive labs. They contain caustic chemicals that produce fumes that can explode at any time. These labs are ticking time bombs."

The DEA says seven of those time bombs were ticking here in the city: three in Manhattan, two in Queens, one in the Bronx, and one in Brooklyn.

Special Agent Gilbride says that methamphetamine has become the crack of the 21st century. He says it is a drug that is now affecting the lower, middle, and upper classes.

"Methamphetamine cuts across all sections of society," said Gilbride. "There is not one type of individual, one type of group that manufactures methamphetamine."

The DEA says the ten people arrested Thursday face charges of operating illegal drug labs. Agents say the toxic chemicals they used to make these drugs pose a threat to anyone living nearby.

"Individuals who operate clandestine labs are not only putting themselves in harm's way," said Gilbride. "They are putting their neighbors, their coworkers, their friends, anyone in their apartment who gets in contact with these chemicals. They are putting everyone in harm's way."

And the DEA says that could put them behind bars for up to 20 years.

Speakout: Colorado's Indian Reservations In Need Of More Policing, Judges (RMN)

By Troy A. Eid

Rocky Mountain News, December 2, 2006

TOWAOC - At first glance, this picturesque village, nestled beneath Sleeping Ute Mountain near the Four Corners monument and a short drive from Mesa Verde National Park, might seem an unlikely candidate to be the murder capital of Colorado.

Just over 2,000 tribal members live on the entire Ute Mountain Ute Indian Reservation south of Cortez, many in or near Towaoc (pronounced toy- ACK), seat of the tribal government. Yet this year alone, there have been a staggering five murders and one unexplained death on that reservation.

Immediately to the east, the Southern Ute Indian Reservation south of Durango is home to about 1,400 tribal members. Two victims have been murdered there so far this year, including an infant thrown against a wall. The recent death of a third person is still being investigated.

Taken together, the murder rate for Colorado's two Indian nations is 20 times higher than the state average. It rivals the number of murders in Colorado Springs, the state's second-largest city with a population of 360,890.

What accounts for this appalling rate of violent crime in southwestern Colorado?

DOJ_NMG_0101547

Both tribes would benefit from more boots-on-the-ground law enforcement. This is especially true on the Ute Mountain Ute Reservation, which lacks its own tribal police force. Just five police officers from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, part of the U.S. Department of the Interior, patrol the entire 600,000-acre reservation.

Some tribes, such as Southern Ute, have created their own professional police departments and court systems. For more than two decades, however, the Ute Mountain Ute Tribe has chosen not to have its own tribal law enforcement officers and judges and instead relies entirely on the BIA.

Unfortunately for the Ute Mountain Ute Tribe, BIA's tribal court system has operated only sporadically for the past few years.

Federal law ordinarily governs felonies committed on Indian reservations. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has the lead role for handling most felony investigations on Colorado's two Indian reservations. The lone FBI agent assigned to southwestern Colorado does a superb job under extraordinarily trying circumstances. So do the two assistant U.S. attorneys in Durango who prosecute major crimes on the reservations - functioning like deputy district attorneys do elsewhere in Colorado.

These and other federal officials attempting to serve justice on Colorado's two Indian reservations face many challenges.

Yet no obstacle to the equitable and effective administration of justice is more difficult than this: There is not a single permanent federal trial court judge anywhere in western Colorado, or anywhere outside of Denver.

Restricting federal trial judges to the state capital is remarkable even for a large Western state. Even far less populous states such as Wyoming, Idaho and Montana have long provided courthouses with permanent trial judges in more than one geographic region.

In contrast, the nearest permanent federal court to our fellow citizens who happen to live in southwestern Colorado is up to nine hours away by car, in downtown Denver. Perhaps nowhere else in the entire United States south of Alaska must people travel so far to serve on, or be served by, a federal trial jury or grand jury.

Alone part-time federal magistrate in Durango provides invaluable support to the criminal justice system. But in nearly every case, witnesses to violent crimes and their alleged perpetrators must still travel repeatedly to Denver. So do federal agents and prosecutors who, in the ultimate irony, are often tethered to the federal courthouse in Denver when violent crimes are occurring in southwestern Colorado.

Yet another challenge involves the rising use and trafficking of methamphetamine on Ute Mountain Ute and Southern Ute reservations. Gangs based off-reservation sometimes offer free samples of crystal meth - or "ice," as it is known - specifically targeting Native American people. As users get hooked, they turn to dealing and other crimes on-reservation to sustain their addiction.

Difficult though these challenges are, there are promising signs of change after so many years of neglect. U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar met recently with Alberto Gonzales, attorney general of the United States, to discuss strengthening federal law enforcement and judicial resources for southwestern Colorado. Leaders from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Attorney's Office, and other federal agencies are working more closely than ever before with the elected leaders of the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute tribes and their representatives.

For those of us serving in federal law enforcement, this is a case where the proof of our good intentions must be measured by real results. Too many lives have already been lost in the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute nations. This is a state and national disgrace, and it must end. To cynics who say it will take too long to turn this tragedy around, our answer must be: Let's get started.

Drug Importers Sentenced (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 2, 2006

Couple recruited African to swallow heroin pills

The man from Ghana refused to reveal the contents of his stomach until he reached the hospital. There, faced with the prospect of an X-ray, he started to tell Maryland immigration authorities his death-defying tale.

DOJ_NMG_0101548

An emigre in the United States recruited Hopkins Appau back in Africa to swallow dozens of pellets filled with heroin. He boarded a plane, arrived in Baltimore and greeted his American bosses from his motherland -- a longtime Washington municipal employee and his immigrant wife living in a suburban townhouse.

A U.S. District Court judge in Baltimore sentenced the couple, Godfrey Bonsu, 44, and his wife, Victoria Boateng, 42, both of Bowie, to lengthy prison terms yesterday for running a drug courier business out of a Takoma Park Quality Inn.

They were found guilty in February by a federal jury of conspiracy to import and distribute heroin. Yesterday, Bonsu received a 14-year prison term while Boateng was ordered to prison for slightly more than 11 years.

"I'm really sorry. ... I let my children down," Bonsu told the judge. "I had a good job."

U.S. District Judge Catherine C. Blake increased both of their prison terms after finding that they were supervisors or managers of the drug conspiracy.

"The couriers testified to being given various instructions by the defendants, such as drinking milk, waiting at the hotel and calling the defendants when the pellets were ready," Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Hanlon wrote in court papers.

In the Maryland case investigated by U. S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, prosecutors argued that in 2003 and 2004, Bonsu and Boateng recruited couriers from Ghana to smuggle heroin from Ghana, Germany and the United Kingdom.

Appau, who was arrested in December 2004, carried almost 600 grams of heroin, or about 60 internal pellets.

His fellow courier, James Manu, arrested in September of that year, filled his stomach with 69 pellets and lined his clothing with an additional 3 kilograms of heroin. Yesterday, the judge also determined that Bonsu had obstructed justice by testifying falsely at a pretrial suppression hearing, leading to another enhancement of his sentence.

Bonsu "was employed, he contributed to society," Blake said at the hearing. But despite some undisclosed information the couple provided to authorities about the drug trade, she could not excuse their role as leaders.

Law enforcement agents use a variety of techniques to catch such drug couriers.

"Sometimes we have intelligence provided by an informant or you see that something is wrong with a person," Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Steve Robertson said in an interview shortly after the Bonsu-Boateng convictions in February.

Agents usually try to wait the courier out, taking suspects into a bathroom with a screen to catch excrement. The pellets don't throw up very well, according to Robertson.

"But it's incredibly dangerous. Stomach acids can burn a hole in them. But sometimes people will swallow them and tie them to a back molar and then they pull it back up through their throat," said the agent, who spent 17 years in drug interdiction work on the Southwest border.

Pittston Twp. Cop Arrested On Drug Trafficking Charges (CV)

Citizens Voice, December 2, 2006

PITTSTON TWP. — A part-time township police officer who also worked in other communities was arrested Friday on federal drug trafficking and illegal handgun possession charges.

Patrolman Charles M. Byra Jr., 28, a township resident, was charged with possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to sell and with carrying a stolen gun, which he allegedly used while drug trafficking, according to the criminal complaint.

If convicted, Byra could face from five years to life in prison and close to $2 million in fines.

The arrest follows an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the state police that spanned most of this year. Even after Byra was in custody, investigators searched the township police office for more evidence.

“They took everything pertaining to him — log sheets, time sheets, evidence pertaining to his cases,” said Chief Stephen Rinaldi.

The chief said Byra had worked for his department since February 2005.

“He was a good cop. It’s very disappointing to me. Any time you asked him to do something, he’d do it,” Rinaldi said.

Byra also has worked as a part-time officer in Avoca, Dupont and worked for about a month in Duryea in 2005. Part-time officers are hired on a month-to-month basis in the communities.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Houser said Friday it was against policy to comment on charges against a defendant.

Byra was taken to federal court in Scranton to hear the charges against him on Friday afternoon. U.S. Magistrate Judge Malachy E. Mannion order him detained until a detention hearing in federal court in Wilkes-Barre on Wednesday at 10:30 a.m.

The hearing will determine whether he should remain incarcerated or be released on bail.

His preliminary examination hearing is set for Dec. 13 at 3:30 p.m. in federal court in Scranton to determine if there is sufficient evidence to send the charges to trial.

Officer Faces Charges (PAPN)

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), December 3, 2006

LUZERNE COUNTY

PITTSTON TWP.

A Pittston Twp. police officer has been charged in federal court with felony drug and weapons offenses after an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. Federal officials said Michael Byra Jr., 28, could face a sentence of up to life in prison and fines up to $2 million if convicted of all offenses lodged against him.

Byra was charged in U.S. District Court in Scranton on Friday with possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, possession with intent to distribute marijuana, possession of a firearm during a felony drug trafficking transaction and possession of a stolen firearm.

Byra was being held by federal authorities at an undisclosed location.

Source: Cop Took Evidence In Drug Cases (TLPA)

Times Leader, December 2, 2006

SCRANTON – Pittston Township police officer Charles Michael Byra Jr. recently testified that he's made at least 60 drug busts, arresting out-of-town drug dealers who make a habit of staying at a specific township motel on weekends.

On Friday, Byra, 28, found himself as a defendant facing the same charges.

A source close to the investigation said Byra was arrested on suspicion he stole evidence connected to mainly drug cases when he worked as a part-time officer in Dupont earlier this year.

Dupont Mayor Daniel Lello said Byra was employed as a part-time officer in Dupont but hasn't worked since the evidence – heroin, cocaine, marijuana, guns, about $10,000 in cash from drug busts, numerous files, and a log book – was reported missing earlier this year.

"After the incident happened, I didn't put him on anymore," Lello said.

Byra was arrested by state police at Wyoming and turned over to federal agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Friday morning.

He appeared nervous often conversing with his lawyer, Ingrid Cronin, when he appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Malachy Mannion in federal court in Scranton Friday afternoon.

Byra was charged with two counts of possession with intent to distribute marijuana, and one count each of possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, carrying a firearm during a drug transaction and possession of a stolen firearm, a Highpoint .380-caliber pistol, according to the federal criminal complaint.

U.S. Assistant Attorney William Houser declined to comment about the allegations against Byra. Mannion approved a request by Houser to seal the affidavit of probable cause, which is a narrative description of what police say happened.

During Friday's brief hearing in federal court, Houser said there are numerous recordings that implicate Byra.

Cronin refused to comment.

Byra was ordered to be held by federal authorities until Wednesday when a detention hearing is tentatively scheduled for 10:30 a.m. Wednesday at the federal courthouse in Scranton. A preliminary examination, commonly known as a preliminary hearing, is tentatively set for Dec. 13 at the federal courthouse in Scranton.

Throughout the morning and into the early afternoon, state and federal authorities removed boxes of evidence and several filing cabinets from the Pittston Township Police Department.

Township police Chief Stephen Rinaldi said he couldn't comment. Rinaldi did say Byra was employed as a township officer for nearly two years.

Township Supervisor Anthony Attardo said a decision will be made whether to suspend or terminate Byra from the police department. Attardo said whatever action is taken, Byra is entitled to a hearing before the supervisors.

According to Times Leader archives, Byra previously worked as a police officer in Ashley, Avoca, Sugar Notch and Warrior Run.

Lack Of Cooperation Hinders Baseball's Steroid Inquiry (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

George J. Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader who is leading an investigation into steroid use in baseball, said in a statement yesterday that some parties he would not name had not cooperated with investigators. Because of that lack of cooperation, Mitchell said, it will take longer to complete the investigation.

"My investigative staff has conducted hundreds of interviews and received thousands of documents; however, much more work will be necessary," he said. "Cooperation has been good from many of those with whom we have sought testimony and documents, but has been less good from some others."

Since Mitchell does not have the power to force anyone connected with possible steroid use to testify, he has been stalled in pursuing some information. Several team officials have given testimony, but no players have acknowledged speaking with Mitchell. Mitchell has repeatedly declined to offer a timetable for when the investigation might be finished.

"This will not affect the result of the investigation, but it has increased the length of time it will take to complete the investigation," said Mitchell, who gave the statement after inquiries from reporters.

"It is for that reason I will continue the policy of not attempting to predict when the investigation will conclude, other than to say that we are pressing forward and will conclude our work as soon as possible," he said. "It's important to finish this job as soon as possible, but it's even more important to do it right."

When Commissioner Bud Selig appointed Mitchell as the investigator more than eight months ago, it was believed that he was targeting Barry Bonds, something Selig has denied. Bonds has 734 career home runs, 21 short of Hank Aaron's career record. Mitchell has not revealed whether he has interviewed Bonds, but it seemed unlikely. Bonds said last season that he had not spoken to any investigators.

"When I accepted this assignment, I said that I intended to conduct an investigation that is objective, thorough and fair," Mitchell said. "That remains my intention."

MLB's Steroids Probe Delayed By Lack Of Power No Timetable For Probe's Conclusion, Mitchell Says (AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

NEW YORK - Former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell said his probe into steroid use in baseball has been delayed because he lacks power to order testimony.

Mitchell was hired by commissioner Bud Selig last March following more than a year of allegations against Barry Bonds, Mark McGwire and other stars. No timetable was set for Mitchell's report.

"When I began, I was, of course, aware that I do not have the power to compel testimony or the production of documents," Mitchell said in a statement Friday. "From the outset I believed that the absence of such power would significantly increase the amount of time necessary to complete the investigation, and it has."

A Third Way On Drug Laws (WP)

By Kevin A. Sabet

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Some say that the state of Michoacan, deep in south Mexico, is where the "war on drugs" really started, back in 1985. It was there that Mexican drug lords upped the stakes by burying in a shallow grave the body of a young Drug Enforcement Administration agent, Enrique Camarena, whom they had kidnapped and killed. The U.S. Congress responded months later with strict anti-drug laws, including a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison for anyone trafficking in five grams of crack cocaine or 500 grams of powder cocaine.

At that time, crack was certainly producing more violence on the streets than powder cocaine, and beat cops were expressing frustration at this ever-increasing drug market. Undoubtedly it was a time to enact "tough" legislation. But today, more than 20 years later, drug-related killings remain commonplace in that region of Mexico. Six police officers were found dead there one day last month. And though crack cocaine use has decreased dramatically since the mid-1980s, the debate over what to do about our drug problem rages on.

On the same day as the recent police killings in Mexico, the U.S. Sentencing Commission -- an independent judicial body that advises Congress on sentencing laws -- held hearings on the effectiveness of the federal cocaine law. Should five grams of crack cocaine continue to trigger the same sentence as 500 grams of powder cocaine? The answer is clearly no.

The Sentencing Commission has written that there is a "widely held perception that the current penalty structure . . . promotes unwarranted disparity based on race." The evidence that trafficking laws disproportionately affect blacks is hard to quantify, since there is little national demographic data on traffickers. Still, this law undoubtedly helps funnel young black men (a mind-boggling 85 percent of federal defendants in crack cocaine cases are black) into prison at rates that should cause us concern.

Most of these people are street-level dealers rather than high-level traffickers. Theoretically, a mid-to-high-level dealer caught with 499 grams of cocaine could get a lighter sentence than any one of the scores of much lower-level crack dealers he supplied the drug to (crack is a simple combination of powder cocaine and baking soda). Perhaps most troubling, the law has caused many Americans to lose faith in the criminal justice system even as it has increased racial division.

If current laws are unjustified, what are the alternatives? Many drug policy activists will tell you that "our laws don't work" and then quickly conclude that legalization is the most sensible solution. But there's no evidence that works either. If addiction, sickness and community decay are concerns, then it must be said that drug legalization has failed as a social experiment -- witness the massive problems of legalized drugs in other places (remember Switzerland's Needle Park?) or legalized tobacco today (where commercialization fuels addiction and high profits).

But of course no serious drug policy analyst can look you in the eye and tell you that our only alternatives are strict prohibition or lax legalization. There is, in fact, a comfortable position closer to the middle: We can reform the worst parts of our laws without fearing massive increases in drug use. Erasing or dramatically closing the gap between the sentences for crack cocaine and powder cocaine is a good example of this.

The commission last argued for a 20-to-1 sentencing ratio (as opposed to the present 100-to-1) as a politically sensitive solution, and some members of Congress have argued for wiping out the distinction altogether. Just about anything would be better than current policy.

It sounds easier than it is, of course, but the current political climate may be just right. President Bush, two days before his first inauguration, expressed a desire for a change, telling CNN that the law "ought to be addressed by making sure the powder cocaine and the crack cocaine penalties are the same," because he didn't "believe we ought to be discriminatory." With the president now saying he is ready to work with the newly elected Democratic leadership, reform could be within reach.

Such a move would be more about making our drug policies "smart," and less about looking "tough." And it certainly would be about time.

Editorial | Internet Drug Trafficking (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 2, 2006

Almost anyone with an e-mail address has received those annoying spam messages offering prescription drugs without a prescription. Most folks simply hit "delete" and think no more of it.

But as Inquirer reporter John Shiffman recently chronicled in a page-turner of an investigative series, illegal Internet drug trafficking is a lucrative, dangerous business. Stopping these illicit cyber drug rings requires dedicated, technologically savvy law enforcement agents and a high level of cooperation among federal, state and local authorities.

Fortunately, that's exactly what happened in Operation Cyber Chase, an investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration. The Inquirer's "Drugnet" series (http://go.philly.com/drugnet) provided a behind-the-scenes look at how authorities captured Akhil Bansal.

The grad student living in Roxborough had an online operation that illegally sold about 2.5 million doses per month of controlled substances to more than 100,000 customers. Bansal supplied eight drug organizations operating more than 200 Web sites with painkillers, steroids and other controlled substances smuggled from India, where his father was a physician. In all, 25 co-conspirators were arrested.

These drug networks involve much more than people trying to make a fast buck. They harm their customers, including many teens, who become addicted to pills. They are responsible for overdose deaths. Some drugs are counterfeit; some haven't been stored properly. They come without instructions; they come without any consultation with a licensed physician.

A 2003 study by Monitoring the Future (funded in part by the National Institutes of Health) found that abuse among 12th graders of Vicodin, a narcotic pain-reliever, was second only to marijuana. Parents previously worried about their children encountering drug pushers on street corners; the Internet allows far more sophisticated pushers direct access to their homes.

Tougher, updated laws could help slow the flow of illegal controlled substances. Federal law enforcement authorities work under the auspices of the 1970s-era Controlled Substances Act, enacted long before the Internet came into use.

Some states are catching on to the public health threat. Kentucky enacted an Internet pharmacy law in 2005 that requires anyone shipping controlled substances into the state to register with the Attorney General's Office. Pennsylvania does not have such a law; New Jersey introduced a bill this year, but it stalled in the General Assembly.

Many of the Web sites selling these drugs operate overseas. To shut them down requires international cooperation, which can be slow and complicated.

U.S. drug wholesalers need to step up their efforts, too. These companies are privy to unusual sales patterns; for example, when a small pharmacy starts ordering much larger amounts of narcotics than it had in the past. Not all wholesalers are living up to their legal obligation to report suspicious activity.

State medical boards should speak out against online doctor-patient "relationships." The Federation of State Medical Boards has said that a patient filling out an online questionnaire to be reviewed by a cyber doctor "does not constitute an acceptable standard of care."

Also, the public's attitude about pills needs to change. Street drugs such as heroin are understood to be harmful and illegal because the user injects a needle into his or her arm. Narcotics in pill form are just as dangerous, just as addictive, and these days are much easier to obtain.

Afghanistan Opium Crop Sets Record (WP)

By Karen Deyoung, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

U.S.-Backed Efforts At Eradication Fail

Opium production in Afghanistan, which provides more than 90 percent of the world's heroin, broke all records in 2006, reaching a historic high despite ongoing U.S.-sponsored eradication efforts, the Bush administration reported yesterday.

In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the amount of land under cultivation in opium poppies grew by 61 percent. Cultivation in the two main production provinces, Helmand in the southwest and Oruzgan in central Afghanistan, was up by 132 percent.

White House drug policy chief John Walters called the news "disappointing."

The administration has cited resurgent Taliban forces as the main impediment to stabilization and reconstruction efforts in Afghanistan, and the U.S. military investment has far exceeded anti-narcotic and development programs. But U.S. military and intelligence officials have increasingly described the drug trade as a problem that rivals and in some ways exceeds the Taliban, threatening to derail other aspects of U.S. policy.

"It is truly the Achilles' heel of Afghanistan," Gen. James L. Jones, the supreme allied commander for NATO, said in a recent speech at the Council on Foreign Relations. Afghanistan is NATO's biggest operation, with more than 30,000 troops. Drug cartels with their own armies engage in regular combat with NATO forces deployed in Afghanistan, he said. "It would be wrong to say that this is just the Taliban. I think I need to set that record straight," he added.

"They have their own capability to inflict damage, to make sure that the roads and the passages stay open and they get to where they want to go, whether it's through Pakistan, Iran, up through Russia and all the known trade routes. So this is a very violent cartel," Jones said. "They are buying their protection by funding other organizations, from criminal gangs to tribes, to inciting any kind of resistance to keep the government off of their back."

Any disruption of the drug trade has enormous implications for Afghanistan's economic and political stability. Although its relative strength in the overall economy has diminished as other sectors have expanded in recent years, narcotics is a $2.6 billion-a-year industry that this year provided more than a third of the country's gross domestic product. Farmers who cultivate opium poppies receive only a small percentage of the profits, but U.S. officials estimate the crop provides up to 12 times as much income per acre as conventional farming, and there is violent local resistance to eradication.

"It's almost the devil's own problem," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told Congress last month. "Right now the issue is stability. . . . Going in there in itself and attacking the drug trade actually feeds the instability that you want to overcome."

"Attacking the problem directly in terms of the drug trade . . . would undermine the attempt to gain popular support in the region," agreed Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency. "There's a real conflict, I think."

The Afghan government has prohibited the aerial herbicide spraying used by U.S. anti-narcotic programs in Latin America. Instead, opium poppy plants in Afghanistan are destroyed by tractors dragging heavy bars. But only 38,500 of nearly 430,000 acres under cultivation were eradicated this year.

Because of security concerns and local sensibilities, all eradication is done by Afghan police, and corruption is a major problem at every level from cultivation to international trafficking. Although the drug trade is believed to provide some financing to the Taliban, most experts believe it is largely an organized criminal enterprise. According to a major report on the Afghan drug industry jointly released last week by the World Bank and the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, key narcotics traffickers "work closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

The report drew specific attention to the Afghan Interior Ministry, saying its officials were increasingly involved in providing protection for and facilitating consolidation of the drug industry in the hands of leading traffickers. "At the lower levels," the report said, "payments to police to avoid eradication or arrest reportedly are very widespread. At higher levels, provincial and district police chief appointments appear to be a tool for key traffickers and sponsors to exercise control and favor their proteges at middle levels in the drug industry."

Opium cultivation was outlawed during Taliban rule in the late 1990s and was nearly eliminated by 2001. After the overthrow of the Taliban government by U.S. forces in the fall of that year, the Bush administration said that keeping a lid on production was among its highest priorities. But corruption and alliances formed by Washington and the Afghan government with anti-Taliban tribal chieftains, some of whom are believed to be deeply involved in the trade, undercut the effort.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai recently noted that "once we thought terrorism was Afghanistan's biggest enemy" but said that now "poppy, its cultivation and drugs are Afghanistan's major enemy."

Eradication and alternative development programs have made little discernible headway. Cultivation -- measured annually with high-resolution satellite imagery that is then parsed by analysts using specialized computer software -- is nearly double its highest pre-Karzai level.

"There is supposed to be a tremendous energy associated with this," Jones said of the counter-narcotics programs, "but it needs a fresh look because . . . we're losing ground.

Afghan Opium Breaks All Records, U.S. Says (WT/UPI)

IMMIGRATION:

Congress Open To Passing Bill On Immigration (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

Congress will approve an immigration bill that will grant citizenship rights to most of the 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the U.S. after Democrats take control next month, predict both sides on Capitol Hill.

While Republicans have been largely splintered on the issue of immigration reform, Democrats have been fairly unified behind the principle that the illegals currently in the country should get citizenship rights without having to first leave the country.

"Years of dawdling have worsened our border security and made it harder to fix this broken system," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will lead the Judiciary Committee next year. "We should not let partisan politics and intolerance continue to delay and derail effective reform."

Democrats in both chambers say they will start with some form of legislation first drafted by Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, which was the basis for the bill that was approved earlier this year by the Senate.

"This past May, the Senate Judiciary Committee reported and then the Senate passed bipartisan versions of comprehensive immigration reform to bring people out of the shadows while strengthening our borders," Mr. Leahy said. "I look forward to building on that work next year and making progress on a bipartisan effort that improves security, supports our economy and respects the dignity of all people."

House Republicans and many outside Congress derided that bill as "amnesty" for allowing illegals to remain in the U.S. and eventually become citizens. Democrats say it's not amnesty because aliens must pay a fine and wait years before becoming citizens.

"The Senate bill is pure amnesty," said Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican. "Dress it up any way you want, it's still amnesty. It lets people pay their way out of sneaking into the country illegally."

With President Bush as an ally in the White House, he worries, Democrats will proceed next year with legislation to ultimately make citizens out of most of the illegals now in the country. And Republicans, still reeling from deep losses in the November elections, will give up the fight.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, said he expects an immigration-reform bill that doesn't deport illegal aliens to be the only significant legislation to come out of the new Democratic Congress and win Mr. Bush's approval.

"The only real legislation that can be expected from Congress is amnesty," he said. "If they come up with a plan and the president is behind it, it will pick up a lot of our own members."

Republicans also expressed little confidence that their leadership team is committed to blocking amnesty.

The group Americans for Better Immigration, which supports tougher immigration policies, has given Republican leaders mixed grades on the issue. But on the issue of amnesty, the grades have been much worse.

DOJ_NMG_0101555

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, has a "D"; Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the House Republican whip, scores a "C+." Incoming House Republican Conference Chairman Adam H. Putnam of Florida, who has co-sponsored legislation that many view as amnesty, scores an "F-" from the group on the issue.

Still, Mr. Boehner and Mr. Blunt can claim credit for thwarting the Senate immigration bill earlier this year. But now the only hope, Republicans say, is that some of the conservative Democrats who beat Republican incumbents this year will side with conservatives in the House to block anything that smells like amnesty.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican and a leading critic of amnesty, was initially dejected by November's elections, fearing that Democrats would ram through immigration reform. But a recent congressional trip with conservative-leaning "Blue Dog" Democrats changed his mind.

They don't want to touch the issue, he said, after seeing fissures already develop among Democrats' base voters on the issue. Illegal-alien advocacy groups think the Senate bill is too harsh on illegal aliens because it imposes fines on all and excludes others with criminal records. Those groups also insist future workers have a direct path to citizenship -- a requirement that labor unions fiercely oppose.

"I think it's going to be much more difficult for them to do than I had thought the day after the election," Mr. Tancredo said.

Most likely, he said, Democrats will succeed at undoing plans to build 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"The thing that's in the greatest jeopardy right now is the fence, because they do have the appropriations process and that's probably the one they can stop," Mr. Tancredo said.

TAX:

Senator-Elect From The Farm Makes Small Firms A Priority (USNEWS)

By Renuka Rayasam

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

Jon Tester got into Montana politics about eight years ago because he thought that the state's 1997 energy deregulation policies were unfair to small companies. Last year, as Montana Senate president, he won enactment of legislation offering tax credits to make health insurance more affordable to companies with two to nine employees. Even after taking time off from campaigning to harvest grain for his organic farm, the fiscally conservative Democrat still narrowly beat out Republican incumbent Conrad Burns in last month's U.S. Senate race. Tester will be a member of the Senate Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship.

Tell me about the farm you run with your wife, Sharla, 12 miles west of Big Sandy, Mont.

The farm we run [growing lentils, barley, peas, and gluten-free grain] as a business adds value through organics. We also shut down a custom butcher shop that processed animals for the neighbors. Both things came handed to me generationally. My grandparents started the farm we operate in 1916. My dad and mom set up the custom butcher shop in the 1960s.

How has being a farmer and business owner shaped your view of small-business issues?

If you look at what has built this country, it has been small business and working families. They are critical to the economic success of the country. We're a mom and pop operation. Some of the things we experience are regulations set up more from a big-business standpoint. Small business is taxed with potential accounting measures set up for Enron and things like that.

What are some of the issues important to small business?

You have to make sure you're not putting undue burden on small business from a tax and regulation standpoint.

Does that burden include the Internal Revenue Service crackdown on small companies in order to close the tax gap?

If there's some tax fraud, it needs to be cracked down on. But tax problems don't come from the small-business community. They come from businesses locating offshore and things like that.

You are a former school board chairman. How do you think education relates to small business?

A well-trained workforce is critical to small-business success. What I hear from business is that it's hard to find help that meets their needs. Right now we're breaking ground on a technical college in Great Falls to facilitate a better workforce. You've got to have a good public education system so small-business owners, when they locate to an area, are confident their kids are getting the best education possible. I feel strongly about local control in school districts. Things like [the] No Child Left Behind [Act] take away local control, but a local school board knows best what a district needs.

How will the healthcare debate affect small-business owners?

Healthcare is very much a high priority for me. Healthcare is also a huge issue for business, both big and small. But that's an issue that hasn't been addressed at all yet from a small-business standpoint.

It looks as if the federal minimum wage will climb next year. What effect will that have on small companies?

I don't think that's going to impact small business in the least. It's so minimal you can't get good people at that wage level. If you are going to have someone stay with you any length of time, you are going to have to pay them more.

What advice do you have for other small-business owners?

You've got to be smart and deliver the kind of service and commodity that the customer wants. You have to be smart financially, and you can't overextend yourself. Make sure you have a sharp pencil.

More Disorder In The Court? (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

Just days before last month's elections, a conservative weekly's website suggested that a member of the U.S. Supreme Court was gravely ill and that friends had been asked to pray for 86-year-old Justice John Paul Stevens.

Such rumors are normally "too ghoulish to repeat publicly," wrote Sean Rushton on HumanEvents.com. But with control of the Senate at stake, it is "news that should be considered," he said, even if it's unfounded.

That get-out-the-vote effort stuck out even in a campaign full of cynical appeals. Today, nearly a month after Democrats won both houses of Congress, the Stevens scuttlebutt remains uncorroborated–the senior justice has participated fully in recent arguments, as has Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, 73, who's also been the subject of rumors of poor health. But the effort by Rushton, former director of a conservative group devoted to winning approval of White House judicial nominations, underscored the right wing's investment in the issue of high court nominees. With newly powerful Democrats like New York Sen. Charles Schumer of the Judiciary Committee vowing an end to "the days of hard-right judges," the nominee game has become far more complicated.

Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the Democrat who will chair the Judiciary Committee, said he is willing to work with Bush but noted that "the power to avoid destructive political warfare over a vacancy on the Supreme Court lies with the president." So what does that mean for future nominations? The new dynamic has unleashed speculation over whom President Bush may consider if he gets another opportunity to nominate a Supreme Court justice–it would be his third–during his remaining two years. And it has reinvigorated strategy sessions on all sides to assess the many "what if's."

Would the lame-duck president instigate a potentially unwinnable war with Senate Democrats by putting up a conservative in the mold of Samuel Alito, described recently by a GOP activist as "one of the most conservative federal appeals court judges ever confirmed"? Or would he work with Democrats to build consensus around a moderate conservative with a shot at winning a Senate confirmation vote? And would the president try to make history with a Hispanic nominee–or make up for his failed effort to get White House Counsel Harriet Miers on the bench and pick a woman?

"Obviously, everything changed when the majority changed," says Mark Agrast of the liberal Center for American Progress. "The issue of filibuster, which colored the whole discussion previously, is off the table, and nominees now will go through the regular order: from Judiciary Committee, to the Senate floor, and to a vote." And both sides are eager to test the waters.

The View From the Right

Leonard Leo of the conservative Federalist Society is already urging Bush to stick with his strategy of picking nominees that please the right, even without a GOP Senate majority. "No matter who he nominates, it's going to be a firefight," said Leo, a behind-the-scenes player in the administration's judicial nomination strategy. "What's the worst that happens? The cost of not doing the right thing is greater than a nominee going down in flames." He and others on the right believe that if the president has the opportunity, he'll nominate a woman. And the top name on their list is Edith Hollan Jones of Texas. Appointed in 1985 to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Houston by President Reagan, Jones, 57, is now a chief judge and has been on the Supreme Court shortlist since the president's father was in office.

Lawmakers Wrapping Up Session But Leaving Loose Ends (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

New York Times, December 3, 2006

Republicans intend to conclude the 109th Congress this week and leave Democrats stuck with the tab in the form of unfinished spending bills as the days of Republican rule draw to a close on Capitol Hill.

Congressional leaders said election losses had sapped Republican enthusiasm for trying to finish nine spending measures that were due Oct. 1. Congress will instead pass a stopgap measure to keep the government running until mid-February, leaving the fiscal tangle for the new Democratic majority to sort out next year.

Republicans will, however, try to record some final accomplishments as they intend to adjourn by Friday. They would like to extend a number of popular tax breaks rather than see Democrats get credit for restoring them next year. House Republicans also plan to try to push through an expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling opportunities and will take a symbolic anti-abortion vote before Democrats, many of whom support abortion rights, take control in January.

On Tuesday, the Senate Armed Services Committee will convene a hearing on the nomination of Robert M. Gates to be defense secretary. Members of both parties expect him to be approved by the end of the week to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld unless a serious obstacle emerges in the hearing.

In any event, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader who is stepping down at the end of this Congress, does not intend to keep lawmakers around long.

“Senator Frist plans to adjourn the 109th Congress by week’s end,” his office said last week as it laid out a potential agenda.

The resistance to finishing the appropriations bills is not going over well with Democrats, who have accused Republicans of acting irresponsibly. The unfinished business could also prove a distraction for members of the incoming majority who would like to spend the first weeks of 2007 moving ahead with their own agenda rather than cleaning up from 2006.

“They cut and run from the troops by not doing their oversight, and now they are cutting and running from the country by not passing the spending bills,” said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who will be the chairman of the Democratic caucus next year.

But Republicans noted that Democrats had failed to finish their spending bills after the 2002 elections gave Republicans control of the Senate. And they said inaction on the appropriations measures would save the government money by holding spending at current levels rather than providing increases to federal agencies or establishing new programs.

“Every week we don’t pass the bills, we save money,” said Mr. Frist’s chief of staff, Eric M. Ueland.

Republicans struggled throughout the 109th Congress with budget and appropriations measures, caught between conservatives who wanted to hold down spending and more moderate lawmakers who sought to increase investment in health, education and other programs.

Congress this year sent only 2 of 11 spending bills — those covering the Pentagon and the Department of Homeland Security — to President Bush, leaving much of the government operating under what is known as a continuing resolution. Senate conservatives have led the opposition to trying to finish the bills, arguing that they do not want to see a flurry of wasteful pet projects inserted into a huge appropriations package that few would be able to decipher. But others said failing to pass the bills would leave agencies unable to deal with new demands like a need for increased veterans care.

Republicans would also like to renew tax breaks like the tuition tax credit, federal income tax deduction for state sales tax, and a business research and development tax credit. Those provisions have been tied up in disputes over other legislation all year. The tax breaks could run into trouble again if lawmakers try to use the package to gain approval of more controversial items, like a trade agreement with Vietnam. The bill might also be used to suspend a cut in doctor fees under Medicare.

With an eye on a new Democratic majority that will be less inclined to expand offshore drilling, House Republican leaders have decided to allow a vote on a Senate measure that would open about 8 million acres in the eastern Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration rather than hold out for a more expansive House bill.

The House approach, which would end longstanding drilling bans along much of the nation's coast, has no chance of approval in the Senate before Congress adjourns. The oil industry and its allies persuaded the House leadership to agree to a vote on the Senate bill as the best chance to win new drilling rights.

"With the results of this past election, this Congressional session may be the only chance we have for years to come to produce more oil offshore," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, who hailed the measure that would steer millions of dollars in royalties to his state and others along the Gulf Coast.

The House leadership intends to try to win passage of the legislation on Tuesday under an expedited process that limits amendments but requires the approval of two-thirds of those voting; should that fail, they may try to bring the bill back to the floor later in the week with a limit on amendments.

In a concession to abortion opponents, the Republican leadership plans on Wednesday to allow a vote on a measure that would require women seeking an abortion to be informed that the procedure could cause pain to the fetus and be given the option of anesthesia for the fetus. Even if approved by the House, the bill is not on the Senate schedule. And it may be the last anti-abortion measure brought to the House floor for some time, since the new Democratic majority strongly backs abortion rights.

Lame-duck Session Likely To Punt To Next Congress (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON

The "lame-duck" Congress opening this week may fit its billing.

There's a vast unfinished agenda in the 109th Congress, including most of the fiscal 2007 spending bills, immigration reform, ethics rules for lawmakers, an offshore drilling bill, a fix for President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program, and an omnibus trade and tax package.

But after an election that shifted control of the House and Senate to Democrats, there's little political will to complete it this session.

"There are a lot of factors in play, and the difficulties haven't gone anywhere since the election," says Don Stewart, a spokesman for incoming Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell. "Both sides are talking a lot, but there hasn't been agreement yet. People are just going to keep talking until someone throws up their hands."

Congress is likely to punt on approving at least nine of the 12 spending bills for the fiscal year that began on Oct. 1.

All that means heavy lifting for Democrats in the 110th Congress, who will have to deal with old spending bills even as they are rolling out a signature agenda for the first 100 legislative days.

While expectations are fading for spending bills, the Senate is on track to confirm former CIA director Robert Gates as Defense secretary. The Senate Armed Services Committee opens hearings on the nomination Tuesday, which are expected to be vigorous but not deeply divisive.

"We have to have someone who will speak truth to power and not just tell a president what he wants to hear," said Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, the committee's incoming chairman, on NBC's "Meet the Press" Sunday. "It's likely that he's confirmed, but it's very important that there be a fair process."

Of the dozen postelection sessions Congress has held since World War II, several have had historical significance. In 1954, the Senate convened to censure Sen. Joseph McCarthy (R) of Wisconsin for his "lynch party"-style hearings on the dangers of communism. In 1974, Congress met to complete legislation delayed by the Watergate investigation. In 1998, the House met for two days to impeach President Clinton.

Since then, Congress has been driven into overtime after each election because of unfinished spending bills. Those lame-duck sessions became a free-for-all for adding earmarks to massive omnibus spending bills or, when that failed, postponing decisions until the next Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0101559

Of the two strategies, say budget watchdog groups, punting to the next Congress may be preferable. "It will save a lot of money," says Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste. "For now, taxpayers have a little bit of a Christmas present, because a continuing resolution spends the lower amount of last year's spending bill."

At press time both the House and Senate aimed to pass a continuing resolution for spending bills through Feb. 15, 2007.

The deadlock is similar to what happened in the waning hours of the 107th Congress, after Democrats lost control of the Senate. After failing to agree on spending, Congress opted to complete work on 11 unfinished appropriations bills in the new Congress. In 2002 and 2004, Congress used lame-duck sessions to negotiate vast omnibus spending bills, along with member "pork" projects to sweeten the deal.

Today, in the Senate, the main obstacle is a determined minority of conservatives who want assurances that no pork projects will be added to appropriations bills.

"We're trying to shut down the favor factory, at least until Christmas," says John Hart, a spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma, who for the first time challenged individual earmarks, such as the proposed "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska, on the floor of the Senate in the 109th Congress. "We'll take a short-term [resolution] if it means not passing 10,000 earmarks in the last stages of the session."

Senate conservatives are also blocking a conference with the House over the $136 billion Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs spending bill, which cleared the Senate unanimously last month, in a bid to curb earmarks.

Other bills could break through the gridlock. On Friday, House Republicans agreed to allow a vote on a Senate compromise bill that would open new areas for oil and natural-gas development in the Gulf Coast, but maintain a ban on coastal drilling elsewhere. The bill also increases federal royalty shares for Gulf states from less than 2 percent to 37.5 percent. The more expansive House version of the bill would open drilling in any coastal area, unless states object.

Another compromise deal that could move this week is a package of popular tax extenders, including expiring state sales-tax deductions, college-tuition deductions, and the research-and-development tax credits that are a top priority of US business groups. This bill could be paired with expiring trade preferences for developing countries, including a measure that would allow Haiti to import textiles from countries such as China and sell them duty-free in the United States - a move strongly opposed by US textile manufacturers.

Meanwhile, lawmakers are engaged in the ups and downs of the coming power shift. Halls of congressional office buildings look like an army on the move. Defeated lawmakers, including several key committee chairmen, were due to be out of their offices by last Friday.

Lazy Ducks (WP)

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

ONE OF the basic functions of Congress is passing spending bills to fund the operations of government. Congress regularly fails to complete this work in a timely way, but the 109th Congress is set to leave on an especially negligent note. Unless something dramatic changes, it will limp to a close having completed work on just two spending bills for fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1. The upshot is that, at best, the fiscal year will be nearly one-third over by the time the 110th Congress finishes the work left incomplete by the 109th.

This is inexcusable. The House passed all but one spending bill. The Senate Appropriations Committee reported all the spending measures by July, the earliest that's been accomplished in 18 years. Then the full Senate punted. Only two bills -- covering defense spending and homeland security -- became law; one other, for military construction, won initial Senate passage, but the conference agreement worked out with the House is now stalled.

Part of the reason -- or, to be more accurate, part of the excuse -- for the latest gridlock is a revolt by some conservative senators against earmarks in that bill. But none of the complaining senators offered any motion to strip the supposedly offending earmarks. And the reality is that their do-nothing strategy sat just fine with Senate Republican leaders, who dallied before the election and could have forced action in the lame-duck session.

Instead, they were happy to dump $460 billion in unfinished business on the new Democratic majority. One political plus for them is that the leftover mess threatens to snarl the Democrats' already full agenda at the start of the 110th Congress. Another is that it could force the new leaders to an early and unpleasant choice about whether to live within the Republicans' spending ceiling or look like hypocritical big spenders and risk a presidential veto.

We understand the political temptation to do mischief by doing nothing, but this is a gross abdication of lawmakers' fundamental responsibilities. It creates enormous problems across a broad spectrum of federal agencies, which have no assurance about what their final spending allowances will be. The new Congress confronts a full plate of important issues. The fiscal 2008 budget will arrive on lawmakers' desks in early February, most likely along with an oversized emergency spending request for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Getting all that business done will be hard enough for the 110th Congress without having to pull cleanup duty for the 109th.

For Defense Nominee, Echoes Of Old Questions (WP)

Gates Criticized on Handling of Intelligence at CIA

When President George H.W. Bush nominated him to lead the CIA in 1991, Robert M. Gates was at 47 the youngest intelligence professional to achieve that distinction.

But during his Senate confirmation hearings, Gates -- a brilliant, smooth-operating Soviet specialist -- lost some of his luster. CIA colleagues came forward to testify that he had kowtowed to the wishes of his superiors and had manipulated intelligence to suit White House policy. Questions also arose about his involvement in the Reagan-era Iran-contra scandal.

Gates eventually won confirmation and held the CIA director's job for 14 months; even his critics describe it as a reasonably successful, modernizing tenure. Now another President Bush has picked Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, citing Gates's deep Washington experience, his knowledge of the Middle East and his recent work as a reformist university president in Texas as ideal preparation for the task of leading U.S. troops out of trouble in Iraq.

With bipartisan support on Capitol Hill for quickly putting the war under new command, Gates's controversial history is by all accounts highly unlikely to derail his confirmation after a single hearing, which is scheduled for Tuesday. Moreover, Gates and others say he learned from the searing, 10-day hearings that scrutinized his record 15 years ago and has since adopted a less officious style.

At the same time, the concerns expressed about Gates then have echoes in the contemporary debate over the alleged tailoring of intelligence analysis to serve political ends, an issue at the heart of criticism of the war in Iraq. The Senate intelligence committee concluded in 2004, for example, that the CIA -- under a different director -- overstated the threat posed by Iraqi weapons of mass destruction programs and that the Bush administration shaped its depiction of intelligence to bolster the case for the U.S. intervention there.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a foe of Gates's confirmation 15 years ago, cited the old charges of skewing intelligence in telling reporters he will seek assurances at the upcoming hearing that Gates will be independent-minded in his new job, which includes supervising a large military intelligence bureaucracy. Alluding to the Bush administration's record on Iraq, Levin said, "We've had enough [of] manipulating intelligence . . . in order to give the policymakers what they wanted to hear."The Trip to the Top Gates's rise through the CIA bureaucracy was so swift, it sparked controversy. "He was recognized in the agency as being an exceptionally gifted analyst and an exceptionally gifted operator," said Alan Fiers, who chaired the agency's Central America task force in the mid-1980s. He was widely seen as a guy "on the make," Fiers testified in 1991.

A Wichita native who had spent a summer working as a grain inspector, Gates evidently itched to leave that life. He signed up with a CIA recruiter in 1965 because, he wrote in his memoirs, "I thought I could get a free trip to the capital." With CIA backing, he then jumped feet first into the Cold War as an Air Force intelligence officer at a Minuteman missile wing, where he recalls being "the only person in our unit who could pronounce the names of our targets."

As a CIA analyst back in Washington, he participated in one demonstration against the Vietnam War, in 1970. But the agency's obsession with the Soviet Union quickly became his own, and in 1974, at age 31, he joined the National Security Council staff for the first time as a Soviet specialist.

Gates did not lack self-confidence in the role. On a 1975 trip to Romania, where his passport was confiscated without explanation, he stood at the door of a White House plane and extended his middle finger to security police shortly before takeoff. It was a "regrettable but immensely satisfying display of pique and immaturity," he wrote later. Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter, nonetheless called the young Gates "the epitome of discretion and good judgment."

In 1980, Gates became the national intelligence officer for the Soviet Union, although he did not visit the country until nine years later. When William J. Casey took the CIA's reins in 1981 after being Ronald Reagan's campaign manager, Gates took an instant liking to him. Both favored a large U.S. military buildup. Although he considered Casey a "zealot" on Central America, Gates concluded that the two had similar views about the Soviet Union, including a conviction that Moscow was orchestrating rebel movements and terrorism in the Third World.

That belief was disputed by others at the agency, but the intelligence estimates prepared under Casey and Gates about the Soviet threat -- now declassified -- were mostly unequivocal, though later they were shown to be largely wrong. Four years before the Soviet Union dissolved, for example, Gates warned in a memo that Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev was after power and not reform, leaving a "long competition and struggle ahead."

Disaffection over Gates's role in pressing such conclusions was centered in the CIA's Office of Soviet Analysis, headed by Melvin Goodman, who at the 1991 hearings accused Gates of corrupting "the process and the ethics of intelligence" by ordering changes in its reports that were unsupported by evidence.

CIA Soviet affairs analyst Jennifer Glaudemans testified, "Not only could we feel his contempt, we could feel his party line."

Disgruntlement also reached into senior ranks. Harold P. Ford, Gates's acting successor as head of the National Intelligence Council, accused his colleague at the time of leaning heavily on subordinates to skew intelligence, adding that the nation deserved someone with a better "analytic batting average."

Other senior CIA officials disputed the criticism, attributing it to sour grapes and false hearsay. Gates produced a detailed rebuttal to Goodman and in his 1996 memoir said, "We were honest, even if we were not always right."

In the end, 31 lawmakers voted against Gates's confirmation -- the most opposition any CIA director nominee had faced.

Reagan's secretary of state, George P. Shultz, was silent during the 1991 confirmation hearings but took issue with Gates in a memoir he published two years later. He said the CIA's analyses had been predictable, manipulative and improperly shaped by "strong views about policy."

"If this were a business, I'd find myself another supplier," Shultz said he told Gates at the time. Now at Stanford University's Hoover Institution, Shultz did not return a phone call seeking his current appraisal of Gates.Iran-Contra Affair

At the 1991 hearings, Gates was forced to confront another controversy, involving when he learned about the Iran-contra affair and how he reacted to it. The scandal arose in part from the secret sale of missiles and spare parts to Iran at inflated prices beginning in the mid-1980s, in a bid to gain the release of U.S. hostages held by Iranian-backed forces in Lebanon. The other part involved the secret transfer of the profits from those dealings to rebel groups in Nicaragua known as contras.

Congress had barred aid to the contras, and disclosure of the twin transactions in 1986 plunged the last two years of Reagan's presidency into controversy. Eleven active or retired U.S. officials were charged with making false statements, destroying evidence or committing fraud.

Gates was a strong backer at the time of armed intervention against Nicaragua's leftist government. In a classified memo to Casey in 1984, recently published by the nonprofit National Security Archive, Gates said Washington should do "everything in its power short of invasion to put that regime out," and he recommended airstrikes, among other measures.

Gates also became deeply involved in a controversial May 1985 intelligence estimate that he later said was "one of the animating factors" in the White House's decision to pursue the arms sales. It raised the prospect of a Cold War race with Moscow for leverage in a destabilized Iran, a notion Gates supported over the strong opposition of the CIA's Soviet analysts.

The State Department disagreed with that conclusion as well and said so in a footnote to the intelligence estimate. Morton I. Abramowitz, then the department's intelligence chief, recalls being telephoned by Gates, who requested that the department drop its footnote of dissent. Abramowitz agreed but came to regret it after the report was linked to Iran- contra. "Subsequently, given what was happening, it takes on a more nefarious meaning," Abramowitz said.

Vincent Cannistraro, an NSC staff member who oversaw covert action at the time, said in an interview that Gates "was aware of what Bill Casey was doing with [NSC staff member] Ollie North and those back-pocket operations. . . . He clearly knew there were things going on not in accord with the regulations."

But Gates told investigators that he did not know about North's control over the contra activities and said he played no role in the affair. After hearing in October 1986 of the funds diversion, Gates expressed concerns to Casey and Reagan's national security adviser. Years later, he wrote that criticism of his failure to get to the bottom of the diversion or report it to Congress "hit home."

An independent counsel, Lawrence E. Walsh, in 1993 labeled the recollections of Casey's "ambitious" deputy disquieting and untruthful but not criminal. Walsh wrote that he was particularly troubled by Gates's assertion that he forgot receiving earlier memos and briefings about the diversion, and he said Gates's reactions were tailored more to protecting the CIA than to learning the truth and stopping illegal conduct.

But when reached in Oklahoma City, Walsh, now retired, said that he remembers feeling that Gates was in a difficult position as Casey's deputy and said he supports his confirmation as defense secretary.

Gates admitted knowing by the end of 1985 about the arms sales to Iran, which Walsh said "contravened" U.S. policy and may have been illegal. But in his memoir, Gates said he thought the sales were legal and opined that "the dirty little secret of the Iran affair" was that officials widely saw it "as a wacko, likely-to-fail NSC operation that the president wanted to pursue -- and no one was willing to put his job on the line to stop it."A New Perspective

Gates used his memoir to distance himself from the controversies. He criticized Casey for being contemptuous of Congress and "something of a bully." He said that in Iran-contra, the CIA was guilty of "political games [and] petty deceptions."

Gates also became more moderate in his views about using military force. He told a PBS interviewer for a documentary on the Persian Gulf War that the cautions of military officers about using force instead of diplomacy to solve foreign policy problems are understandable, "because I have seen a lot of civilians make a lot of proposals for a lot of silly military actions." Gates also said he supported the U.S. decision then to end hostilities without occupying Baghdad, because doing otherwise would have led to a "quagmire."

In 1999, Gates wrote that "pigeonholing most countries in one or another category -- as either friend or foe -- is wrongheaded and undermines our national interest." In 2004, he co-chaired a panel that supported direct dialogue with Iran on regional stability issues and depicted the use of military force on Iran's nuclear facilities as "extremely problematic."

Fiers, who pleaded guilty in 1991 to withholding information from Congress while working for the CIA, said that "we all grow" in judgment with 15 years of perspective, and that he considers Gates a "very good choice" to head the Defense Department because he is "smart and can see all the nuances at play in the Middle East."

Fiers said Gates has "got what very few people get in life: He's got a mulligan. He can come back and play it the right way at the right time."

Hints Of A Rumsfeld-ian Style (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

Gates was known as a bully, but the Defense nominee's supporters say that's in the past.

WASHINGTON — Shortly after Ronald Reagan was reelected president, the CIA forwarded a controversial intelligence report on the 1981 assassination attempt against Pope John Paul II to the White House. It suggested the Soviets were involved in the plot.

Inside the agency, many analysts considered the intelligence estimate flawed. In the words of one CIA branch chief, the assertion lacked "common sense" and was, at best, conjecture.

The contention later was proved false. But there was one person who did see a Soviet hand at play in the plot, and that was the man who mattered at the time: CIA Deputy Director Robert M. Gates, who personally handed the report up to the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0101563

On Tuesday, the Senate begins its hearings on replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld, a Defense secretary criticized for failing to hear dissenting views, allowing his department to peddle flawed intelligence, and leading the military into a war in which victory has proved elusive. And it is Gates whom President Bush has selected to lead the Pentagon, offering the onetime CIA director up as "an agent of change."

But Gates appears to some an odd choice, given the Pentagon's rocky and occasionally divisive atmosphere under Rumsfeld. For much of Gates' career, critics and even some admirers have likened him to the imperious Rumsfeld and his close administration ally, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"Gates was making it clear to analysts what intelligence they were to produce," said Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a nonprofit institute that gathers and analyzes declassified documents. "It's a chilling record, because you have two main themes of the Iraq war present in Robert Gates' career at CIA: the arrogance and bullying of a Rumsfeld and the intelligence cherry-picking of a Cheney."

Hearings were key

But critics and friends also suggest that Gates, 63, has evolved. The charges that he was a bully who was wrong on the important foreign policy issues of the day were sifted during his 1991 confirmation hearings to become CIA director. Those hearings, along with his failed nomination in 1987, were a public flogging that, those close to him say, forced him to reexamine his style.

"Bob Gates has learned over the years," said former Sen. David Boren (D-Okla.), who was chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee during the 1991 hearings. "He realized in retrospect he had been misunderstood by some people who became his critics. After that, he became more patient."

The '91 hearings stretched on for months, and friends say the searing national spotlight softened the sharp-elbowed Gates and taught important lessons that he took to his jobs as CIA director and, later, president of Texas A&M University.

"I think he really was stunned to find that people actually disliked him," said retired Adm. Bobby Ray Inman, a career intelligence officer who worked closely with Gates in the Carter and Reagan administrations. "I'm not sure I'd say [he was] chastened, but maturity and experience causes you to simply be calmer in dealing with people."

To some, it is an open question about which Bob Gates would take the helm of the Pentagon: the former CIA analyst with a bullying intellect and occasionally dictatorial style like Rumsfeld's, or the patient listener who eventually won over critics at the CIA and tradition-bound Texas A&M.

Whatever qualities Gates brings, he will face the challenge of leading the world's dominant military at a time of historic strains over frustrated war efforts abroad and shifting political currents at home.

The portrayal of Gates as a blunt and uncompromising taskmaster during the 1980s is not shared by all who worked with him as he climbed the government's national security hierarchy. Many insist he always has approached problems with an open mind.

"He was good at building a consensus and understanding what other people's points of view are, even if he didn't agree with them," said retired Adm. Stansfield Turner, President Carter's CIA director for whom Gates served as executive assistant.

Gates' rise through the ranks — he remains the only entry-level analyst ever to become director — was colored by the Cold War.

From the start of his government career, which began after he served two years as an Air Force officer in the late 1960s, he sided with anti-Soviet hard-liners. It was a view of Moscow that would bring him close to Zbigniew Brzezinski, Carter's national security advisor, and William J. Casey, Reagan's CIA director.

But it earned him the enmity of advocates of detente, including George P. Shultz, Reagan's secretary of State, who would later accuse Gates of shaping intelligence to fit his worldview and push to get Gates fired.

"In Sovietology, it's to some extent a speculative science. You can either err by being much too soft on the Soviets, or you can err by being somewhat too hard," said Brzezinski, who counts himself and Gates among the latter group. "I don't think [Gates] was politicizing intelligence. He was rendering views different than George Shultz's."

Signs of the taskmaster

Casey found the young analyst to be a kindred spirit, a fellow cold warrior with the intellectual firepower to demand more rigor in what Casey viewed as a flabby and overly cautious CIA analysis of the Soviets. Gates rose even faster than before, first as the agency's lead Soviet analyst, then as head of all intelligence analysis, and finally as Casey's deputy director.

His rapid advance — Gates was just 38 when he became Casey's director of intelligence in January 1982 — revealed some of the first signs of the overweening taskmaster. It certainly was a role Casey wanted him to play.

"We never sent Bob to charm school when it came to criticizing analysis," said John N. McMahon, Casey's deputy and Gates' boss for four years. "You can dump on someone in several different ways and get the point across, and one is to be forthright and just bang it out — and Bob did that."

But even if he was doing Casey's bidding, it also appeared to be a role Gates relished. In a September 1981 memo to Casey, shortly before taking over the intelligence directorship, he was merciless toward the agency's analysts.

"There are far too many people playing it safe," Gates wrote. "CIA is slowly turning into the Department of Agriculture."

For the remainder of the Reagan administration, Gates appeared to show little restraint.

"Analysts would come to him with what they thought was great analysis, and he'd tear it apart," recalled Richard L. Haver, the top official in the Pentagon's intelligence operation at the time.

"He would correct their English, their syntax, and he would hammer the way in which they crafted their conclusions."

Gates' hammering may have been what the CIA needed, but it also created enemies. That became apparent on the national stage in 1987, when he was nominated to succeed Casey as CIA director.

Any stylistic controversies, however, were overshadowed that year by the burgeoning Iran-Contra scandal, in which proceeds from secret U.S. arms sales to Iran were funneled to White House-backed insurgents in Nicaragua. Gates was not charged, but questions over his role were enough to force him to withdraw his nomination.

In 1991, when Gates once more was nominated to lead the CIA, his reputation for bullying analysts came into full light. Gates had expected a rehash of Iran-Contra. But those close to the nominee said he was stunned by the browbeating accusations, some of which came from old friends.

"It was totally a shock to me, and it shocked Bob, I know, as well," said McMahon, who said the analysts made no such charges within the CIA against Gates.

The committee's investigation and hearings lasted from June until October. Ultimately, he was confirmed by a split Senate.

Switching his style

Gates has never spoken at length about the effect of those hearings. But many said that the Gates who took charge of the CIA's Langley, Va., headquarters at the end of 1991 was quite different from the man who had been Casey's tough-minded deputy.

Gates returned to the CIA with an aggressive reform agenda. But rather than force changes through top-down edicts, he sought input from senior subordinates. On his first day on the job, Gates launched 12 reform task forces to take on a range of issues.

"He told us when we started off where he wanted us to go," Haver said. "But we were given lots of latitude to argue with him."

One of Gates' first acts was to give important responsibilities to Harold P. Ford, a longtime CIA official as well as a lecturer and historian who had been one of his most persuasive critics in the confirmation process. The move sent a signal that dissent was welcome, said Blanton, director of the National Security Archive.

Gates employed similar approaches when, nine years after leaving the CIA, he became president of Texas A&M.

Much as he had assuaged the skeptical ranks at CIA, Gates moved quickly to counter faculty doubts by increasing their clout.

"I always felt we had a voice with this president, a voice we never had before," said Martha L. Loudder, a former president of the Faculty Senate. "He motivates people because they understand he wants to make changes that they want to make."

The issue of affirmative action on student admissions was a particularly sensitive conflict. In 2003, Gates, who opposed racial preferences, squared off against professor Bob Strawser, another former head of the Faculty Senate, who wanted to reinstate them.

Gates held firm, but many said he changed the debate. Remarkably, at a university with one of the most vocal group of graduates in the nation, he ended preferences for the children of alumni — a largely white group. That change, along with more aggressive recruiting, drove up minority enrollment on campus.

Strawser believes this is the management style Gates will bring to the Pentagon. And the uniformed military, many of whom privately have said they are frustrated after feeling ignored by Rumsfeld, may be heard once more.

"I think the military leaderships will have a surprise. They will get a full hearing," Strawser said. "He isn't going to take votes, but he will listen and take advice."

Those who worked with both men agree that Gates' style will be profoundly different from Rumsfeld's.

"Don has always been a change agent. He comes into a new situation with his own, independent ideas," said Frank C. Carlucci, a former defense secretary who has worked closely with Rumsfeld and Gates. "Gates will listen more to the establishment, but he'll reach his own conclusions. He's more of a consensus-builder."

Inman, a friend of Gates' who also has worked with Rumsfeld, predicted that Gates would be seen roaming the halls of the Pentagon, seeking out mid-level officials for their opinions.

"Part of it is out of curiosity, but it's also partly image — that he's not sitting on the throne or in the cloistered environment," Inman said.

"He is, by his nature, polite. That's not an allegation I'd make in Don's case."

Quizzing Robert Gates (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to succeed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, will appear before the Senate Armed Services Committee tomorrow for his confirmation hearing. We asked six defense and foreign-policy experts to tell us what questions the senators should ask. The Next Attack

1. According to the Congressional Budget Office, the Pentagon is underfinancing its procurement program by $53 billion to $121 billion each year for the next several years. What will be your priorities to address this shortfall?

2. Do you agree that our NATO allies other than Britain should be contributing more forces, equipment and training to help secure success in Iraq and Afghanistan? How would you persuade them to do so?

3. Department of Defense intelligence functions and capacities have significantly expanded in recent years. Do you intend to continue, increase or disband them?

4. In view of the predictions that we are likely to experience further terrorist attacks on American soil and that these attacks are likely to be multiple in number and executed nearly simultaneously, do you believe the doctrine of posse comitatus, which prohibits the military from engaging in domestic law enforcement, should be revised?

— WILLIAM S. COHEN, the secretary of defense from 1997 to 2001. Rights vs. Realism

1. You have long been associated with the "realist" view that American policy-makers should not concern themselves with a country's internal human rights practices. Yet it is now clear that threats to the United States are often fueled by abusive regimes and incubated in failing states. On the other hand, rapid democratization can bring bloodshed, and American support for moderates can undermine their credibility. Given this complexity, what principles should guide American interactions with human rights abusers in the 21st century?

2. American forces are overextended in Iraq; NATO countries are reluctant to send additional troops to Afghanistan to confront the resurgent Taliban; and so many peacekeepers now operate under the United Nations flag that the major troop contributors are becoming exhausted. What will you do to try to convince American allies to assist in stabilizing places that the United States believes are important, but where it cannot or should not itself be present?

DOJ_NMG_0101566

3. The Sudanese government is conducting a devastating offensive against civilians in Darfur. Owing to the support of China and the Arab League, Khartoum has felt free to thumb its nose at demands from the United Nations that it allow a large protection force to enter the embattled province. What levers can the Pentagon pull — with Khartoum, with Sudan's allies or with the rebels in Darfur — to ensure that a robust force gets to the region before tens of thousands more civilians die?

— SAMANTHA POWER, a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government and the Pulitzer Prize-winning author of " 'A Problem From Hell': America and the Age of Genocide." Life With the Chiefs

1. How will you restore the readiness of an overstressed military, while continuing to transform it in preparation for irregular warfare or for war with countries that may possess weapons of mass destruction?

2. Please discuss your view of the role of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other senior uniformed military leaders with regard to the secretary of defense and the president. What steps will you take to strengthen civilian-military relations in the Pentagon?

3. What changes in strategy will you make that will enable the military to complete its missions in Iraq and Afghanistan?

4. Looking back, what could we have done at the beginning of the war in Iraq that might have produced a better outcome, and how will you ensure that we never again ask our military to conduct operations that are not well thought out or properly resourced?

— DONALD KERRICK, a former United States Army lieutenant general, deputy national security adviser and assistant to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Handling the Hill

1. Donald Rumsfeld made a mistake in not paying enough attention to members of Congress; listening to them and spending time with them is a crucial part of the secretary's job. But you will have to appear before 16 Congressional committees. How do you intend to manage your time?

2. Right now the Army is riven with conflict. Top generals retire and immediately start speaking out because they feel they weren't listened to. The members of National Guard and reserves feel they've not been treated well, particularly in terms of replacement equipment; and the regular forces feel they lack sufficient personnel. How do you plan to handle all the dissension within the Army?

3. The National Security Agency, which reports to the secretary of defense, has become embroiled in lawsuits concerning electronic surveillance. These are important public affairs problems that must be handled very carefully. How will you deal with such issues before they get to court? Will you delegate this responsibility or get personally involved?

4. Are you willing to increase the military's personnel budget so that those who serve in the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps are paid salaries at least comparable to what they might make in similar civilian jobs?

— MELVIN LAIRD, the secretary of defense from 1969 to 1973. You and Tehran

1. Will you exchange the current "train and leave" approach to the war in Iraq for a clear-and-hold victory strategy, which may include increasing troop levels, abandoning standard rotations (now limited to one year), replacing commanding generals and bypassing spending restrictions to obtain crucial equipment?

2. You have in the past suggested that the United States should have a direct dialogue with Iran. Is it your view that Iran's sponsorship of terrorist groups in Iraq, Lebanon and the West Bank and Gaza could end as a result of direct dialogue? If by dialogue you mean negotiation, what do you suggest the United States offer Iran in exchange for an end to its pro-terrorist foreign policy?

3. Are you prepared to undertake a sweeping review of the state of the American military and its ability to respond to identified national security threats? Are you prepared to increase the size of the ground forces?

— DANIELLE PLETKA, the vice president for foreign and defense policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute. An Anti-Rumsfeld

1. It is clear that your immediate task must be to resolve the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. What else will you be able to accomplish as secretary of defense in the next two years?

2. Is the Department of Defense the right agency to lead the war on terrorism?

3. What do you intend to do to improve the department's cooperation with other government agencies in combating terrorism?

DOJ_NMG_0101567

4. Will you rebalance the air, naval and ground forces to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps?

5. How will you avoid making the mistakes of your predecessor?

— KALEV I. SEPP, a former officer in the United States Army Special Forces and an assistant professor in the department of Defense Analysis at the Naval Postgraduate School.

Iraq And The Danger Of Psychological Entrapment (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

As Robert M. Gates appears this week at his Senate confirmation hearings for defense secretary, Wesleyan University psychologist Scott Plous sees a hidden trap. To understand it, take a little test.

Let's say your elderly dad has a beloved car. Its reliability was legendary, but it has started to have problems. He gets one thing fixed, and something else goes wrong. Each fix doesn't cost much, but they add up, and then the problems start to get bigger. Your dad is convinced the next repair will get the car as good as new. Would you advise him to pull the plug and get rid of the car?

Or consider this. A friend invests some money after getting a tip about a stock. The price soars, and your friend gains 10 percent overnight. He immediately doubles his investment. A week later, the thing tanks, and he is in the red. A month later, it dives again, and he has lost a quarter of his investment. Should he cut his losses and sell?

One more, and yes, these are all trick questions. A woman you care about falls in love. After many years of a happy relationship, the person she is with develops a vicious streak, starts smashing things and occasionally gives her a black eye. Would you tell her to walk out of the relationship?

The trick in all these questions is that when presented with such scenarios, it is easy for us to answer yes. Your dad should sell that car, your friend should save what money he can, and the person you care about should dump that abuser.

Every day, of course, when it comes to such decisions in our own lives, millions of people answer no.

The difference is because of a widespread phenomenon in human behavior known as entrapment. When you invest yourself in something, it is exceedingly difficult to discard your investment. What is devilish about entrapment is not just that it can result in ever greater losses, but that those losses get you ever more entrapped, because now you have even more invested.

Plous, a social psychologist and author of "The Psychology of Judgment and Decision Making," said experiments show that psychological entrapment comes in at least four guises: the investment trap, in which we try to recover sunk costs by throwing good money after bad; the time delay trap, in which a short-term benefit carries the seed of long-term problems; the deterioration trap, in which things that started out well slowly get worse; and the ignorance trap, in which hidden risks surface suddenly.

What does this have to do with the Gates confirmation? Plous sees the U.S. dilemma about what military course to take in Iraq as a perfect example of psychological entrapment -- on a national scale.

"What is remarkable is that the war in Iraq is a kind of super trap that has all these elements," Plous said. "Some weeks things look better, and then they look worse and then there is a setback. What we need is to take a step back and ask, 'If we were faced with the choice today without sunk costs, what decision would we make?' "

Plous is talking about the quick military victory followed by the zigzag decline into nightmare: the lack of intelligence on the ground about Saddam Hussein's supposed weapons of mass destruction; the hundreds of billions of dollars invested to fight the war; and above all, the lives of thousands of Americans that have been lost.

Plous said his alarm bells went off when he realized that President Bush was explicitly using the language of entrapment in speeches to rally support for the war. "Retreating from Iraq would dishonor the service of our brave men and women who have sacrificed in that country and have given their lives in that country, which would mean their sacrifice would be in vain," the president said recently.

Plous's point is not that Bush's appeal is ineffective; the point of entrapment is that it is exceedingly effective. It is utterly human not to want a great sacrifice to go in vain.

DOJ_NMG_0101568

I asked Plous whether he was drawing his conclusion only because the war in Iraq is going badly. Would he have told the British the same thing, for example, during the bleakest days of 1940, when a German victory seemed imminent -- and when holding on led to victory over Adolf Hitler?

In other words, how do you tell the difference between getting entrapped in a disaster and being persistent through the difficult phase that can precede victory?

Psychology cannot predict the future or tell you what to do, but Plous said it can warn you to be vigilant if a course of action is primarily justified in terms of recovering what has already been lost. It is not wrong to factor in sunk costs, but they should not drive the decision.

In the World War II example, defeating fascism, not honoring dead British soldiers, was the reason it made sense to fight on.

"Rational decision-making should not be driven primarily by recovery of past costs," Plous said. "If you can no longer justify it in terms of what it will bring in the future and what its realistic prospects are, that is a warning sign you may have become entrapped."

Other techniques to avoid entrapment in everyday life include making sure that a decision to continue on a path is not made solely by people who decided on that path in the first place, by setting limits on investments upfront and by triggering automatic reviews if a plan of action hits certain predetermined failure points.

But none of those measures can take the sting out of the dilemma on whether to change course after a substantial investment: "Regardless of whether you supported the war or not," Plous said, "this is going to be heart-wrenching."

Next Defense Secretary Must Hit Ground Running (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook, Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Robert Gates, President Bush's choice as the next Defense secretary, will have to act fast — within months, analysts and retired officers say — to effect change at the Pentagon and in Iraq.

Hearings on Gates' nomination are scheduled to begin Tuesday before the Senate Armed Services Committee. Nobody has announced opposition to Gates, the 63-year-old president of Texas A&M University. He led the CIA from 1991 until early 1993.

“He has to be able to go in immediately and make changes” at the Pentagon, said committee member Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I. “He has to thoroughly re-examine the policy and strategy in Iraq. That's the most pressing and immediate priority.”

The challenges will be tough. Gates faces violent insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan that have forced troops into faster-than-normal deployments; a strained relationship between the Defense secretary and top generals; and a short time in which to make a difference.

Gates has to work closely and quickly with Congress to be successful, said William Cohen, a 24-year veteran of Congress and Defense secretary from 1997 to 2001. “As we get further into next year, obviously the political ambitions of those running for president will intensify, and the risk of more partisanship at that point is going to materialize,” Cohen said.

Gates' experience with the Iraq Study Group puts him “ahead of the curve in terms of understanding what needs to be done” in Iraq, Cohen said. Gates was a member of the bipartisan commission until his nomination Nov. 8. The group is scheduled to release its recommendations Wednesday, including an endorsement of a gradual pullout of U.S. troops.

If Bush does decide on a new Iraq policy, Cohen said, “Gates is in the best position to try” to make it happen.

Gates' appointment is a symbol that the Bush administration is open to changing course in Iraq, said Stephen Biddle, a defense expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, a think tank.

However, “if it turns out the administration is not willing to contemplate any real change, Gates has just bought himself a ticket on the Titanic,” said Biddle, a former assistant professor at the Army War College. “He can mop the deck a bit, but we all know what happened to the Titanic.”

Pushing policy changes in Iraq is the real extent of Gates' potential influence, said retired general Jack Keane, a former Army vice chief of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0101569

That's because Gates will only have time to influence the Pentagon's budget for one year, Keane said, “and that can be changed by a subsequent administration.”

Gates must also mend fences within the Pentagon, some analysts and retired generals say.

“There are going to be a lot of people happy to see Rumsfeld gone because he was a miserable boss to work for,” said Frederick Kagan, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. “There are a handful who are very loyal. But a much larger number happy to see a change.”

Gates should “create an atmosphere where you'll get your ass chewed for not speaking up,” said retired general William Nash, now a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Retired major general Paul Eaton, one of several generals who said last spring that Rumsfeld should resign, said Gates must listen to generals who advocate for a larger Army and Marine Corps. Rumsfeld failed to listen to advice on the need for more troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, Eaton said. “We have failed to build a military to meet the foreign policy of America.”

It's nonsense to claim that Rumsfeld discouraged dissent, said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. Rumsfeld solicited advice from military and civilian officials at the Pentagon, Whitman said, and did not reject calls for more troops.

“The number of U.S. troops in Iraq has always been based on the recommendations of experienced commanders on the ground, the combatant command and the best military advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff,” Whitman said.

Rumsfeld should not be the scapegoat for the problems in Iraq and the Pentagon, said Richard Perle, a former Defense official and a research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. Instead, the entire Bush administration should be held accountable, said Perle, who led Rumsfeld's civilian advisory board during the buildup for the Iraq invasion.

Gates will be one of many people determining military policy, Perle said. “He'll have a seat at the table. But he's making very few of the decisions on his own.”

Democrats Who Opposed War Move Into Key Positions (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Although given little public credit at the time, or since, many of the 126 House Democrats who spoke out and voted against the October 2002 resolution that gave President Bush authority to wage war against Iraq have turned out to be correct in their warnings about the problems a war would create.

With the Democrats taking over control of the House next January, the views that some voiced during two days of debate four years ago are worth recalling, since many of those lawmakers will move into positions of power. They include not only members of the new House leadership but also the incoming chairmen of the Appropriations, Armed Services, Budget and Judiciary committees and the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.), a senior member of the Armed Services Committee, was one of several Democrats who predicted during the House floor debate that "the outcome after the conflict is actually going to be the hardest part, and it is far less certain." He credited his views in part to what he heard over breakfasts with retired generals Anthony C. Zinni and Joseph P. Hoar, both of whom had led the U.S. Army's Central Command -- a part of which is in Spratt's district.

"They made the point: We do not want to win this war, only to lose the peace and swell the ranks of terrorists who hate us," Spratt said.

Spratt recently looked back at his resolution, which would have required Bush to come back to Congress before launching an attack. It was defeated 270 to 158. He recalled that extended hearings were held before the Persian Gulf War but that nothing similar preceded the vote on the 2002 resolution. "I remember we talked this time about how we got to get answers before this train leaves the station," Spratt said.

The incoming Armed Services chairman, Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), spoke in support of Spratt's amendment, stressing the need for "a plan for rebuilding of the Iraqi government and society, if the worst comes to pass and armed conflict is necessary."

Skelton had written Bush a month earlier, after a White House meeting, to say that "I have no doubt that our military would decisively defeat Iraq's forces and remove Saddam. But like the proverbial dog chasing the car down the road, we must consider what we would do after we caught it."

Skelton went on to note the "extreme difficulty of occupying Iraq with its history of autocratic rule, its balkanized ethnic tensions and its isolated economic system." He also warned that Bush's postwar strategy must "take seriously" the possibility that a replacement regime "might be rejected by the Iraqi people, leading to civil unrest and even anarchy."

Rep. David R. Obey (Wis.), who will chair the Appropriations Committee, was among the group that organized the Democrats. He spoke then about poor preparation for postwar Iraq, a concern he developed after listening to State Department officials.

He recalled recently that an amendment by Rep. Barbara T. Lee (D-Calif.) that would have delayed taking action until inspectors from the United Nations completed their work "made sense, but there was no prayer it would pass." It got 72 votes.

Obey said Spratt's amendment was the only approach "that could gather critical mass, and that's what most of us in the caucus settled on."

The number of House Democrats who supported Spratt "was a remarkable achievement," Obey said, "given it meant opposing the president in the wake of 9/11." Obey's district was 70 percent in favor of going into Iraq, he said.

On the House floor more than four years ago, Lee told colleagues: "Our own intelligence agencies report that there is currently little chance of chemical and biological attack from Saddam Hussein on U.S. forces or territories. But they emphasize that an attack could become much more likely if Iraq believes that it is about to be attacked." That information, she said, came from material that then-CIA Director George J. Tenet had provided to the Senate.

Lee also raised questions in the floor debate that remain unanswered. "What is our objective here," she asked four years ago, "regime change or elimination of weapons of mass destruction?"

Looking forward now to next year and a Democratic majority in the House, Lee said, "Those of us who early on understood have many ideas of what to do now and how to get out of Iraq."

Rep. Tammy Baldwin (Wis.), who did not belong to a committee with national security jurisdiction, was among the lawmakers who talked on the House floor about what turned out to be the real issues in Iraq. She spoke of the "postwar challenges," saying that "there is no history of democratic government in Iraq," that its "economy and infrastructure is in ruins after years of war and sanctions" and that rebuilding would take "a great deal of money."

Baldwin four years ago asked questions that are being widely considered today: "Are we prepared to keep 100,000 or more troops in Iraq to maintain stability there? If we don't, will a new regime emerge? If we don't, will Iran become the dominant power in the Middle East? . . . If we don't, will Islamic fundamentalists take over Iraq?"

Baldwin said recently that she put together her statement after reading public commentary and talking with like-minded colleagues and her staff about what would come next. "A vote like this, I didn't undertake lightly -- I almost fully expected they would find weapons there," she said. "But we hadn't heard about an exit strategy; it was such a blank."

The day after the House vote, The Washington Post recorded that 126 House Democrats voted against the final resolution. None was quoted giving a reason for his or her vote except for Rep. Joe Baca (Calif.), who said a military briefing had disclosed that U.S. soldiers did not have adequate protection against biological weapons.

"As a veteran, that's what hit me the hardest," he said.

Lee was described as giving a "fiery denunciation" of the administration's "rush to war," with only 14 colleagues in the House chamber to hear her. None of the reasons she gave to justify her concerns, nor those voiced by other Democratic opponents, was reported in the two Post stories about passage of the resolution that day.

Opie's All Grown Up Now (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

Every political race Adam Putnam has run, it seems, has focused on his age. When he was 22 and running for the Florida Statehouse, with his mother laying out district maps on the kitchen table and his father creating campaign literature in front of the television, his 69-year-old opponent attacked him for trying to run from "the frat house to the statehouse" and used his sophomore-class high school yearbook photo in an advertisement. The cherubic redhead heard pretty much the same refrain when he ran for Congress in 2000. Even the national Republican Party was hesitant about backing such a young prospect. "I looked about 12," he jokes now. And he had the nickname to match: "Opie" was the favorite at the time. He then, well, graduated to President Bush's favorite moniker, "Red," and now, at 32, Putnam occasionally gets "Howdy Doody."

And yet, in this terrible political year for the GOP, Putnam is one Republican for whom "stay the course" has proved a winning strategy. Yes, he's still a youngster. He's not a household name, and he doesn't grab all the headlines, even back home in Florida. But having just won a fourth term by garnering 69 percent of the vote, Putnam is racing up the Capitol Hill pecking order. Republicans bumped him up again last month to chair of the House Republican Conference, the No. 3 GOP position in the House, in effect the communications maestro behind Minority-Leader-to-be John Boehner and Minority Whip Roy Blunt. Putnam was tapped to boost a beleaguered party. How well he does with that assignment may help determine the GOP's future. And it may have a major bearing on Adam Putnam's political future as well.

A state the size of Florida has no shortage of big-time politicians. And Florida has its share of metropolitan power circles around Miami, Orlando, Tampa, Jacksonville, and Tallahassee. Putnam's roots aren't in any of those areas. No, he hails from Bartow in Polk County–that's east of Tampa and southwest of Orlando. As a fifth-generation Floridian, Putnam grew up in a family that runs a cattle ranch and a citrus farm. (He still gets hefty campaign donations from agriculture, and most of his personal worth of more than $2 million is tied to the family business.) And at the University of Florida, he was a food and resource economics major and spent a little time in college politics, but unlike many young Republicans-Ralph Reed and Grover Norquist–who have quickly risen through the ranks, he wasn't head of College Republicans or some other national political club. He was in "Florida for Jeb" and "Gators for Bush [41]," he says, and was involved in the statewide 4-H club. But "there is no political blood in my family," he notes.

His first experience with Washington politics was interning for hometown Republican Rep. Charles Canady, whose seat he now holds, during the summer before he graduated from college in 1995. Republicans were basking in the warm glow of the Gingrich revolution, and even though his car was broken into four times, Putnam loved the job, because he felt a need for young people to have their political voices heard. He'd been interested in the Florida legislature as a high schooler, so he decided to make his first run there, just a year out of the University of Florida. His father "was just silent for what seemed like an eternity" when he heard the news, but ultimately, Dad campaigned hard for him. Putnam was elected in a season when Republicans took control of the state House of Representatives for the first time in 122 years; before long, the young state rep was chairing the Agriculture Committee.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

In today's world of commuter nightmares, consider this one for the record book. When Sen. Patty Murray goes home every Friday to Whidbey Island, Wash., it takes 10 hours to cover 2,500 miles in a Planes, Trains and Automobiles string of transports. On a good day. And for what? Well, the three-term Democrat just named to the No. 4 leadership post in the new majority isn't one of those who trade their home turf for Georgetown cocktail parties. She likes to hang with her peeps. "I can take the temperature of the country at any time just by going to the grocery store," she says. "If everybody's doing OK, they just say, 'Hi.' If things are going on, it takes me an hour and a half or two just to get through." In fact, it was during her visits to the Freeland Payless that she sensed the strong pro-Democratic mood that would junk the GOP Congress.

So, about her travels: Fridays start at 5:30 a.m. with a trip to Dulles Airport, where she grabs a United nonstop to Seattle with lots of other lawmakers. For 5½ hours, "depending on wind," she works. From the airport, she and her hubby drive two hours to the Mukilteo Ferry and wait in line for the 25-minute sail to Whidbey. She gets no special treatment. "If somebody cuts in front of that ferry line, you're dead." Then it's another 40 minutes home. A hassle? "I do this so much I don't think about it," she says. "It's just a day."

It's Not Maple Syrup Dean's Out Selling

His loudmouthed inside-the-beltway boors are still booing Democratic boss Howard Dean, despite the party's strong election showing, but they're eating him up like sweet Vermont maple syrup in Canada and overseas. Party bigs say the former Vermont guv is headed to Europe to cheer on liberal parties in England, Spain, and Portugal. His keynote address this month to

DOJ_NMG_0101572

Canada's beleaguered Liberal Party, fans say, was just a warm-up. Dean's message: Show folks like England's Laborites how to remake their top-down outfits into grassroots organizations just as he did at the Democratic National Committee. "A lot of these parties are where the Democrats were a few years ago," says an insider, "when there were people in the party who said, 'We have to be more like Republicans,'and others who said, 'We have to stand up for what we believe in.'"

Dems in? Lobbyists Win-No Problem!

The switch in Congress and promises by Democrats to swamp the administration with investigations and subpoenas are boosting K Street's bottom line. Lobbying and PR firms report up to a 25 percent surge in spending by worried firms, especially those in the defense, drug, and energy worlds expecting to catch the majority of flack from Capitol Hill.

It's 'Rewrite' for the Bible of Politics

Our colleague and columnist Michael Barone is back to rewriting the Bible–er, the bible of politics that is. As the chief author of The Almanac of American Politics, Barone updates after every federal election. But with the Democrats taking control of the House and Senate and with about 30 new faces in Congress, this looks to be a pretty big job. So what are Barone's git'r done secrets? First, he figures what to expand or cut. "Obviously," he says, "I'm not going to use a lot of the material on House Speaker Denny Hastert that was in the previous Almanac." Next, he gets detailed voting info. "I find that close examination of the election returns tells me a lot that most observers miss." To make sure he's balanced, Barone shuns labels. "I have tried to avoid using the word reform in describing any proposal, since it can be taken as showing approval for it." Now he has to redo the introduction, which famously declared America a 49 percent-to-49 percent nation. His new view: The country is still divided. "The political future," quoth the sage, "is very much up for grabs. Both parties have the possibility of getting enough support to go above the 51 percent ceilings." And that could happen, he adds, if a presidential candidate liked by both sides emerges in 2008.

Heritage Seeking Out Democrats On Agenda (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

The Heritage Foundation, seeing new opportunities to advance its conservative agenda in next year's Democratic Congress, wants to talk with Democratic leaders about where they might find common ground.

The prospect of the conservative think tank, whose ideas fueled President Reagan's policies in the 1980s, sitting down with some of the Democrats' most liberal leaders to discuss taxes, spending and health care might sound far-fetched in the immediate aftermath of a bitter midterm election. But a senior Heritage official says, "We are actively soliciting a chance to sit down and discuss our ideas with them," and Democrats say they are more than willing to get together.

Letters seeking a meeting for a frank exchange of ideas quietly began going out this week to a number of House and Senate Democratic leaders, including incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer and prospective Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel.

Mr. Rangel "thinks it's a great idea," said a spokesman for the New York Democrat. "He wants to hear different opinions because Congress functions best when you have more views expressed. Working for that middle ground is one of his priorities."

Heritage is not alone in thinking that some longtime adversaries of Democrats can have an effect on legislation in Congress next year. Advocacy groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business (NFIB), say that potential alliances between some of the Democrats' newly enlarged centrist blocs, including the "Blue Dogs" and the so-called "New Democrats," could open up opportunities for them to move some legislation in their direction.

"Because both parties now will want to take accomplishments to the voters two years from now, it's going to force a new way of doing business in Washington," said Jay Timmons, senior vice president for policy and government relations at the National Association of Manufacturers.

"We're the eternal optimists here. We believe there is a chance to move a free-market, smaller-government agenda forward in this environment. Many of the incoming [Democratic] members won their seats on the appeal that I would characterize as one of limited government," said Michael Franc, Heritage's vice president of government relations.

"They talked of no tax increases on the middle class, they wanted a balanced budget, and they embraced the pay-as-you-go idea that, if you focus on the spending side, can be a wonderful discipline," Mr. Franc said. "Conservatives should not approach this new arrangement with an immediate confrontational posture."

The NFIB, the small-business lobby, similarly expresses cautious optimism that it might be able to win some support in Congress for its agenda on health, tax and regulatory issues, but not on the Democrats' plans to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, which business groups say they have no chance of blocking.

"There are definitely challenges posed by the new Congress, but opportunities as well. You have a lot of new Democratic members who ran as moderates or conservatives who are on record saying we need to do something for small businesses," said NFIB chief spokesman Michael Donohue.

Bruce Josten, chief lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, says that on some issues such as spending, the more centrist House Blue Dog Democrat caucus, which claims 44 members next year, and the New Democrat Coalition, which will have 62 members, could be a formidable force on key votes.

"How many Blue Dog Democrats do you know who subscribe to [incoming House Speaker] Nancy Pelosi's views? None would be the answer," Mr. Josten said.

But veteran tax-cut lobbyist Grover Norquist, who heads Americans for Tax Reform, doesn't see much chance that Democrats will help pass any of the conservative agenda.

"Tort reform? Nothing the trial lawyers do not want will pass. Labor-law reform?" Mr. Norquist said. "The unions own the Blue Dogs. They will vote against free-trade agreements because the unions tell them to. If you can't cross the trial lawyers or labor unions, on what issues are these Democrats supposed to be moderate?"

10 Questions For Charles Rangel (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, December 4, 2006

Outspoken and influential, New York Congressman Charles Rangel is set to become chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee when Democrats take control of the House in January. A co-founder of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rangel, 76, spoke to TIME's Perry Bacon Jr. about his ongoing push for a military draft, whether he would back Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama for President and the controversy over the N word.

Is your push for a draft purely symbolic, or do you really think there should be a draft?

If we had had a draft, those who decided to have an elective--rather than defensive--strike against Iraq would not have received public or congressional support. When you're talking about war and you have no concept of anyone being lost in your family or your community, then it's human nature to be more prone to say, "Let's fight, I'll hold your coat." I'm serious about it. As of now, I would be satisfied to have a discussion.

The Ways and Means Committee oversees Social Security legislation. Most people say you'll either have to raise taxes or cut benefits to keep the system solvent. Do you agree?

I guess you would call extending the [retirement] age reducing benefits, but it's a very complex problem. One of the difficulties about Social Security is that if you start talking about the pain, then you lose the political will.

Whom would you support for President: Hillary Clinton, whom you backed for Senator when she was still First Lady, or Barack Obama?

He ought to get out there, test his wings and see whether there's any solid foundation for his popularity. No question--this is the time to do it. [But] right now, it would be Hillary Clinton, only because I know so much more about her.

Do you think an African American can be elected President?

I have reason to believe Colin Powell could have been President, yes.

Recently in New York City, an unarmed black man was shot to death by police officers who thought he might have a weapon. Why do you think incidents like this keep happening?

DOJ_NMG_0101574

The police are addicted to a contagious need to expel rounds of deadly bullets. They cannot control themselves because they see their fellow companions do it. They don't carry the same standard they would in more affluent communities. Race only plays a role because there are more blacks and Hispanics in poor communities.

Did you hear about Michael Richards' comments, in which he repeatedly used the N word? Is that the comedian?

Yes. So many of these comedians are obscene that I would have no idea whether they were serious or it was part of their act. It was a terrible insult to African Americans, but so many things on TV are so insulting.

Lots of black rappers use the N word. Should they not?

I should think it would be a word that nobody would use.

What did you think of the ad about Tennessee Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr., which had a white woman saying, "Harold, call me"?

While it did not seem to me to be as devastating and as racist as I would think in first reviewing it, after having Southerners--white and black--share with me the deep-seated fear whites [have] of black men and white women, I then came to the conclusion that the ad meant to do harm from racial implication.

Last year you compared George W. Bush with Bull Connor, the civil rights--era police chief whose name is synonymous with racism. Do you regret that?

I have not chosen my words as carefully as I would want. It was my hope that, as Connor's act awakened Americans to racist policies that existed in the South, [after] the apparent lack of concern with Katrina, Americans would look at the question of poverty. I have been terribly disappointed.

Four blacks will chair committees in the new Congress, Massachusetts has its first African-American Governor, and Obama is a possible '08 candidate. Is this a new era for African Americans in politics?

There have been gradual increases in opportunity. Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell are examples as to the progress that has been made politically. But in terms of economic advancements, it has been far slower than the political advancements. It's hard to say it's a new era.

FDA Project At White Oak Right On Track (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Four buildings are up and occupied. Three more buildings are under construction. Another is on the drawing board. Three other projects are on a waiting list.

The headquarters consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration, on 130 acres in suburban Maryland, appears on track to become one of the government's most successful construction and development projects.

"The project is going beautifully," Betsy L. Bretz, chairman of Labquest, a community group that has kept close watch over the site. "They have been good neighbors, and they are doing this responsibly."

When the project is completed, probably in 2011, about 7,700 FDA employees and contract workers will be located at White Oak, off New Hampshire Avenue in Silver Spring. Congress estimates the General Services Administration, which owns the property and is managing the construction, will spend about $900 million on buildings and site improvement.

Dave Dwyer, FDA's director for the headquarters consolidation, calls the project "the future of the FDA" because it will bring together scientists, researchers and safety experts who have been scattered in more than 40 buildings across Maryland and the District, often in offices in poor condition.

The project was authorized by Congress in 1990 and picked up some steam five years later, when the Defense Department began a round of base closings and decided to close a Navy laboratory for naval surface warfare research at White Oak.

"Everyone had a million ideas of what to do with the property," Bretz said.

But community and redevelopment representatives soon focused on the FDA, she said, largely because residents thought the nation needed a world-class complex where FDA employees could more easily collaborate and share ideas on how to protect Americans' health.

DOJ_NMG_0101575

The decision to recruit the FDA to White Oak set off a decade-long struggle to obtain funding for planning, design and construction. Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski and Rep. Steny H. Ho yer, both Maryland Democrats with seats on appropriations committees, began making the case for Congress to fund the project, joined by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.), other members of Congress and state officials. Local officials, in particular, were eager to retain a well-paid and highly educated workforce and hoped the FDA would attract high-tech companies to the Route 29 corridor near White Oak.

Funding for the project came in fits and starts, as is often the case when Congress has competing budget priorities. For example, the fiscal 2007 appropriation for White Oak -- $178.5 million -- is on hold until Congress determines how to revive spending bills that have stalled in the lame-duck session.

Still, the project has gained momentum through the years.

In October 2003, the FDA opened the first White Oak building -- a four-story life sciences lab for 100 employees that includes drug evaluation and research facilities. That was followed by the opening of two office buildings in August 2005 for 1,600 employees.

The latest opening came in September -- a "shared-use" building available to all employees. It features a conference center for large meetings, a dozen conference rooms, a consolidated library, a cafeteria, fitness center and credit union.

At the end of March, Dwyer said, the FDA plans to open an engineering and physics lab. Two other office buildings have been scheduled for openings in March 2008 and May 2009.

Also in the works are offices for the FDA commissioner and the agency's office of regulatory affairs, with a construction contract scheduled to be granted at the end of September. Starting in fiscal 2008, the FDA hopes to win congressional support for funding of two more life sciences labs and another office building.

"GSA is building on time and on budget," Dwyer said. "It's as good a GSA team as I have ever worked with."

Shapour Ebadi, a 20-year GSA employee, has been the GSA's project executive since 1994. Dwyer, who has nearly 30 years of experience in construction and facilities management, joined the project as the FDA representative in February.

The two agencies are looking at how to address traffic issues that seem likely to arise as more employees relocate to White Oak in coming months. To help employees who prefer mass transit and to hold down traffic, FDA has started a shuttle service to Metro subway stops and to FDA offices in Rockville, about 10 miles away. The GSA is looking for alternative entrances to the White Oak site in hopes of easing traffic at the primary entrance on New Hampshire Avenue.

After all, White Oak will probably be the FDA's home for several decades. "As best we can," Dwyer said, "we are trying to think for now, and for a minute from now."

High-Fived (WP)

By Darragh Johnson

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

"Helloooo, Dolly!" sang the chorus of photographers, their moods as jubilant as Dolly Parton's brisk bounce down the red carpet at the State Department dinner on the eve of last night's Kennedy Center Honors gala.

Except -- the country music star wasn't slowing down. She was supposed to slow down. And stop.

"Not too far," one of the photographers cautioned.

"No!" the country star retorted, finally halting and leaning forward flirtatiously. "He said to the 'X' " -- she pointed to the black tape under her heels -- "and that's the 'X.' " The lower half of her face cracked into a wide Joker's grin, the upper half remaining frozen as a photo. Flashes popped. Sparks flared from the sequins of her black velvet dress.

When Parton heard she would be one of the 29th annual Kennedy Center Honors recipients, joining musical theater composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, conductor Zubin Mehta, Motown legend Smokey Robinson and filmmaker Steven Spielberg, she "immediately went to work on the clothes," she said, telling her designer, Robert Bahar, "I have to look good, and I have to look like me. I want to look like Frederick's of Dollywood."

She calls her very low-cut dress and its accompanying bolero "my version of a tuxedo, with boobs out."

DOJ_NMG_0101576

This was upstairs, just past the State Department receiving line where Condoleezza Rice -- emerald gown, big smile -- was welcoming everyone, with the honorees basking in this clubby, intimate and exclusive venue where the arts world's biggest stars and Washington's brightest bulbs celebrate together on the night before the grand and much more public gala.

Behind Parton was Aretha Franklin, who had just plucked three egg rolls from a passing tray and was drinking a Coke. Her fur wrap was flung across her high-backed chair. "Oh, Ms. Franklin!" squeaked Steven Spielberg's wife, Kate Capshaw, as she walked past. "How are you?"

Even the stars get starry-eyed at this black-tie, silk-gowned, stiletto-heeled, double-take-whiplash-inducing affair: There's George Lucas and Itzhak Perlman and Ted Kennedy and Barbara Walters and Michele Lee (from "Knots Landing") and Shania Twain.

Shania Twain! Zubin Mehta's young granddaughter Shenaya was excited to meet her, telling the crossover country star that they share the same name. Which prompted Twain to ask the granddaughter of the former director of the New York Philharmonic if she was named after her, a songstress whose hit list includes "Man! I Feel Like a Woman." Shenaya Chinoy said she answered, after a brief pause: No.

The star-studdery was everywhere. Natasha Richardson confessed that although the formal dinner -- crab cakes with avocado salsa, rack of lamb, chestnut potato puree, corn bread plus three wines (all fabulous) and, for dessert, chocolate coffee baked Alaska (not fabulous) and demitasse -- is a quintessentially grown-up evening, "it's making me feel like a 15-year-old, and I want to go around with my autograph book."

Franklin had come to celebrate, she said, "my oldest, dearest friend" -- Smokey Robinson, who grew up a block away from her in Detroit, where they were "childhood friends, sandbox friends." Back then, said the Queen of Soul and 1994 Honors recipient, "we sang a lot. People in Detroit like to sing. There was a group on every corner: Everyone aspired to be a singer." She took another bite of egg roll and said, "The way they play basketball now is the way we came up singing."

Robinson's hair curls around his face like a corona, and his turquoise eyes are as mesmerizing as his voice. "In one word," he said, "this is awesome." Later in the evening he was lauded by Richardson: "When Smokey sang, people got together. Babies were made." Or, as Motown Records founder Berry Gordy puts it, "He has touched people in places they had never been touched before."

Spielberg, describing himself as "ebullient," said, "When I got the official letter, it came to my office. I had them read it to me three times to make sure there wasn't a typo. So few filmmakers have been honored."

The drinks were served in big goblets, like fishbowls on skinny stems, and Webber was having trouble with his, getting jostled by the throngs. "It's great to have an American award like this," he said, then disappeared into the jostlers.

Right behind him, Mehta -- this year's other non-American honoree (he was born in Mumbai and is, he said, "still Indian") -- was reaching out as his dear friend Elaine Wolfensohn walked past and touched her sumptuous stole.

"This is from my country!" he exulted, rubbing the fabric lightly between his fingers. "Wow! Wow! Wow! It's super pashmina." He invited us to touch it, too -- but "without the pen," he admonished sternly. The shawl was softer than a puppy's ear, and as for the embroidery: "Just look at this work!" he said. "People go blind doing this."

"You have a good eye," Wolfensohn said and stroked Mehta's cheek. Her husband, Jim Wolfensohn, former president of the World Bank, would be doing Mehta's toast later in the evening.

At the far end of the room, Liam Neeson asked a waiter to bring him a glass of pinot noir. A tall and peevish presence, dressed like a funeral director, he was telling us he couldn't talk about Spielberg. Just listen to the four-minute speech I'll be giving tomorrow, he said. (It is a speech, by the way, that in rehearsal focused a lot on Neeson. Just saying.)

We asked about "Schindler's List." Is there really anything about Spielberg that he hasn't already written into a short speech?

"Schindler's List," Neeson said, almost with a sneer, "is not an anecdotal movie. It's really not. But we were a band of brothers." And we were dismissed.

Across the room, Tom Hanks was talking opera with Verdi baritone Sherrill Milnes -- comparing Shakespeare's "Othello" with Verdi's "Otello" -- and exchanging greetings with Ted Kennedy -- "We're going to be sitting at the same table," Hanks told the senator -- then took a moment to describe Spielberg as ("and I mean this in the best of all possible ways") "a machine. . . . He's never doing anything but movies. That's the way his DNA was created."

By 11 p.m., after the honorees received their medals, it was time to take the "class picture" (professional photographer unhappy that everyone in the room was snapping, too, messing up his flash) and get into the limos.

Perhaps the meaning of the whole night -- the whole weekend, and of the arts themselves -- was best summed up by Alison Krauss, who toasted Parton and made her cry when she said: "Dolly, you make me want to be somebody."

Artists Lauded At Kennedy Center Gala (NYT)

By Holli Chmela

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — Though small-town Locust Ridge, Tenn., and big-city Detroit had little in common in 1940s America, each produced a singer who became much more than a hometown favorite. By the late 1950s and early 1960s, Tennessee's Dolly Parton had burst on the scene as a bubbly teenage country singer while Detroit's William Robinson Jr., as Smokey Robinson, had crooned his way onto the radio with a smooth style and soulful lyrics — and nearly a half century later both are still building musical legacies.

On Sunday, Ms. Parton, Mr. Robinson, the conductor Zubin Mehta, the musical theater composer Andrew Lloyd Webber and the filmmaker Steven Spielberg were recognized for their lifetime contributions to the arts at the Kennedy Center Honors here.

"This year we honor five extraordinary international artists whose abundant contributions to their fields are remarkable," said Stephen A. Schwarzman, chairman of the board of trustees of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. "They have transformed the culture of our country and of the world."

The Kennedy Center Honors, in its 29th year, is the paramount event on the Washington cultural calendar, with events at the State Department and the White House and a concluding program at the Kennedy Center. The program will be broadcast on CBS on Dec. 26. "To be included among these people — Smokey, Dolly, Zubin Mehta, Andrew Lloyd Webber — it's really an honor," Mr. Spielberg said. "It's the closest thing to an American knighthood. We're all feeling a gentle sword touching our shoulders tonight."

On Saturday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was the host at a State Department dinner, where medals were presented to this year's honorees. Among the 250 guests were the soul singer Aretha Franklin, a 1994 honoree; the violinist Itzhak Perlman, a 2003 honoree; the actor Tom Hanks; the country singer Shania Twain; Representative Nancy Pelosi, the incoming House speaker; and Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts.

An accomplished pianist and self-proclaimed "lover of the arts," Ms. Rice said she went to a Smokey Robinson concert on her first date — chaperoned by her father because, "I suppose he thought there was too much power in the soul of Smokey Robinson."

"Arts flourish most when they happen in a democracy," Ms. Rice said. "The arts give expression to human spirit and give expression to human freedom."

Mr. Kennedy said the first secretary of state, "Thomas Jefferson, and Secretary Rice both knew the power of the arts to bring people together." He added, "Arts connect us with our history and inspire our future."

Ms. Parton is one of the most honored country music stars of all time, with seven Grammy Awards, nine Country Music Association Awards and a National Medal of Arts. Mr. Robinson is lauded as a primary influence in rhythm and blues, at the Motown record label where he recorded dozens of Top 40 hits with the Miracles and as a solo artist. Mr. Mehta's career as a conductor of Western classical music includes his tenure with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, with which he has conducted more than 1,600 performances on five continents. In his 13 years at the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Mehta conducted more than 1,000 concerts, including a 10-day tour of the Soviet Union in 1988.

Mr. Lloyd Webber is often referred to as the Shakespeare of his time with musicals like "Jesus Christ Superstar," "Evita" "Cats" and "The Phantom of the Opera." Mr. Lloyd Webber was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in 1992. He won an Oscar for "You Must Love Me," a song written for the 1996 film version of "Evita." Mr. Spielberg is among Hollywood's most successful and influential directors, and a three-time Academy Award winner who won Oscars for best director and picture for "Schindler's List" and best director for "Saving Private Ryan." He directed three of the highest-grossing films of their time: "Jaws," in 1975, "E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial," in 1982, and "Jurassic Park," in 1993.

President and Mrs. Bush attended the Kennedy Center program on Sunday evening after a reception at the White House for the honorees, the members of the Artists Committee who nominated them and the Kennedy Center board.

Artists Get A Star-studded Salute (USAT)

By Karen Thomas

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The sounds of country, Motown, Broadway and classical music combined with Hollywood star power in the nation's capital Sunday for the Kennedy Center Honors.

Stars from across the entertainment industry turned out. Among them: Tom Hanks, Liam Neeson, Reese Witherspoon, Aretha Franklin, India Arie, Jessica Simpson, Shania Twain, Reba McEntire and Josh Groban.

They gathered to pay tribute to director Steven Spielberg, country's Dolly Parton, Motown's Smokey Robinson, Broadway composer Andrew Lloyd Webber and conductor Zubin Mehta. The stars joined President Bush and first lady Laura Bush for the 29th awards ceremony, in which the Kennedy Center recognizes artists for their lifetime contribution to the arts and to American culture. The two-hour gala in the center's opera house was taped to air Dec. 26 on CBS (9 p.m. ET/PT).

Witherspoon and Simpson were there to honor fellow blonde Parton. Simpson relied heavily on cue cards to perform 9 to 5 and missed a few lines.

"Dolly, you make me so nervous I can't even sing the words right," Simpson said before leaving the stage.

Witherspoon fared a little better with the same Parton tune just moments earlier. The Walk the Line Oscar winner warbled several lines of 9 to 5 a cappella before giggling, "Someone else will sing this better later."

The show featured plenty of musical numbers. Parton also was celebrated by a duet from American Idol's Carrie Underwood and Kenny Rogers, who sang Islands in the Stream.

Another duo, Hanks and Neeson, paid tribute to Spielberg. Hanks introduced five World War II veterans and a Holocaust survivor during the show. Renee Firestone, the Holocaust survivor, emphasized the importance of the work of the director of Schindler's List and Saving Private Ryan. "Thank you, Steven, for what you have done for history. You are our hero."

Webber said the Kennedy Center award was better than a Grammy or an Oscar because "it's not connected to any of the industry." His former wife, Sarah Brightman, introduced the segment honoring him. When Broadway star Betty Buckley paid tribute by singing Memory from Webber's Cats, the audience responded with a standing ovation.

During the segment honoring Robinson, which was introduced by Franklin, Cee-Lo Green of Gnarls Barkley and Arie sang Going to a Go-Go, and Sam Moore and Jonny Lang performed Tracks of My Tears.

Robinson spoke earlier about receiving the honor: "It means everything to me," because the award is "for your impact on society."

Two More Years (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

At a reception following the midterm election, President Bush approached Senator-elect James Webb.

"How's your boy?" asked Mr. Bush.

"I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," replied Mr. Webb, whose son, a Marine lance corporal, is risking his life in Mr. Bush's war of choice.

"That's not what I asked you," the president snapped. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," said Mr. Webb.

Good for him. We need people in Washington who are willing to stand up to the bully in chief. Unfortunately, and somewhat mysteriously, they're still in short supply.

DOJ_NMG_0101579

You can understand, if not condone, the way the political and media establishment let itself be browbeaten by Mr. Bush in his post-9/11 political prime. What's amazing is the extent to which insiders still cringe before a lame duck with a 60 percent disapproval rating.

Look at what seems to have happened to the Iraq Study Group, whose mission statement says that it would provide an "independent assessment." If press reports are correct, the group did nothing of the sort. Instead, it watered down its conclusions and recommendations, trying to come up with something Mr. Bush wouldn't reject out of hand.

In particular, says Newsweek, the report "will set no timetables or call for any troop reductions." All it will do is "suggest that the president could, not should, begin to withdraw forces in the vaguely defined future."

And all this self-abasement is for naught. Senior Bush aides, Newsweek tells us, are "dismissive, even condescending" toward James Baker, the Bush family consigliere who is the dominant force in the study group, and the report. Of course they are. That's how bullies always treat their hangers-on.

Even now, it seems, the wise men of Washington can't bring themselves to face up to two glaringly obvious truths.

The first is that Americans are fighting and dying in Iraq for no reason.

It's true that terrible things will happen when U.S. forces withdraw. Mr. Bush was attacking a straw man when he mocked those who think we can make a "graceful exit" from Iraq. Everyone I know realizes that the civil war will get even worse after we're gone, and that there will probably be a bloody bout of ethnic cleansing that effectively partitions the country into hostile segments.

But nobody — not even Donald Rumsfeld, it turns out — thinks we're making progress in Iraq. So the same terrible things that would happen if we withdrew soon will still happen if we delay that withdrawal for two, three or more years. The only difference is that we'll sacrifice many more American lives along the way.

The second truth is that the war will go on all the same, unless something or someone forces Mr. Bush to change course.

During his recent trip to Vietnam, Mr. Bush was asked whether there were any lessons from that conflict for Iraq. His response: "We'll succeed unless we quit."

It was a bizarre answer given both the history of the Vietnam War and the facts on the ground in Iraq, but it makes perfect sense given what we know about Mr. Bush's character. He has never been willing to own up to mistakes, however trivial. If he were to accept the failure of his adventure in Iraq, he would be admitting, at least implicitly, to having made the mother of all mistakes.

So Mr. Bush will keep sending other men's children off to fight his war. And he'll always insist that Iraq would have been a great victory if only his successors had shared his steely determination.

Does this mean that we're doomed to at least two more years of bloody futility? Not necessarily. Last month the public delivered a huge vote of no confidence in Mr. Bush and his war. He's still the commander in chief, but the new majority in Congress can put a lot of pressure on him to at least begin a withdrawal.

I'm worried, however, that Democrats may have counted on the Iraq Study Group to provide them with political cover. Now that the study group has apparently wimped out, will the Democrats do the same?

Well, here's a question for those who might be tempted, yet again, to shy away from a confrontation with Mr. Bush over Iraq: How do you ask a man to be the last to die for a bully's ego?

Why Darker Clouds Might Eclipse Sunny Unemployment Forecasts (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

From a bird's eye view, the job market seems to be humming as the unemployment rate hovers at a five-year low. Indeed, Federal Reserve officials have cited it as a sign of vigor that could stoke inflation.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said last week that, outside of the auto and housing sectors, U.S. economic growth remains "solid," and that the tight labor market remains a top concern because it could prod some companies to raise prices. The unemployment rate fell to 4.4% in October.

However, other signals indicate the employment picture could darken. Initial claims for jobless benefits recently jumped to their highest level in more than a year. Payroll growth has eased this year to a monthly average of 147,000 net new jobs, from last year's 165,000. Just 92,000 jobs were created in October.

Data released Friday by the Institute for Supply Management show that the decline in manufacturing employment extends beyond the two suffering housing and auto sectors. Its employment index slipped to 49.2 in November from 50.8 in October. Readings below 50 indicate a contraction.

Question of the Day:2 Is the job market stronger or weaker than it was a year ago?

The ISM said employment fell last month in five of the 18 industries it tracks. Seven others reported flat employment. A separate report released last week showed durable-goods orders plunged in October, a sign business investment could be weakening.

The Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group that tracks consumer confidence, said 22.4% of those polled last month considered jobs "hard to get," up slightly from October. Along with other indicators, that suggests "a loss of momentum in the overall job market," said Gail Fosler, the board's chief economist.

Those are the kind of signs bond-market investors and some economists have seized upon to dispute the Fed's upbeat assessment. Yields on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note on Friday fell to close to their lowest levels of the year, a sign bond investors expect weaker growth next year.

Futures-market traders raised to roughly 74% Friday from 51% earlier in the day the odds that the Fed would cut short-term interest rates by April, even though the Fed has suggested its choice is whether to raise, not whether to cut.

Economists say the health of the economy and job market through next year hinges mainly on how quickly the auto and housing sectors can pare the excess inventories that are forcing them to cut production, and the effect of the housing market's slump on other sectors. They will scrutinize the November jobs report, due out Friday, for insight.

Tens of thousands of workers have already felt the effects of the auto and housing slowdowns. Roughly 72,000 hourly employees accepted buyouts from General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. and auto-parts maker Delphi Corp. GM and Ford said Friday they will cut North American auto production in the first quarter. Some of the nation's largest homebuilders have announced major job cuts this year.

Ed McKelvey, a senior economist at Goldman Sachs, projects monthly job growth will slow to an average of 75,000 next year. He expects the unemployment rate will climb to roughly 5% by the end of 2007, an increase sharp enough to elevate the risk of recession.

The October employment report, which showed the construction sector cut 26,000 jobs, "is just a drop in the bucket," said Mr. McKelvey, who anticipates that from 250,000 to 500,000 construction jobs could be slashed in the next six to 12 months. "The housing weakness has some distance to go," he said. "We're entering a phase where the spillover effect onto the job market and consumer spending are the biggest risks to the economy."

Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics, says the economy will be in recession next year.

To be sure, other economists say the job market is healthy and that indicators hinting at trouble can change direction quickly. The rise in initial claims for unemployment benefits in the week ended Nov. 25 might have been due to seasonal variations common during the holiday season, the Labor Department said. Still, it was the highest level since October 2005, in the wake of the Gulf Coast hurricanes. Excluding the post-hurricane period, initial claims hit their highest level in 2½ years.

Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson ICAP, says the U.S. labor market should be fine. The housing and auto sectors are working down excess inventories this quarter, and that shouldn't have a major impact on other sectors beyond winter, he says. Moreover, large revisions boosted the estimate of August and September payroll growth, which suggests the job market is "generally in very good shape," Mr. Crandall says.

Still, Mr. Crandall says he will keep a keen eye on the November unemployment report. "Any downside surprises in Friday's report would have a greater-than-usual impact on our expectation" for economic growth, he says.

Cracks Widen In U.S. Economy (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

Economic weakness spread beyond the stricken housing and auto sectors last month, with reports showing U.S. manufacturing shrank for the first time in 31/2 years and construction dropped the most since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

U.S. industries broadly cut back production, adding to factory shutdowns caused by deepening recessions in auto- and housing-related industries such as wood, furniture and appliances, according to a report yesterday from the Institute for Supply Management.

An unexpected decline in construction of offices and other business facilities in October added to a record string of drops in housing construction of more than 1 percent in the last seven months to cause the biggest drop in construction spending in six years, the Commerce Department said yesterday.

"Industry is clearly going through a rough patch" that few anticipated, said Daniel Jester, analyst at Moody's Economy.com. Outside housing and autos, the Federal Reserve had expected business to pick up rather than decline this fall, supporting a so-called "soft landing" in the economy.

The weakness in manufacturing started with autos, was compounded by housing, and recently has spread to big-ticket capital goods such as technology and telecommunications equipment, Mr. Jester said. In addition, a broad array of manufacturers are cutting back because of an unexpected buildup of inventories this fall that has to be worked off, he said.

"It is clear that several segments of the industrial base have weakened measurably over the past few months. This may now be spilling over to heretofore healthy segments related to business investment," he said.

"The signal of declining production should not come as a surprise," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance. "Two major manufacturing markets are declining -- motor vehicles and housing -- and many other industries are trying to adjust inventories to adjust for a period of much slower growth ahead in 2007."

The "awful" collapse of the construction market in October means that sector is likely to be a major drag on economic growth for the fourth straight quarter in the final quarter of 2006, according to Economy.com estimates.

David Wyss, economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., noted that the downbeat tone of recent economic news contrasts sharply with upbeat assessments this week coming from Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and other Fed officials. Mr. Wyss said there is cause for worry.

"Weak retail sales and a drop in consumer confidence in November create worries about the consumer," he said, adding that "home sales and prices are dropping and the manufacturing sector appears to be retreating for the first time in over three years."

While Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials maintain that the economy can avoid recession even with the critical housing and car industries in decline, many economists disagree.

"Housing slowdowns tend to lead recessions rather than result from them," said John Makin, economist with the American Enterprise Institute. "An annual drop in the growth rate of residential investment of more than 10 percent has coincided with a recession five of the seven times it has occurred since 1965."

Housing, the biggest contributor to a halving of economic growth this year, plummeted at an 11 percent rate in the spring, 18 percent in the summer, and an estimated 9 percent in the fall.

"The intensity of the fall in U.S. residential investment during the middle two quarters of 2006 is approaching potential recession territory," Mr. Makin said, but whether a downturn occurs depends on whether the Fed changes its stance and starts to cut interest rates.

Interest rates declined in the bond market yesterday in expectation that the Fed will reverse course and start cutting rates by March.

Roger M. Kubarych, economist with Unicredit Markets, said the Fed will reconsider its position at a meeting later this month. Mr. Bernanke signaled that the central bank is starting to become concerned about the housing market in a speech this week that for the first time designated a housing collapse as the biggest risk to economic growth.

"It seems the Fed is beginning to get nervous about the economic outlook," he said.

Who's Afraid Of A Higher Minimum Wage? (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Nomey Druskin, manager of the Rainbow Hair Designers at the White Flint Mall, employs six shampooers. Mostly Hispanic immigrants, they are paid at the low end of the wage scale. Druskin should be particularly interested in the Democrats' intention to raise the minimum wage when they take over Congress, right?

She's not. Druskin pays her shampooers at the North Bethesda salon a base rate of more than $8 an hour. That's higher than the federal minimum wage ($5.15), higher than Maryland's minimum wage ($6.15) and higher than what the Democrats are proposing federally ($7.25). In fact, the median hourly rate for all shampooers in the Bethesda-Gaithersburg area, according to federal statistics, is $7.48 -- above all mandated minimums.

Druskin said the shampooers at her 30-year-old salon earn what they earn -- plus tips -- for a few reasons. First and foremost, it would be inhumane to pay them less, she said, given the cost of living in the Washington region. And if she didn't pay them a decent salary, she couldn't attract good, stable help. The shampooers wouldn't smile as easily at their customers. The hair wouldn't be washed just right, and the business, which serves a high-end clientele, would suffer.

"We have to pay them enough to make them happy and for them to live happily," Druskin said. "It's a domino effect from the bottom up. We want the clients to be happy."

Druskin's experience suggests that increasing the federal minimum wage might be irrelevant for many of this region's workers and employers, given the extent to which market forces -- high demand for labor, low unemployment and the lofty cost of living -- have already raised the floor for hourly salaries. According to federal data, the median hourly pay for all workers in the Washington-Arlington-Alexandria area is $19.14 -- about 72 percent higher than Lubbock, Tex., where it is $11.13.

Dressing-room attendants make about $8.41 an hour here. Photographic processing machine operators: $10.29. Dishwashers: $8.05. Lifeguards: $7.98.

"Raising the minimum wage won't really matter for us," Druskin said. "We are already above that."

So are most other big job centers around the country, with only about 520,000 people nationwide making the federal minimum of $5.15 an hour, a rate that hasn't gone up in a decade and has led some 28 states and the District to pass their own increases.

"When you let the minimum wage fall as low as it's fallen, it becomes almost irrelevant," said Harry J. Holzer, professor of public policy at Georgetown University and a former chief economist for the Labor Department. "This is an attempt to make it somewhat more meaningful, but not so meaningful that it destroys a lot of jobs."

While the number who make the federal minimum wage is minuscule compared with the total workforce of 132 million, economists think that several million workers would be affected by a change in the law. The Economic Policy Institute, a Washington think tank, estimates that the number of workers making at least $5.15 an hour but less than the Democrat-proposed $7.25 will be 5.6 million by 2009 -- when the proposed increase would be fully phased in.

Then there are the workers who already make $7.25 an hour, or a little more. Liana Fox, an economic analyst for the institute, thinks these workers would also see a small bump in wages to keep the pecking order. The institute puts about 7.4 million workers in that category. That means 13 million people, or about 10 percent of the workforce, could be affected by an increase.

Of those workers, about 79 percent are 20 or older, the institute estimates. Forty-six percent work in sales or service. About 61 percent are white; 59 percent are women.

Locally, about 450,000 workers in Virginia -- 13 percent of the state's workforce -- could be affected, according to an EPI analysis. The total in Maryland is 116,000 workers, 4.4 percent of the workforce. An analysis for the District was not possible; the sample size was too small.

DOJ_NMG_0101583

Economists and analysts for years have argued about the possible negative effects on the workforce of raising the minimum wage. Some, like Fox and Holzer, think those would be negligible, given that the dollar amount of the increase is not great. Also, Fox said, "this is such a small fraction of the total labor force."

But other economists say that raising the minimum wage would lead employers to reduce their staffs, eliminating jobs for the least-skilled employees. The National Restaurant Association recently released a poll in which 41 percent of family dining and casual restaurant operators said they would cut jobs because of increases in the minimum wage.

Jim Wordsworth, who owns the steakhouse J.R.'s Stockyards Inn in Tysons Corner, starts his dishwashers at $7.20 an hour, and some make more than that. He said he wouldn't cut jobs if the minimum wage went up, but he wouldn't add any.

Would he increase salaries for those already making more than the new minimum?

"If I'm forced to by the market," he said. "I respond to market conditions."

Carlos Castro is another area employer who said he won't cut workers if the minimum wage goes up. As the owner of Todos Supermarkets in Alexandria and Woodbridge, he pays a starting wage of $7 an hour for cashiers, stockers, meat cutters and cooks -- well above the $5.15 minimum in Virginia.

"You just can't get by on minimum wage these days, and I don't want to force my employees to have to get a second job to support themselves," Castro said.

Castro said that if Congress increases the federal minimum wage, he will probably raise his pay to keep it above that -- precisely what the EPI anticipates happening around the country.

"My philosophy is to pay a little more than at other places to make sure we get better workers," he said.

New U.S. Rules Raise Retention Requirements For E-documents (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. companies will need to know more about where they store e-mails, instant messages and other electronic documents generated by their employees in the event they are sued because of changes in federal rules that took effect Friday, legal experts say.

The changes, approved by the Supreme Court's administrative arm in April after a five-year review, require companies and other parties involved in federal litigation to produce "electronically stored information" as part of discovery, the process by which both sides share evidence before a trial.

Federal and state courts have increasingly been requiring the production of such evidence in individual cases. The new rules clarify that the data will be required in federal cases.

Under the new rules, an information technology employee who routinely copies over a backup computer tape could be committing "virtual shredding" once a lawsuit has been filed, said Alvin F. Lindsay, a partner in the Miami office of Hogan & Hartson whose legal expertise is in technology and litigation.

Companies still could routinely purge their archives if the data aren't relevant to cases the companies have pending or expect to face, though specific sectors such as financial services remain governed by other data-retention rules.

The new rules make it more important for firms to know what electronic information they have and where, especially because of a provision that requires lawyers to provide information much earlier than before on where clients' data are stored and how accessible they are.

Besides e-mail, companies will need to know about things more difficult to track, such as digital photos of work sites on employee cellphones and information on removable memory cards, said James Wright, director of electronic discovery at Halliburton Co.

There are hundreds of "e-discovery vendors," and these businesses are raking in about $1.6 billion in 2006, Wright said. That could double in 2007, he added.

Although electronic searches can help narrow the amount of data, Lindsay said, some high-paid lawyers still will have to sift through casual e-mails to find relevant information.

DOJ_NMG_0101584

But Martha Dawson, a partner at Seattle-based law firm Preston Gates & Ellis who specializes in electronic discovery, said companies would not have to alter how they retain their electronic documents. Rather, she said, they will have to do an "inventory of their IT system" to know better where the documents are.

As Jeb Bush Leaves Office, Big Role Awaits Him As Party Power Broker (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- Republicans pondering a political shift to the middle after their losses in midterm elections might consider the example of Florida Gov. Jeb Bush before setting their course.

Mr. Bush, who is stepping down this month because of term limits after eight years in office, has a track record as one of the nation's most socially and economically conservative politicians, yet he enjoys a nearly 65% approval rating in a state where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans. His brand of conservatism -- a mix of conservative political stands and activist governance -- has paid off for him in a way it hasn't for his brother in the White House.

His public support in a key swing state, his recent launch of a political advocacy group and the departure of two of his high-level aides to join the possible presidential campaign of another conservative governor suggest Mr. Bush will exert substantial influence over his party in the 2008 election and beyond.

At the least, he looks likely to be a significant power broker, despite the heavy toll the Iraq war has taken on his older brother's public-approval rating. The younger Bush has said he has no plans to seek the presidency in 2008. But he hasn't been as assertive in batting down persistent speculation among his closest backers that he might consider the No. 2 spot on a presidential ticket.

In a recent interview, he declined to rule out that possibility, adding that he wanted to dispel the myth that a hard political conservative has no future in politics. "There's a way to advocate conservatism that draws people toward the cause," Mr. Bush said. "I think I'm living proof of it."

Though he has declined to speculate on his political future beyond 2008, it is widely assumed that the 53-year-old governor would at least consider a White House run somewhere down the line. Among those fueling that assumption is President Bush, who told reporters last spring that his younger brother would make "a great president."

"Like a lot of other people, I've pushed him fairly hard about what he intends to do," President Bush said. "I don't think he knows, and if he did know he wasn't going to tell me because he's afraid I'd tell you."

While the governor has been vague about his own plans, there are few secrets about where his sympathies lie for 2008. Two of his chief political operatives have allied themselves with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is considering a presidential bid.

Mr. Romney is viewed as a social conservative, to the right of presumed Republican front-runner Sen. John McCain of Arizona. That dovetails with Mr. Bush's view of himself: "I'm conservative admittedly and unashamedly. I don't apologize for it."

Governors control the political levers that help deliver a state's vote to presidential candidates. But as Mr. Romney and other Republican hopefuls begin fanning out across the country in the next few months, they will find their network of statehouse allies has shrunk since President Bush won re-election in 2004.

The November elections left Democrats holding a majority of governorships for the first time in a dozen years. Democrats held on to big states in the East and Midwest and picked up Ohio, which has had a Republican governor for 16 years. In 2004, President Bush's narrow victory in Ohio was viewed as pivotal to his re-election.

Now, with electoral-vote heavyweights like Ohio, Pennsylvania, Michigan and New York in Democratic hands, a Republican victory in 2008 is likely to depend on Texas and Florida, states where the Bush name continues to play well.

Florida is considered a must-win for Republicans; shortly after Election Day, the party tapped Florida Sen. Mel Martinez to be its general chairman. Florida's importance for 2008 is clear to early presidential hopefuls: Messrs. McCain and Romney along with former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani all visited the state during the 2006 election season. Mr. Romney, as head of the Republican Governors Association, gave the state's party $1 million.

"This is the highest priority state for us," Mr. Romney said during his September visit. "There are a couple of others in that category, but nobody's higher than Florida."

During his tenure as governor, Mr. Bush, helped by a sympathetic Florida legislature, expanded the reach of his office. While most judges in Florida previously had been elected, the governor now controls many of the state's judicial appointments. In a recent interview, Mr. Bush referred to that system as "the proper way" to select judges.

Education has been a priority for Mr. Bush, and by nearly every account he has improved Florida schools without raising taxes. He also worked with the legislature to abolish the Board of Regents, which had overseen the state's public universities, and to unwind affirmative action on those campuses.

Along with improving Florida's bond rating, Mr. Bush also has managed to seize control of the state's budget from the legislature. "The governor now dominates the budget process," he said. "The drunken sailors can't take charge in Florida."

Moreover, the state's performance in providing disaster relief in the wake of hurricanes, particularly after four of them hit in the 2004 season, has drawn national accolades.

As governor, Mr. Bush has rarely shied from a political fight, though he hasn't always avoided embarrassing missteps. In 2002, after Florida voters passed a ballot proposal to limit class sizes, Mr. Bush, unaware that a reporter was present, told lawmakers he had "a couple of devious plans" for derailing the cap. Similarly, in a speech to the Florida Medical Association, he promised to "whack the trial lawyers," prompting critics to accuse him of basing his drive to reform the state's medical-malpractice regime more on political vengeance than sound policy.

In 2003, Mr. Bush dispatched Florida troopers to raid the hospice where brain-damaged Terri Schiavo lay in a "persistent vegetative state" and, over the objections of her husband, whisk her away to another hospital, where she could be fed through a tube. After Ms. Schiavo died in 2005 following a protracted court battle, Mr. Bush asked a state prosecutor to investigate her husband's role in the 1990 incident that caused Ms. Schiavo's condition. Mr. Bush later dropped the investigation, bringing to an end a series of moves that even people close to the governor considered risky political overreach.

For better or worse, such actions have shaped Mr. Bush's political reputation, says J.M. "Mac" Stipanovich, a Tallahassee lobbyist and onetime aide to former Republican Gov. Bob Martinez. "Jeb will always matter," Mr. Stipanovich said. "But he'll matter the most if the party decides to stay right-wing....Then Jeb would be a paragon, an exemplar for the party."

Mr. Bush also draws respect from the other side of the aisle. Jim Krog, a former chief of staff for Democratic Gov. Lawton Chiles, said Mr. Bush deserves accolades for changing one of the weakest governor seats in the country into one of the strongest. "I've never seen a governor as tireless as him, and I doubt I ever will again," Mr. Krog said. "He breathes it. He lives it. And you know what? Jeb Bush in the White House wouldn't be the worst thing that could happen."

Mr. Krog said that from a political handicapper's standpoint, Mr. Bush "could announce for president tomorrow, and make a helluva run at it." In a recent interview, Mr. Bush, formerly a commercial real-estate developer, said he intends to return to private life after leaving office. Mr. Bush said he probably will remain involved in issues that interest him, such as school vouchers.

Though Mr. Bush reiterated in a recent interview that he has no intention of running for president in 2008, he declined to rule out joining a presidential ticket -- which some political supporters have suggested he will consider. "I'm leaving," he said. "I don't know what I'm going to do."

Mr. Bush blames what he calls "political heroin addicts" for stirring up speculation about his future. In recent months and years, his name has been floated for National Football League commissioner, senator from Florida and president. Many of his closest supporters say he is almost certain to seek higher office down the line.

Adding to his appeal as a potential vice-presidential candidate, Mr. Bush has proved he can raise significant amounts of campaign money. In August he created a political advocacy group called Foundation for Florida's Future Action Fund, which state newspapers have reported already has amassed $2 million in cash. Mr. Bush has teased the media about the purpose of the organization, recently telling reporters: "The great thing about America is you can ask and I don't have to say."

GOP Governors Ponder Damage (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101586

MIAMI -- Some Republican governors meeting here wonder whether their party can realistically hope to regain majorities in Congress, the governors mansions and state legislatures, given that the unpopular Bush administration's lease on the management of government has two more years to run.

Republican governors, whose numbers went from a high of 32 in 1998 to 28 last year, generally agree that the reasons they are down to 22 after last month's elections are the Iraq war and the general tarnishing of their party's brand image.

"The war in Iraq hurt even at the gubernatorial level, even at the state level," Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said, agreeing with a point Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman made in a speech to the Republican Governors Association annual meeting that concluded over the weekend.

"National issues, especially the war in Iraq, had a profound impact on state races including campaigns for governor," Texas Gov. Rick Perry said. "Immigration was another powerful issue."

Mr. Barbour said he and other members of the Republican Governors Association were told in a closed meeting that polling showed that 20 percent of people who voted in the governors' races said Iraq was a major issue in their vote.

"Now, that's just hard to believe, that people would think about foreign policy and national-security issues and say that's what affects whom I vote for governor," Mr. Barbour said. "Because the governor has nothing to do with it. Yet people felt so strongly about the war, it colored their decisions about whom to vote for governor."

Governors said that in closed conference sessions, they heard reports from Republican pollsters and managers of state legislative campaigns who said their legislative candidates would go door to door, knock and say, "I'm running for the statehouse." The voter who answered the door would say, "Well, great, what are you going to do about Iraq?" The candidate would reply, "Well, I'm running for the statehouse and we don't have anything to do with that."

But the voter would simply repeat, "Well, what are you going to do about Iraq?"

The devastation of the midterm elections was beyond what many Republican governors had expected. Mr. Barbour said he didn't realize till he heard Mr. Mehlman say it in his speech that there is now only one Republican, Rep. Christopher Shays of Connecticut, among the 22 newly elected House members who hail from New England.

Some Republican strategists attending the conference said privately that they suspect it is, as one of them put it, "silly" to think about taking back the House and Senate and winning a majority of governorships with the Bush administration still in power.

"It goes back to that larger theme of trust," says South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, a limited-government conservative who won re-election on Nov. 7. "And once that trust is broken -- for whatever reasons, and a lot of it was very innocent -- I mean, the people didn't expect anything better from Clinton. He was viewed as a scoundrel from the start."

Mr. Sanford said, "It's more difficult for [President] Bush and [Vice President Dick] Cheney, given the high standing they held, and now there's this angst about Iraq -- and I think the economy is going to weaken."

Mr. Barbour sees the Democrats playing at least as big a role as the Bush administration in determining whether a Republican comeback is possible.

"It depends on what happens the next two years," he said. "The Democrats have offered nothing, and if they do what they offered -- nothing -- then the Republicans might come back in two years."

Yet Republican governors say that the war was not the only cause of the midterm meltdown.

"Republicans need to stop spending like Democrats because ultimately the people will elect the real thing if there is no difference," Mr. Perry said.

Recalling the year when Republicans gained the congressional majority that was wiped out Nov. 7, Mr. Barbour said that in 1994, "Republicans got elected by a majority who wanted a different domestic policy. In this election, the Democrats got elected because they weren't the Republicans. It was the war, but also scandal and corruption."

A Split In The GOP Tent (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Republicans are good at reinvention. They have appealed to voters' dark side (Nixon's Southern strategy) as well as to their sunny side (Reagan's "Morning in America"). They have skipped from anti-government populism (Newt Gingrich and the leave-us-alone coalition) to big-government machine politics (the alliance with corporate lobbyists known as the K Street Project). Through all these transformations, the GOP has sustained its big-tent coalition. The question in the wake of its election thumpin' is whether the tent will split.

You can see this possibility in " Liberaltarians," an essay in the New Republic by Brink Lindsey, the director of research at the libertarian Cato Institute. Lindsey is not merely joining the large crowd of disenchanted conservatives who believe that the Republican Party has betrayed its principles -- spraying money at farmers, building bridges to nowhere and presiding over the fastest ramp-up in federal spending since Lyndon Johnson. Rather, Lindsey is taking a step further, arguing that libertarians should ditch the Republican Party in favor of the Democrats.

Why react to the temporary corruption of a party by abandoning it outright? Lindsey's answer is that Republicans are not merely failing to live up to their principles; the principles have altered. The party has been virtually cleaned out of the Northeast; it has suffered setbacks in the Mountain West; it increasingly reflects the values of its stronghold in the South. As a result, it has lost its libertarian tinge and grown more religious and traditionalist.

There has always been a tension between Republican libertarians, who believe that individual choices should be unconstrained by received wisdom, and Republican traditionalists, who believe pretty much the opposite. In their history of the conservative movement, John Micklethwait and Adrian Wooldridge recall that Barry Goldwater believed Jerry Falwell deserved "a swift kick in the ass;" and Goldwater's wife, Peggy, helped to found Planned Parenthood in Arizona. But for a long time the two wings of the party could paper over these differences. Christian conservatives and libertarians agreed that misconceived government programs were harming traditional values. Schools forced sex education on children. The tax system and the welfare system penalized marriage.

Conservatives have grown less able to bridge these divisions because of their success. Welfare has been reformed, and the tax system now supports families with the expanded child tax credit. Having ticked off the first things on their to-do list, Christian conservatives now press for affirmative state action on behalf of traditional values: amendments to the constitution to bar gay marriage, government efforts to teach abstinence, federal payments to faith-based groups. All these policies appall libertarians.

It's not just the values of the South that pose a problem. It is the region's appetite for government. The most solidly red states in the nation tend also to be the most reliant on federal handouts -- farm subsidies, water projects and sundry other earmarks. It's hard to be the party of small government when you represent the communities that benefit most from big government. George W. Bush tried to straddle this divide by pleasing libertarians with tax cuts and traditionalists with spending. The result is a huge deficit.

Would libertarians be more comfortable in the company of Democrats? On moral questions -- abortion, gay marriage, stem cell research -- clearly they would. But on economic issues, the answer is less obvious. For just as Republicans want government to restore traditional values, so Democrats want government to bring back the economic order that existed before globalization. As Lindsey puts it in his New Republic essay, Republicans want to go home to the United States of the 1950s while Democrats want to work there.

If Democrats can get over this nostalgia, there's a chance that liberaltarianism could work. For the time has passed when libertarians could seriously hope to cut government: Much of what could be deregulated has been, and the combination of demographics, defense costs and medical inflation leaves no scope for tax cuts. As Lindsey himself says, the ambition of realistic libertarians is not to shrink government but to contain it: to cut senseless spending such as the farm program and oil subsidies to make room for the inevitable expansion in areas such as health.

As it happens, this also describes a plausible agenda for the Democratic Party -- at least if it can shed the back-to-the-1950s yearnings of its reactionary left. Precisely because Democrats want government to provide social insurance against the volatility of globalization, the party has an interest in cutting unneeded federal spending. Precisely because entitlements are expanding so expensively, the party needs cost-saving ideas from anyone who has them -- including libertarians.

The era of big government is far from over, and liberals and libertarians gain nothing from fighting over its inevitable growth. But precisely because government is on a trajectory of unsustainable expansion, liberals and libertarians have a common interest in reinventing it.

Senate Will Be Tough On 2008 Hopefuls (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, December 4, 2006

For senators with presidential aspirations, 2007 looms like a potential minefield.

The schedule alone is a career enhancement hazard.

When Congress returns under Democratic control in the first week in January, the House and Senate will be tied up with spending bills and other legislation left over from this year as well as an ambitious agenda set by new Democratic congressional leaders.

The schedule for this week's lame-duck session calls for a limited amount of work.

Lawmaking will be a balancing act between voters' expectations and legislative pragmatism, between the impulse to spend and fiscal discipline, between campaigning and staying in Washington to govern.

The likely candidates next year face votes on appropriations, budgets and trade — all of which present potential pitfalls in a presidential campaign.

Congress also could consider immigration and Social Security legislation, two issues that attract widespread public interest as well as alarm.

Hanging over all that will be Iraq.

So far six Democratic and three Republican senators are weighing whether to run for president in 2008. Two House Republicans also are in the mix. The race is off to an early start, with potential candidates setting up their campaign and fundraising operations and seeking early media exposure.

For the Democrats in particular, that amounts to serious multitasking.

At least three — Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts — will be committee chairmen in the Senate. Two other senators — Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Evan Bayh of Indiana — are in line to head two subcommittees, where much legislation originates.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada has pledged to increase the work tempo in the Senate, promising votes throughout the week instead of the current Tuesday to Thursday schedule.

"It's going to be interesting to see if those folks who are in the Senate and who now have the responsibility to chair committees, to sort of run the show, whether their attention will be captured by the Senate or whether they will make time to come campaign," said Dick Harpootlian, a former chairman of the Democratic Party in South Carolina. His state is a requisite stop early in the presidential sweepstakes.

As senators, Republican and Democratic presidential contenders will face difficult choices on the Senate floor. Democrats have pledged to budget frugally, spending or cutting taxes only if the money can be made up elsewhere.

That is a tall order given their desire to increase spending on education and fix the alternative minimum tax, intended to ensure the wealthy do not avoid taxes through loopholes.

But this tax is not indexed to inflation and has encroached on middle-income taxpayers. Correcting the tax or eliminating it would cost hundreds of billions in lost revenue over the next decade.

Congress also will have to address nettlesome trade issues.

President Bush's right to negotiate trade deals without the ability of Congress to amend them expires in June. Labor unions oppose simple reauthorization and votes that expand trade do not play well in states such as South Carolina, which has lost much of its textile industry to foreign countries.

Outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a likely contender for the Republican presidential nomination, alluded to the challenge facing senators while he attended the annual meeting last week of the Republican Governors' Association, which he has headed.

"There's nothing that's going to yield a bigger swat — or a thumping if you will — than saying one thing and doing another," Romney said.

Part of the problem for Democrats is that congressional Republicans return to Washington this week with the reins of power still in their hands, but with little ambition to do much more than ride out of town by week's end.

DOJ_NMG_0101589

During the weeklong session, the last under GOP control, Congress is expected to vote on a new defense secretary, approve a package of expiring but popular tax and health provisions, put the government on a budget autopilot and leave major spending decisions to next year.

Unable to complete action on nine major spending bills to operate the government, the House and Senate plan to approve a resolution that will keep the government running at current spending levels until Feb. 15. House and Senate negotiators were trying to finish work on a nuclear power technology-sharing agreement between the United States and India.

Congressional leaders were looking for ways to get a vote on legislation giving Vietnam preferred trading status. Labor unions oppose the bill, though several Democrats, including Dodd and Kerry, support it. But without any urgency to pass it, the measure could also end up in a 2007 to-do list.

Absent any legislative clashes, the Iraq war will offer lawmakers plenty of opportunities to spell out their differences with Bush administration policy — and with each other.

Bush's nominate to lead the Pentagon, Robert Gates, will have his confirmation hearing Tuesday before the Senate Armed Services Committee. Clinton, Bayh and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, now considered the front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination, are committee members.

Gates is not expected to face serious opposition, but he will be pressed to assess the administration's policies in Iraq.

"They need to elicit from Gates a clear and unequivocal recognition of the full range of the mistakes that have been made," said Susan Rice, a foreign policy expert at the Brookings Institution who advised Kerry in his 2004 presidential campaign. "If he can't acknowledge that, it really does call into question his willingness and ability to change course."

On Wednesday, a bipartisan commission studying Iraq is scheduled to release its recommendations. They are expected to call for increased diplomacy with Syria and Iran and a gradual withdrawal of combat troops from Iraq.

Many Democrats, including Kerry, want a specific timetable for withdrawal. McCain, on the other hand, wants to boost troop strength in Iraq. Either way, the commission report will provide fodder for presidential candidates to stake out positions that will follow them well into the campaign.

Early 'Maybe' From Obama Jolts '08 Field (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — Senator Barack Obama's announcement that he might run for president is altering the early dynamics of the 2008 Democratic nominating contest. The move has created complications for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton as she steps up her own preparations and is posing a threat to lesser-known Democrats trying to position themselves as alternatives to Mrs. Clinton, Democrats said Sunday.

The declaration six weeks ago by Mr. Obama, an Illinois Democrat, has set off a surge of interest in Democratic circles, which party officials expect will only be fueled in the coming week as Mr. Obama prepares for a day of campaignlike events in New Hampshire next Sunday.

At the least, Mr. Obama's very high-profile explorations have contributed to a quickening of the pace across the 2008 Democratic field. On Sunday, Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana said that he would create a presidential exploratory committee this week. And Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa went so far as to announce his candidacy two years before Election Day, in what his aides said was a calculated strategy to grab a moment of attention before Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton blot out the sun.

Mrs. Clinton has been meeting in recent days with New York Democrats — including a two-hour brunch on Sunday at the Manhattan apartment of Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer — to telegraph her own likely entry into the race, though her aides said the get-together had been planned before Mr. Obama discussed his possible run publicly.

But more than simply picking up the pace, Democrats increasingly believe that Mr. Obama has the potential of upending the dynamics of the 2008 contest more than any other Democrat who might run — short, perhaps, of Al Gore, the former vice president, whom some Democrats are pressing to run.

In Mr. Obama, Democrats have a prospective candidate who both underlines and compensates for the potential weaknesses that worry many Democrats about Mrs. Clinton.

He is a fervent opponent of the war in Iraq, and Democrats see him as an exceedingly warm campaigner with a compelling personality and a striking ability to command a crowd. He has no known major political baggage (though he has yet to encounter anything approaching the level of scrutiny Mrs. Clinton has undergone during her years in public life). And Mr. Obama can even match Mrs. Clinton's arresting political storyline if he tries to became the nation's first black president as she seeks to become its first female president.

But whatever complications he might pose for Mrs. Clinton are dwarfed by the shadow he is throwing over lesser-known Democrats. Almost without exception, they have approached this race with the same strategy: to try to emerge as the alternative to Mrs. Clinton and take advantage of substantial reservations in Democratic circles about her potential to win the White House.

There is only so much money, seasoned political expertise and media attention to go around, so the prospect of Mr. Obama eyeing the presidential nomination is understandably unsettling to his potential rivals. Whereas their original success was contingent on Mrs. Clinton folding, now they face the prospect of having to hope that two high-profile national Democrats collapse in the year leading into the Iowa caucuses.

"For every candidate in the race who isn't Hillary Clinton, the entry of any other candidate in the races makes your job that much harder," said Ron Klain, who worked as a senior adviser for Mr. Gore when he ran for president. "For all those guys, Obama is a very serious candidate who will compete with them for the limited supply of activists and media attention."

Mark McKinnon, who was a top adviser to President Bush in his two White House runs and who is a senior adviser to Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, said, "I think Barack Obama is the most interesting persona to appear on the political radar screen in decades." He added, "He's a walking, talking hope machine, and he may reshape American politics."

David Axelrod, a senior adviser to Mr. Obama, said, "If you believe at some level that this is a zero-sum game in terms of money and supporters and talent, then any time someone gets in with a big excitement quotient, that affects everybody else." Mr. Axelrod has worked for Mr. Vilsack and for John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator who ran for president in 2004 and is likely to do so again this time.

Mr. Bayh got a reminder of that on Sunday when he appeared on "This Week" on ABC.

"What kind of a strategy do you need to combat huge political celebrities like John McCain, Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton?" asked George Stephanopoulos, the program's host.

Mr. Bayh earnestly dodged the question for a moment, before finally responding: "Is this a little bit like David and Goliath? A little bit, but as I recall, David did O.K."

Asked repeatedly about the woman who is perceived as his most formidable challenge in the primary, Mr. Obama has been careful not to criticize Mrs. Clinton directly. But one of his central messages is that he is something Mrs. Clinton is not: a late baby boomer (he was born in 1961, at the tail end of the post-World War II generation; Mrs. Clinton was born in 1947), and a fresh face that rises above old partisan grudges.

Mr. Obama has already provided some hints of how he would position himself against Mrs. Clinton, suggesting he would link her to her husband's presidency and their role in the intense partisanship that marked much of the 1990s and that carried over into the Bush presidency.

During a lengthy interview just before the midterm elections, Mr. Obama portrayed himself as part of a new generation of political leaders. Asked whether he detected a void in the Democratic presidential field, Mr. Obama replied that he sensed a mood of "Do we want to get beyond the slash-and-burn, highly ideological politics that bogged us down over the last several decades?"

Mr. Obama went on to say that he admired former President Bill Clinton for trying to bridge a centrist course between Democrats and Republicans. But he did not shy away from pointing out Mr. Clinton's weaknesses — as someone who came of age in the 1960s, and all the debates about Vietnam service, drug use and sexual conduct that went with it, issues that continued to play out, sometimes with Mrs. Clinton in a supporting role.

"Although his instincts were right on target, and I think, intellectually and pragmatically, he understood that America wanted to move beyond those categories, in some ways he was trapped by his biography," Mr. Obama said. "Some of what I say, I think, is facilitated by the fact that I'm less rooted in some of those arguments."

DOJ_NMG_0101591

For all the excitement Mr. Obama's potential candidacy has stirred, he remains a 45-year-old first-term senator who is largely untested in national politics. Yes, Mr. Obama is unusually talented, Democrats and Republicans alike say, but the history of presidential campaigns is filled with examples of celebrity candidates like Gen. Wesley Clark in 2004 who burst onto the political stage but eventually sputtered as they struggled to master the difficulties of running for president.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers said they never figured this would be an easy race for her, should she run. They said they appreciated Mr. Obama's political talents and the threats he posed to her candidacy — in particular, his appeal to liberal voters, given the opposition to the war, and his appeal to black voters, who have been a large part of Mrs. Clinton's base.

It is conceivable that Mr. Obama would help Mrs. Clinton by initially commanding contributions and blocking out more experienced and tested potential rivals — like Mr. Edwards or Mr. Bayh — only to stumble later on, when it is too late for anyone else to catch up.

James Carville, a Democratic consultant who advises Mrs. Clinton, said it was impossible to predict how Mr. Obama might shape such a crowded field.

"He has an early effect on the race, but there's no way to predict what happens in a presidential race with this many funded candidates and this kind of name recognition," Mr. Carville said.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers have said throughout the year that she would wait until after the midterm election before moving into the more aggressive exploration phase that she is now in. "Her decision-making process is not going to depend on what candidates do or don't do, which isn't to say we don't have tremendous respect for the other candidates," said Howard Wolfson, a Clinton adviser.

One Democrat with knowledge of Mrs. Clinton's conversation with Mr. Spitzer on Sunday, and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the conversation was meant to be private, said Mrs. Clinton did not tell Mr. Spitzer that she was running or ask him to commit to her possible candidacy; rather, they talked over the pros and cons of a presidential run.

Mr. Obama, who first said in October that he was considering a race for the White House, said he intended to make his decision known after the first of the year.

Other Democrats who might run include Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Joseph R. Biden of Delaware and John Kerry of Massachusetts, and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

Mr. Vilsack has been the most aggressive in trying to compensate for an expected move by Mr. Obama: the governor did a five-state announcement tour last week. "We accomplished our mission which was to make our introduction before anyone else sort of crowded in on the field," said Jeff Link, a senior adviser to Mr. Vilsack.

Clinton In 'extensive' Talks About 2008 Run (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is ramping up preparations for a 2008 presidential run, talking to political colleagues in New York and interviewing potential staff. A final decision is expected early next year.

Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Sunday that the New York Democrat is consulting with her state's congressional members, state party chairman Denny Farrell and Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer. "She is weighing what a campaign would entail, thinking about what themes she would run on, what issues she would discuss."

He said Clinton and Sen. Charles Schumer, New York's other senator, are scheduled to have "extensive" discussions this week in the capital.

The flurry of activity comes as the fields take shape in both parties. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., said Sunday he will form an official exploratory committee this week to raise money for a potential race. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is finishing a five-day, five-state announcement tour today.

On the Republican side, Senate majority leader Bill Frist said last week he will not run. Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani have formed exploratory committees. Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback is expected to follow suit this week.

Bayh, a former two-term governor, said on ABC's This Week that he'll announce a final decision early next year. The country needs “someone who can unite Americans in a politics of common purpose,” he said. “If I can be that individual, so be it.”

Clinton was a lightning rod for controversy as first lady, but as a senator has tended to New York concerns and sponsored bills with Republican partners. She won a second term last month with two-thirds of the vote.

Even as she declined to discuss possible presidential plans during her re-election campaign, Clinton consistently led the list of Democrats in national polls of prospective nominees.

In a USA TODAY/Gallup poll last month, Clinton was the choice of 31% of Democrats. In second place was freshman Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who generated excitement this year campaigning for fellow Democrats. In recent days he has been conferring with friends, family and political associates about whether to run for president.

The only other prospect in double digits was former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, at 10%. Former vice president and 2000 nominee Al Gore was at 9%, followed by 2004 nominee John Kerry at 7%. Bayh and Vilsack trailed with 2% and 1%, respectively.

According to Wolfson, Clinton has from $10 million to $14 million left from her Senate race that could be used for a presidential campaign if she runs. Bayh, who has been busily raising money, may have close to the same amount.

Hillary Networks To Get Likely '08 Bid Up And Running (WT/AP)

By Beth Fouhy

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

NEW YORK -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton met yesterday with New York's Democratic governor-elect to solicit his support for her likely White House bid, the latest indication she is stepping up plans to join a growing field of potential contenders for 2008.

One rival, Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana, announced yesterday he was establishing an exploratory committee to raise money for a possible presidential run. He expects to decide over the Christmas holidays whether to seek his party's nomination.

A top aide to Mrs. Clinton said he did not know when the former first lady would decide about pursuing the presidency or set up an exploratory committee. Clinton aides, however, have begun interviewing potential campaign staffers, Howard Wolfson said.

Mrs. Clinton, who long has topped national polls of Democratic hopefuls, spent two hours with Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer at his Manhattan home.

"We just had a great, wide-ranging meeting on so many issues that affect the city, the state and the country," Mrs. Clinton said as she left the meeting.

Last week she contacted leading state Democrats, including Reps. Charles B. Rangel and Nita M. Lowey, and the state party chairman, Denny Farrell, to assess her prospects and seek their support.

Mrs. Clinton's Democratic colleague, Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, told reporters yesterday that Mrs. Clinton had called him to arrange a meeting next week. But he was coy about the purpose of the get-together.

"She wants to sit down and talk next week, which we're going to do. It could be about legislation. I have no idea what it's about, and until we sit down and talk that's all I'm going to say about it," Mr. Schumer said. He added, "I think she'd make a very good president, but let's wait and see. Everyone's sort of jumping the gun."

Mr. Wolfson said Mrs. Clinton "is reaching out to her colleagues in the New York delegation and asking for their advice and counsel and their support if she decides to make a run."

Mrs. Clinton easily won re-election last month to a second term in the Senate. Mr. Wolfson noted that Mrs. Clinton long has said she would begin actively considering a presidential bid after that election. "That process has begun," Mr. Wolfson said.

Thirteen months before the first votes are cast in the nomination process, the presidential jockeying has intensified in both parties.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack announced his bid for the Democratic nod last week; Mr. Bayh is taking the initial steps; and others, such as the party's 2004 ticket of Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, are weighing runs.

DOJ_NMG_0101593

The effort comes as Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a rising star in Democratic politics, enjoys a wave of publicity and momentum around a possible White House bid.

Mr. Obama, a clear challenger to Mrs. Clinton's front-runner status, has appeared before huge crowds around the country, promoting his best-selling book, "The Audacity of Hope."

He met with aides in Chicago last week and they expect him to disclose his intentions about a 2008 run in a matter of weeks.

On the Republican side, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani have established exploratory committees; so, too, has long-shot candidate Rep. Duncan Hunter of California. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is moving toward a bid and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas is expected to announce his intentions soon.

Mr. Bayh, appearing on ABC's "This Week," acknowledged he was not well-known outside Washington and Indiana, but said he had the credentials necessary to be an effective president.

"As the people get to know me, I think we'll do very well. I've been a successful two-term governor with a record of delivering results. I now have national security experience from my presence in the Senate," he said. "Is this a little bit like David and Goliath? A little bit, but as I recall, David did OK."

Mr. Bayh, 50, has charted a relatively centrist course in the Senate. He has appearances scheduled this week in Iowa and New Hampshire, two states with early contests on the presidential campaign calendar. As of Sept. 30, he had about $10.5 million in his Senate campaign account, all of which can be transferred to a presidential committee.

Mrs. Clinton, for her part, has as much as $13 million left from her Senate race, plus a vast network of donors and advisers led by her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Bayh Considers Presidential Bid (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh (D) announced yesterday that he is forming a presidential exploratory committee, a move that allows him to raise money and travel the country in support of a potential national candidacy in 2008.

Appearing on ABC's "This Week," Bayh said the American people "need someone who can deal with the dysfunction here in this city so that our government begins to empower our people to fulfill their potential," adding: "If I can be that individual, so be it." He said he expects to make a final decision on whether to run by early 2007.

Bayh's announcement caps a busy week in Democratic presidential politics as Gov. Tom Vilsack (Iowa) formally announced his bid, former senator Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) dropped out of the race, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) began to test the 2008 waters. Clinton is reaching out to members of the New York congressional delegation, seeking advice and support in case she decides to run. Obama said that on Dec. 10 he will visit New Hampshire, a key early primary state.

The Republican race has already begun in earnest as well. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former New York City mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani have formed exploratory committees, and outgoing Gov. Mitt Romney (Mass.) is expected to join the field shortly after the new year.

Bayh's announcement has long been expected. Since winning reelection in 2004, the Indiana senator has focused heavily on bolstering his presidential rÃ©sumÃ© -- traveling to Iowa and New Hampshire, raising millions of dollars for himself and other Democratic candidates, and assembling a staff of operatives with national experience. As of Sept. 30, Bayh had $10.6 million in his Senate account -- all of which can be transferred to a presidential bid.

Bayh was slated to spend today campaigning in Iowa, and then head to New Hampshire later in the week to do the same. He has already begun looking for office space in both states as well as interviewing potential staff members in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada.

Later this month Bayh will host a meeting of his top financial backers in Washington. He is also interviewing media consultants; Anita Dunn, Bayh's longtime media adviser, will not play that role should he run for president but will remain a senior strategist for the campaign.

"The exploratory committee will allow us to put an infrastructure in place so that as soon as a decision is made, we can turn the switch and be an up-and-running, high-caliber presidential campaign on day one," said Bayh spokesman Dan Pfeiffer.

While his active planning for a presidential bid has spanned much of the past two years, Bayh's potential on the national stage has been a matter of speculation for more than two decades. The son of former senator Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) -- himself a failed presidential candidate in 1976 -- Evan Bayh was elected Indiana secretary of state in 1986, and in 1988, at age 32, won the governorship. Easily reelected in 1992, Bayh began running in late 1996 for the seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Dan Coats (R). In November 1998 he was elected to the Senate with 64 percent of the vote, and six years later coasted to a second term.

Bayh's electoral success in a state regularly won by Republicans in presidential contests -- Lyndon Johnson was the last Democratic nominee to carry Indiana -- is at the core of his campaign-in-waiting. Bayh's allies argue that he is the lone candidate with a proven record of winning the votes of Republicans and independents, a necessity for the party's chances of retaking the White House in 2008.

"Evan Bayh has developed a formula for winning under the most difficult of circumstances," Pfeiffer wrote after the midterm elections. "He is fiscally responsible, tough on national security, shares the values of middle-class families, and values progress over partisanship."

Although his rÃ©sumÃ© is impressive, Bayh is little known outside Indiana. National polling and surveys in early-voting states show Bayh as barely a blip on the radar screen when compared with such figures as Clinton, Obama and former North Carolina senator John Edwards.

Bayh acknowledged his underdog status in the "This Week" interview. "Is this a little bit like David and Goliath?" he said. "A little bit, but as I recall, David did okay."

Politics: McCain's Ground War (NSWK)

By Holly Bailey

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - Peter Spaulding was John McCain's man in New Hampshire, and with good reason. The longest-serving member of the state's Executive Council (which, with the governor, holds all administrative power for the state), Spaulding chaired McCain's victorious 2000 New Hampshire primary campaign. So influential is the Republican counselor, his bid for re-election this past November earned the endorsement of the state's Democratic governor. It didn't help. Like so many Republicans, Spaulding was crushed at the polls this year. He didn't hesitate when asked to explain his defeat. "Voters were angry," he said. "They wanted to see some big changes, starting with Iraq."

Spaulding's fate could have implications for his old friend McCain. Since the election, the Arizona senator has pushed for more, not fewer, troops in the Iraq conflict, claiming "without additional ground forces we will not win this war." It's a striking stance for a man considered to be the front runner for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008, considering the American public's growing impatience for the end of the war. Even in conservative New Hampshire, 38 percent of voters now support bringing troops "home ASAP," according to the most recent Granite State poll. South Carolina, where a tough defeat ended McCain's 2000 campaign, will play an even more influential role in 2008 thanks to early placement in the primary calendar. There, too, Republican voters are growing unhappy with the war. "People are wondering how long this is going to go on," says Buddy Witherspoon, a Republican National Committeeman from Columbia. "I don't think a proposal like that is going to get McCain any votes down here."

Privately, some McCain supporters have begun to worry that the senator's hard line on the war may turn off the moderate, independent-minded voters who've long formed the bedrock of his primary support. "We lost independents," says one campaign adviser, who asked for anonymity discussing the politics of national security. "McCain will have to get them back to win, or at least convince them to trust him."

Still, some members of McCain's inner circle are convinced the position could actually work to his advantage—reminding independents of the maverick they fell in love with in 2000. In a 2008 campaign, aides say, the senator would accentuate his differences with the Bush administration over management of the Iraq occupation, stressing his early criticism of ousted Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and the persistent call for more troops. The hope, the campaign adviser says, is that even antiwar voters will gradually come to accept the position as "a long-term stand based on principle."

It's a risky strategy, particularly in a primary field where candidates like Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney offer Iraq-free résumés and a fresh set of eyes for the conflict. Last week, Tom Vilsack, the Iowa governor, kicked off his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination by claiming McCain's option would "make a big mistake even bigger." Still, aides say the senator will continue to call for more troops. "It's not in his nature to let potential political considerations influence a decision like that," says his chief of staff, Mark Salter. "This is what he believes, period."

Bucking Tide Of School Reform, A Superintendent Gets Results (NYT)

By David M. Herszenhorn

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

Kathleen M. Cashin is responsible for some of the roughest territory in the New York City school system — vast stretches of poverty and desolation from Ocean Hill-Brownsville and East New York in Brooklyn to Far Rockaway in Queens, all part of Region 5, where she is superintendent.

Already this school year, two of her students have been shot dead, including a 16-year-old killed last week. The area has more homeless shelters than any other part of the city. For generations, the local school districts she now runs were marred by racial strife and corruption.

Yet in the last three years, Dr. Cashin has produced one of the school system's most unlikely success stories. Since 2003, her elementary and middle schools have consistently posted the best total gains on annual reading and math tests, outpacing other regions with similar legacies of low achievement.

"It's not a job, it's a lifework," she often tells her staff. "You are saving children's lives."

Dr. Cashin's results should be an easy reason for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and Schools Chancellor Joel I. Klein to gloat, a triumph in their takeover of the nation's largest school system. But in many ways, her success raises questions about the thrust of their recent efforts to reshape the school bureaucracy.

While Mr. Klein has derided the "status quo crowd" and sought to bring outsiders into the administration, Dr. Cashin is a lifelong city educator. While Mr. Klein wants to free principals from the control of superintendents like her, Dr. Cashin believes even the best principals need an experienced supervisor.

Where Mr. Klein insists that school administration must be reinvented to reverse generations of failure by generations of educators, Dr. Cashin, a product of the old system, insists she can get results with a clear instructional mission, careful organization and a simple strategy of every educator's being supported by an educator with more experience.

In short, Dr. Cashin stands, in a way, as the antithesis of Mr. Klein's mission to slash midlevel bureaucracy and let principals sail on their own, a challenge to the notion that changing governance structure is the key to turning around schools.

She runs her schools in Region 5, with more than 85,000 students, the same way she ran her schools under the old Board of Education and under previous mayors.

The tug and push over how to manage the system is not academic. Across the country, big school districts have looked outside the ranks of educators, turning to experts in business, law or the military for help. Mr. Klein is a lawyer; Los Angeles hired a retired Navy admiral; the Seattle superintendent is a former banker and public utilities official.

DOJ_NMG_0101597

But with studies showing little progress in narrowing the achievement gap between minority and white students, the question of how best to improve schools in places like Region 5 is the most critical issue in American education. And Dr. Cashin has the numbers to stake a claim as the best turnaround artist in town.

In 2003, 33.2 percent of her students in grades three to eight could read on grade level and 34.6 percent were proficient in math. Today, 50.6 percent read on grade and 56.9 percent are proficient in math. No other region starting below 40 percent has crossed the halfway mark in either subject.

"We are relentless," Dr. Cashin said in a recent interview. "The secret is clear expectations. Everything is spelled out. Nothing is assumed." She provides her principals, for instance, with a detailed road map of what should be taught in every subject, in every grade, including specific skills of the week in reading and focus on a genre of literature every month.

Dr. Cashin was chosen by Mr. Klein to be one of 10 regional superintendents, as part of the initial restructuring of the city's 32 local school districts under Mr. Bloomberg's control of the system. But since the start of the mayor's second term, Mr. Klein has pushed to reduce the role of superintendents, giving wider authority to principals in an effort that could lead to consolidation or elimination of the 10 regions. That could potentially leave the regional superintendents without jobs or perhaps filling a new role in which principals choose them to advise groups of schools. They would no longer be supervisors but rather support staff.

In a statement, Mr. Klein praised her for doing a "terrific job." But, through a spokesman, he suggested that Dr. Cashin was one of few exceptions to come up through the ranks and that Region 5's results, while impressive, were still incremental, while he wants much larger citywide improvement. He also reiterated his intention to "devolve decision making and resources" to give principals more power.

In an interview, Andres Alonso, the deputy chancellor for teaching and learning, also suggested that Dr. Cashin and Mr. Klein were not so different. "She has a huge entrepreneurial side," he said. But he tempered his praise, noting that aggregate improvements in scores, across many grade levels, can mask slower progress in particular areas.

He also said the mayor's initial restructuring had set the stage for her region's gains. "They were given the span of control, they were given the political authority, they were given the resources," he said of the superintendents. "They were supported comprehensively."

Dr. Cashin, a Brooklyn native who once studied to be a nun and now zips through some of the city's bleakest quarters in a dark Lexus, does not criticize her bosses publicly. But just 15 of 115 principals in Region 5 joined the chancellor's "empowerment" program, which frees principals from answering to superintendents in exchange for their agreeing to meet performance targets. Other similarly sized regions had two or three times as many sign up.

Dr. Cashin prefers principals who come up through the system over graduates of the chancellor's Leadership Academy, which has focused on recruiting candidates from other professions. And while Mr. Klein has dealt with the teachers' union on a war footing, Dr. Cashin has made the union a partner, hiring it to train teachers instead of using outside vendors.

Though she uses the citywide math and reading programs in many schools, Dr. Cashin does not believe they are sufficient and customizes them extensively, with an emphasis on writing. She also uses an array of other initiatives of her own choosing or design.

"You need to expand the knowledge base, expand the vocabulary, expand the experience base, and that only comes with good instruction and a rich curriculum," she said.

In Region 5, about 100 principals are overseen by 13 local instructional superintendents, who are constantly in schools to make sure they are on track and who meet weekly with Dr. Cashin and her longtime deputy, Stephen M. Mittman.

Close associates of Dr. Cashin, who turns 59 this month, said frustrations with headquarters at times had prompted her to consider retiring. But she is divorced, with three stepsons but no children of her own, a regret she describes as "an emptiness in my heart." So far, her friends said, she cannot bring herself to give up her life's work.

Dr. Cashin grew up in Flatbush, the youngest of five children. Her parents died when she was a teenager. She studied to become a nun but settled on teaching, first in Roman Catholic school and then at Public School 299 in Bushwick until teacher layoffs in 1976.

DOJ_NMG_0101598

She worked in educational publishing, then in curriculum development for the Board of Education. In 1982, she became principal of P.S. 193 in Midwood, where she stayed until becoming superintendent of District 23 in Ocean Hill-Brownsville, the epicenter of battles between black parents and white educators in the 1960s.

Former Chancellor Rudy Crew, who hired her for District 23, said Dr. Cashin excelled in the technical aspects of teaching: "She is a principal's dream."

To appoint her, Dr. Crew overruled neighborhood opponents who were demanding a black superintendent and branded her "the white lady from Bensonhurst." (She is from Bay Ridge.)

Denise Gordon, a longtime parent organizer, said Dr. Cashin bridged racial divisions. "I tell everyone she's tan because she's black underneath," said Ms. Gordon, who is black.

These days, Dr. Cashin, who is 6 feet tall with short blond hair, strides into schools, juggling her cellphone and BlackBerry, doling out hugs to parents, kisses to principals and a never-ending stream of thank-yous to her teachers. She calls everyone Baby or Hon.

"You have to be kind to people," she said. "If people feel they don't have a voice, they are going to strike back at some point."

Although Dr. Cashin is beloved by parent and community groups, often impressing them with her passion for children, some who have worked with her say that she can be imperious, that she listens intently but can be difficult to persuade to change her mind.

She is often generous with praise, but her criticism can be merciless. "It's got to be much more rigorous," she told a principal after touring a Brownsville elementary school. Her quiet tone did not mask her fury. "I don't think there's a sense of urgency."

She was particularly distressed to see some children sharing books and noted with disdain that some were doing busywork. "I saw, in one or two rooms, copying from the board," she said, derisively. "I don't know what that was all about."

Dr. Cashin is obsessed with writing, and in most of her schools, student work lines the walls — not just the final product but layers of drafts. Even first graders have writing posted on the walls.

A feature used in every school is the four-square graphic organizer, a worksheet with four boxes like a window pane and a rectangle at its center that helps children develop a five-paragraph essay. Some progressive educators scorn it as a crutch; Dr. Cashin insists that it works.

While the city's reading program focuses on story books, Dr. Cashin layers on lots of nonfiction. And, responding to research showing that impoverished children often lack vocabulary and basic facts, she has adopted a curriculum called Core Knowledge, which teaches basics like the principles of constitutional government, events in world history and well-known literature.

"The question to raise is, why aren't more schools doing this?" said Pedro Noguera, an education professor at New York University. "Why aren't more of these approaches that are proven to be effective being adopted more widely in the city?"

Others say they are impressed by her organization. "They stick with a plan, make sure the resources get to the plan and follow up to see if the plan worked," said Seppy Basili, the vice president of Kaplan K12 Learning Services, the test preparation company, who has worked in districts nationwide.

While the scores in Region 5 reflect extensive test preparation, on that front, too, Dr. Cashin does things her way, having pushed Kaplan to develop a program to her specifications.

At a recent conference on homeless children, Dr. Cashin recalled the anxiety among some of her principals over an influx of students from a shelter. "The children from the Junius Shelter are going to be coming," she said, recalling the unease. "What are we going to do? Our reading scores have just started to go up."

"These are the children that are traumatized, that are hungry, that are fatigued, that are stressed," she told the audience.

"We decided the goal was not to try to take the fewest numbers, but to have T-shirts for them, and book bags and intervention services, to welcome them, be nurturing to them, because these are the children who have been most hurt."

With A Hefty Education Grant Come Equally Great Expectations (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

DOJ_NMG_0101599

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Irasema Salcido's heart raced when she pulled the letter from a stack of mail in her Capitol Hill office. She tore open the envelope.

The Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation is pleased to award the Cesar Chavez Public Charter Schools a grant in the amount of $1,570,000. . . .

Salcido rocketed into her staff's offices to share the news. She had landed what thousands of other nonprofit organizations are chasing: a Gates grant. One of the world's largest charitable foundations, the most important sponsor of efforts to improve U.S. schools after the government, believed in her seven-year-old educational experiment.

That moment in September 2005 marked the launch of a partnership between a Harvard-educated daughter of migrant farm workers and a charity built on the fortune of a billionaire Harvard dropout.

If all went as planned, two Cesar Chavez schools would become four. Then four might become more. With that jackpot letter, the Chavez school motto -- "SÃ-, se puede! Yes, it can be done!" -- seemed to have become "Yes, it will be done!"

"I thought, 'Well, Gates, they're probably going to give us the money, and we're very thankful, and that's that,' " Salcido recalled.

But Gates money doesn't just come with dreams. It also comes with demands.

With nearly $32 billion in assets and more coming from investment guru Warren Buffett, the Gates Foundation is a leading sponsor of global health and economic development initiatives. In the United States, the foundation focuses on upgrading libraries and public education. In the school arena, it seeks to raise high school graduation rates and prepare more students, particularly minorities, to go to college.

"America's high schools are obsolete," Bill Gates argued in a speech last year in Washington. "Until we design them to meet the needs of the 21st century, we will keep limiting -- even ruining -- the lives of millions of Americans each year."

The Microsoft founder has the means to do more than complain.

Overhauling schools is all the rage among the entrepreneurial nouveau mega-rich, such as personal computer pioneer Michael Dell, Netscape founder James Barksdale and home builder Eli Broad. But the Gates Foundation is lavishing unprecedented sums of money on the effort. So far, it has awarded $1.5 billion in grants to improve secondary education, including $285 million last year. Richard Colvin, director of Columbia University's Hechinger Institute on Education and the Media, called the foundation an "unparalleled force" in U.S. schools. "They are going to change the high school experience for tens of thousands of kids," he said.

Gates grants have flowed to schools and school systems in 42 states and the District, including $126 million to New York, $65 million to Chicago and $38 million to Oakland, Calif. The grants have helped open 1,100 schools and revamp an additional 700. The foundation also has sunk millions into education think tanks and policy and academic groups (including Hechinger). Its agenda is to create high schools with rigorous college-prep curricula, to replicate successful experiments and to convert giant, mostly urban schools into effective, manageable units.

Reviews of the Gates school initiatives have been mixed.

This fall, Denver shut down a high school that had received $1 million in Gates grants; officials cited plunging enrollment after the school was divided into three smaller ones and students fled to other schools.

In Lebanon, Ore., parents and school board members rebelled after a foundation-backed effort broke up the lumber-mill town's high school and cut back on traditional vocational classes. Gates pulled out abruptly in May, and the school system lost half of its $950,000 grant.

"Sometimes I'm not sure Gates wants all the headlines they get," Lebanon Superintendent Jim Robinson said. "When things get a little rocky, safer ground is easily found elsewhere."

The foundation, through research it has commissioned, has found that Gates-funded schools have strong attendance and more rigorous English and reading assignments. But the research also showed that test scores have improved only slightly, and math performance has been stagnant or lower compared with other schools.

DOJ_NMG_0101600

So far, the foundation and intermediaries have spent about $4 million in the District. Most has gone to charter schools such as Chavez, which receive public funding but are independently operated. Gates officials have shied away from larger investments in the turbulent and troubled D.C. school system.

But now the foundation is considering a larger effort. Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D) has asked for its guidance in a possible bid to take over the public schools.

Irasema Salcido could offer the incoming mayor insight on working with Gates.

Salcido, an administrator for 12 years at Bell Multicultural Senior High School in Northwest Washington, opened the first Cesar Chavez Public Charter School for Public Policy in 1998 in a Southwest Washington supermarket basement. The school, named for the late Mexican American labor and civil rights leader, seeks to offer a college-prep curriculum to kids whose families earn less in a year than the annual tuition of pricey private schools.

The school days are long and expectations lofty. After-school tutoring and summer school are required for all students regardless of academic standing. So are internships and service projects with community groups or think tanks. Four-fifths of the students are African American, and most of the rest are Latino.

Although some kids show up academically prepared, most arrive at the high school two to six grades behind. Some struggle with basic arithmetic or with writing a paragraph. Chavez seeks to help them catch up.

Three years at Chavez changed the life of Moises Flores, 22, a Nicaraguan immigrant. "I finally realized that I could do something," he said. "I could learn, and I could excel." He graduated in May from American University and is headed for law school.

Salcido, 44, an elegant and dark-eyed woman, knows the obstacles Flores overcame only too well. She moved to the United States from Mexico at age 15 knowing almost no English. To get through high school, she memorized passages from textbooks. It took her more than a decade to get through college and graduate school.

With her life experience and vision, Salcido has proven adept at attracting students. Her flagship campus moved three times in eight years to accommodate growth, settling on Capitol Hill; a second campus with a combined middle school and high school opened east of the Anacostia River last fall. Enrollment is now more than 1,100.

However, test scores have been just slightly better than the mediocre citywide average; the latest test data show one-quarter of Chavez students were proficient in math and one-third in reading. Just as worrisome, many students leave the school after their freshman year.

Salcido reached out to the Gates Foundation in 2004 through an official she knew there, education program director Jim Shelton, who arranged for Melinda Gates to tour the school that year. (Like Buffett, Melinda Gates serves on the board of The Washington Post Co.)

Salcido said she begged the foundation for help. "This is the time to make the investment," Salcido told Shelton last year, "not later when we make mistakes."

The pitch worked. The foundation dispatched program officer Andrew Smiles to help Salcido put together a proposal.

After prowling around the Capitol Hill campus, Smiles liked much of what he saw. Girls in bracelet-size hoop earrings and boys in baggy jeans walked past hand-lettered posters listing the grade-point averages of top students. Like the tail of a kite, sheets of paper lined a hall with the names of graduating seniors and the colleges to which they had been accepted. Bates, Penn State, Howard, the University of Maryland -- every Chavez graduate has been accepted to college, according to the school.

Many teachers were former policy wonks with Ivy League degrees. Smiles also saw promise in the public policy-oriented focus that linked coursework to the world at large. The school fit with the Gates "three R's" approach: rigor, relevance and relationships.

But some classes weren't as rigorous as they could be, Smiles concluded, and inexperienced teachers didn't know how to push kids to do more than recite answers by rote.

In a few weeks, he and Chavez administrators hammered out a 30-page plan with 11 target actions, known as "deliverables," in exchange for foundation support to fix problems and add two campuses. Most of the Gates money would come toward the end of a five-year grant. The deliverables included strengthening the curriculum, training teachers, drawing up more detailed budgets and taking steps to reduce student attrition. Nearly a quarter of the freshman class, Smiles discovered, had disappeared by the time their sophomore year began.

The Gates model is more common in business than philanthropy. Experts say Gates officials seek to hold grant recipients accountable and find formulas for success. The foundation "doesn't give all that much money to a school just because it's good and they want to make it better," said Paul T. Hill of the Center on Reinventing Public Education at the University of Washington, which also has received Gates funding. "They give money to the school because it's an exemplar and they want to have it reproduced."

So far, the Chavez schools have received $370,000 in two installments and have met the foundation's conditions. Salcido and her administrators hired a dropout prevention specialist, recruited a curriculum expert for their board of directors and hired a principal to open a third campus next fall. But tough questions remain. Will the dropout rate decline? Will teacher training help raise test scores? Will the new school have a strong academic plan?

One key element of the Chavez expansion has been delayed. Two new campuses, not one, were supposed to open next fall. Salcido still aims for that fourth campus. Her enrollment target is 3,000 students.

"They've learned a lot of tough lessons over time," Shelton said of Salcido's team.

Smiles stays in constant contact by phone and in person, taking on an oversight role typical for a central office in a large school system. In July, he met with Chavez administrators to review progress on such matters as the new school calendar and dropout prevention. With pressed khaki pants and a thatch of unruly brown hair, Smiles looked like a cross between a Microsoft engineer and a prep-school English teacher as he took notes on a legal pad.

"It'd be great to get some perspective on the deliverables," he told them. "I'm also hoping that this meeting can serve as reflecting time to say, 'Here we are, getting prepared for two more schools.' "

Salcido gave a mock groan. "Do you have to remind us?" she said, as laughter rippled across the room.

Smiles grinned. "I know," he said. "Exactly."

Shirtless Bush Seen In 'Brokeback' Spoof (AP)

By Beth Duff-brown

AP, December 4, 2006

A "Brokeback Mountain" parody airing on Canadian television depicts an unusual type of summit between President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

In the sketch based on the acclaimed film about a love affair between two cowboys, Harper and Bush are portrayed naked from the waist up in a tent. Images of their faces are pasted over actors' bodies.

At one point, Bush throws cherries at Harper's nipples, which are covered with whipped cream. After the cherries land, separatist politician Andre Boisclair, who cooperated with filming of the spot, is seen opening the tent flap and stiffly saying that Quebec won't get involved "in something like that."

The sketch was filmed for the MusiMax music and entertainment channel but has leaked out to French-language TV stations, upsetting members of the provincial Liberal government of Premier Jean Charest.

"I leave it to Mr. Boisclair to defend his judgment," said Quebec's education minister, Jean-Marc Fournier.

Boisclair, who is gay and the leader of Parti Quebecois, later said he regretted the entire episode: "It's quite obvious I wouldn't do it again."

Tweaking The News (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Katie Couric showed up without an appointment.

It was Thursday morning in Amman, Jordan, and the CBS anchor, who hadn't gotten to bed until 4 a.m., was woken up with word that she might have a shot at talking to the Iraqi prime minister if she headed to the military airbase."I thought, 'What the heck, what else do I have to do but sleep?' " she says.

DOJ_NMG_0101602

Nouri al-Maliki, who had just finished a scheduled sitdown with ABC's Charlie Gibson, did not recognize Couric and did not seem receptive. But the Iraqi foreign minister interceded on her behalf, much to the dismay of the ABC producers who thought they had an exclusive.

Couric, who also wound up interviewing Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had hesitated to fly to Jordan for President Bush's meeting with Maliki. "We just weren't sure if it'd be worth our while in terms of securing interviews," she says from Amman. "Then we decided the only way we'd know is if we came and tried."

The critics -- and Couric has more than her share -- may not have noticed, but the nightly newscast that she launched three months ago is in transition. Some of the changes she made have been dropped or curtailed to squeeze in more old-fashioned, what-happened-today stories. And Couric is finally starting to make news for covering the news.

"In the first couple of weeks, we might have focused more on features than hard news, and we're adjusting that," says CBS News President Sean McManus. "We've also learned that to break the mold too much might be an interesting creative process, but it wouldn't serve the viewer tuning in at 6:30 to find out what's happening."

Rome Hartman, executive producer of the "CBS Evening News," says a myth has taken root in the press. "The story line that got peddled -- and believe me, it got peddled -- that we were off the news, or softer than the other guys, is basically bogus," he says.

Still, the pace and feel of Couric's program can differ markedly from those of Gibson and NBC's Brian Williams, who, like Couric, anchored from Amman on Wednesday and Thursday. As the former "Today" star has tried to transfer her morning magic to the more traditional confines of the nightly news, some of her moves have been controversial, even within CBS.

"It's a very tricky thing to toy with the format, because we want to try new things and not look as if we're throwing things against the wall to see what sticks," Couric says during a lengthy conversation in New York. "That's why I took this job, to take some chances and do new things . . . We're still sort of finding our way, and that's okay."

With the "Evening News" ensconced in third place, some pundits have been quick to pronounce the $15-million-a-year anchor a flop. But the mood at CBS improved when Couric garnered good reviews for her fast-paced election night coverage. "She was under incredible pressure, but she really came through," says Bob Schieffer, her predecessor as anchor.

Couric's visit to Jordan was her first foreign foray as anchor after a mostly stay-at-home tenure that has included quick trips to Los Angeles and Washington. But she had been to Jordan before to interview King Abdullah and Queen Rania for "Today," became friendly with the queen, and was able to work her contacts to help secure several interviews.

While Iraq dominated the news last week, Couric made time for a very different subject. Last Monday, after returning from Thanksgiving break, she was tinkering with promotions for a five-part series called "Overweight in America."

"We want to make it a little catchier," she told her staff. " Are you feeling as stuffed as your turkey?" She pondered for a moment. " ' Tis the season to be indulging?" Couric conjured up the series and reported the opening segment, on the genetic causes of being fat.

"The news of the day is still our staple, but that doesn't mean we can't do a really smart series on obesity," says Couric, who is perpetually on a diet herself. "Or a piece on foster kids being given addictive drugs . . . 'Hard' and 'soft' are completely antiquated terms. Some of the stories on the front page of The Washington Post and New York Times aren't traditional hard-news stories, and I've never heard anyone ask them to justify that."

In Couric's early weeks as anchor, her team loaded the broadcast with new segments -- from a nightly "Free Speech" forum for outside commentators to the highlighting of interesting photos and Web items -- while bypassing or truncating a handful of important stories. In recent weeks, though, "Free Speech" has been cut to barely once a week and other small features deep-sixed.

CBS's White House correspondent Jim Axelrod says Couric and the staff are still "tinkering with the right flow of hard news and soft news and commentary. I don't think it's any surprise that at the outset, people said, 'Wait a minute, I want more news here.' "

"I think 'Free Speech' was a great idea and well worth trying, but in the end it just took too much time away from news," Schieffer says. "All news programs are a work in progress. We're still in something of a shakedown cruise, but I think we're moving in the right direction."

DOJ_NMG_0101603

National correspondent Byron Pitts says that "people are angry, in a good way, to make this the best show it can be . . . A tremendous amount of work went into the planning for Katie's arrival, and once she got here we realized we still had work to do. The problems aren't going to be fixed overnight."

CBS executives said all along that they planned to experiment with the format. "Maybe it takes some getting used to at 6:30 on a weeknight, but I think it's what people expect of her," Hartman says.

The experimentation generally comes after the first commercial break. Couric has led her broadcast with Iraq 18 times, terror-related subjects a dozen times, American politics a dozen times and other foreign-policy issues five times. But there are still differences among the newscasts. On Nov. 20, when her rivals were leading with developments in Iraq, CBS's first two stories dealt with an Alabama school bus accident that killed three teenagers and broader questions of student safety -- a local tragedy that warranted a few sentences on NBC and ABC.

"I think sometimes people have Iraq fatigue," Couric says. "If there's not something really significant going on, it starts to feel like 'Groundhog Day.' We felt millions of kids get on a school bus every day and this would just be interesting. It made us wonder why seat belts weren't required by buses."

Couric, who interviewed O.J. Simpson in 2000 and 2004, also broke with the pack in declining to cover Simpson's book deal and Fox television special for a hypothetical discussion about the two murders he maintains he did not commit.

"I felt it was so sleazy," says Couric, who aired a "Free Speech" commentary on domestic violence instead. "We felt it would turn into more of an infomercial for Fox and Judith Regan," the book's publisher. "It seemed so distasteful." Couric covered the story days later when Regan's boss, Rupert Murdoch, bowed to public outrage and killed the deal.

That stance -- Couric introduced the commentary by telling viewers the Simpson saga wasn't worth their time -- was reminiscent of CBS's Dan Rather refusing, in the summer of 2001, to join the media frenzy over missing congressional intern Chandra Levy.

One emerging hallmark of the newscast is that Couric, who honed her interviewing skills during 15 years at "Today," has been spending more time chatting up newsmakers and analysts, along with her own correspondents. On Iraq, for instance, Couric has spoken with the likes of Rep. Jack Murtha, Sen. Carl Levin, retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste and New York Times columnist Tom Friedman. During the campaign, she periodically hosted former Clinton White House spokesman Mike McCurry and former Bush White House spokeswoman Nicolle Wallace, segments that seemed little different from what is routinely on cable news.

Couric's longest interview, which drew the most flak within CBS, was a discussion with Michael J. Fox. She spoke to the actor after Rush Limbaugh accused him of exaggerating his Parkinson's symptoms during commercials for Democratic candidates who support stem cell research. Some CBS staffers were upset that she devoted nine minutes, or nearly half the newscast, to the subject. Couric made sure to disclose that she has contributed to Fox's foundation, and that her father suffers from Parkinson's.

"People can grouse about it," Couric says of the interview, "but it was distinguishing television."

She is aggravated by some of the pundit potshots about the broadcast's news quotient. "I just think we got an unfair rap, and unfortunately it was perpetrated by people who didn't take the time to watch the show," Couric says.

All the newscasts play up health care, but the subject has been particularly prominent on CBS, often featuring a physician, Jon LaPook, whom Couric helped recruit as medical correspondent. She reports some of these segments as well, including pieces about back pain and hormone replacement therapy. These and other stories and interviews have reduced the airtime of some frustrated correspondents, making Couric the unquestioned star of the show.

"Time is our enemy in this particular format," she says. "It's really a constant struggle to figure out what goes and what stays."

There is also, undeniably, the X factor: Couric's role as the first female anchor to fly solo on a network newscast, and her informal, "Hi, everyone" tone. That has its fans and its detractors.

Erik Sorenson, a former "Evening News" producer, says Couric is "a bit of a lightning rod" but that CBS executives "should be applauded for trying a lot of things." The question, he says, is "are they going to succumb [to criticism], and in three months we're going to look up and they're doing the same newscast as Dan Rather was three years ago?"

DOJ_NMG_0101604

In the closely watched ratings race, Couric quickly faded after winning her first two weeks. For the week of Nov. 20, "NBC Nightly News" drew 9.46 million viewers, ABC's "World News" 8.48 million and Couric's broadcast 7.96 million. That represented a modest rebound from Couric's low mark of 7.74 million two weeks earlier.

But while the staff is conflicted over the uneven start, McManus's message remains upbeat. He says the program, excluding those atypical first two weeks, is up 11 percent over last year in the 25-to-54 group prized by advertisers.

"It's bringing in enough to pay for Katie's salary," he says. "I couldn't be happier with the job she is doing, knowing she is under more scrutiny than probably any other person in television history."

Report: N.Korea Offers Uranium To Russia (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

North Korea has offered Russia exclusive rights to its natural uranium deposits in exchange for support at the stalled talks on Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions, a newspaper reported Sunday.

The two countries have been in talks since 2002 on a deal for Russia to import uranium, which it wants to enrich and sell as nuclear fuel to China and Vietnam, according to a report in the regional daily, Tokyo Shimbun, citing unnamed Russian officials.

North Korea recently offered Russia exclusive rights to the uranium in exchange for open support at the six-party talks on the North's nuclear program, which have stalled since last year, the report stated.

Russia, which already exports natural gas and oil, hopes to become a major exporter of nuclear fuel, according to the report. Negotiations between Russia and North Korea were set to continue, the report added.

North Korea defied international demands by testing a nuclear weapon for the first time on Oct. 8. The U.N. quickly sanctioned the communist regime, banning member states from trading in weapons-related technology with the North.

Efforts to restart talks to halt the North's nuclear program have so far failed. Russia, North and South Korea, Japan, China and the U.S. are involved in the talks.

U.S. nuclear envoy Christopher Hill and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye Gwan, failed to agree to a start date for negotiations after meeting in Beijing last week.

At those talks, Hill reportedly urged North Korea to shut down its nuclear testing facilities by the end of 2008, halt uranium production, let U.N. weapons inspectors back into the country and hand over a full list of its nuclear facilities.

In return, the other five countries would offer the North security guarantees, economic aid, and the possibility of normalizing U.S.-North Korea ties, the Kyodo News agency reported Saturday, citing unnamed officials.

Pyongyang would face additional sanctions if it didn't comply with the proposal, which was drawn up by the U.S., Japan and South Korea, and shared with China and Russia, the report said, without elaborating.

The mass-circulation Yomiuri Shimbun newspaper carried a similar report.

Officials at Japan's Foreign Ministry were unavailable for comment. Russia's Foreign Ministry and the Russian Embassy in Tokyo also declined immediate comment.

North Korea withdrew from the six-party talks last November, angered at U.S. financial sanctions against a Macau-based bank where Pyongyang held several accounts that Washington alleged were used to launder money.

Kim, the North Korean envoy, has said Pyongyang will not unilaterally give up its nuclear weapons program.

Russian officials have repeatedly said they support a non-nuclear North Korea.

"The main task of the six-party talks is guaranteeing the non-nuclear status of the Korean Peninsula," Russian Security Council chief Igor Ivanov, was quoted by ITAR-Tass as saying on Saturday during a visit to Mexico.

Direct US, North Korea Talks Give New Glimmer Of Hope (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, December 4, 2006

One month after North Korea agreed to return to multilateral nuclear talks following its defiant atomic weapons test, the six-nation dialogue remains stalled. But few are complaining.

DOJ_NMG_0101605

This is because the United States and North Korea, the key parties of the four-year nuclear standoff, are engaged in face-to-face talks on crunch issues that some believe are more productive that the six-party process including China, South Korea, Russia and Japan.

Top US negotiator Christopher Hill met his North Korean counterpart Kim Kye-Gwan in Beijing last week, their second meeting in a month, to explore how North Korea should consider disbanding its atomic weapons network in return for security, diplomatic and energy guarantees.

Experts noted that their 15 hours of marathon talks brokered by China over two days were wide-ranging and tackled critical issues.

"One of the things to note is that there had been extensive talks this time between the North Koreans and the United States," said Daniel Pinkston of the California-based Center for Nonproliferation Studies.

"Proposals were exchanged and discussions were held and that means diplomacy is underway, and so whether or not the six-party meeting is held may be irrelevant," he said.

The six-party talks have been stalled since November 2005 and few expect them to resume before the end of the year.

The administration of President George W. Bush has been under pressure to hold direct talks with North Korea since the hardline communist state defied the international community and tested a nuclear bomb two months ago.

Washington has always emphasized that the rare direct talks between US and North Korean negotiators in Beijing are part of the six-party process hosted by China and not considered official bilateral discussions.

At the Beijing talks last week, North Korea reportedly told the United States to lift the financial restrictions on a Macau-based bank which Washington alleges was used by Pyongyang to commit financial crimes.

The United States, for its part, demanded the communist state report all of its nuclear facilities and programs, and accept inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, according to the Yomiuri Shimbun daily in Japan.

Citing Japanese and US government sources, it said Hill also demanded that the North close its plutonium-producing nuclear reactor in Yongbyon and seal off underground nuclear facilities from where it conducted the atomic test.

Kim has taken the conditions, reportedly agreed upon by the other five parties, back to Pyongyang for consultations with the North Korean leadership.

Hill would only say that he shared some "ideas" with the North Koreans.

"They heard them for the first time from us, and so they are going to take them back to Pyongyang and study them. And we hope to hear from them soon," he said.

Experts say it is hard to tell at this stage whether North Korea, with its de facto nuclear power status following its October 9 test explosion, would just abandon its atomic weapons arsenal.

"It's important to make the North Koreans choose between the survival of their regime and having nuclear weapons," said Robert Einhorn, who directed nonproliferation matters at the State Department from 1999 to 2001.

"If they believe that keeping nuclear weapons will over the long term jeapordise the survival of their regime then perhaps they would have incentives for giving up those weapons," said Einhorn, who now works at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

North Korea agreed in principle during the six-party talks in September 2005 to give up its nuclear weapons program in return for concessions but boycotted the talks two months later after US sanctions led to a freeze in North Korean accounts in Macao-based Banco Delta Asia.

Pyongyang only agreed about a month ago to return to the six-party talks after testing its nuclear bomb and drawing UN Security Council sanctions.

But Washington said it would not resume the six-party talks until a concrete outcome is ready to be put on the table, fearing North Korea would use the meeting as a stalling tactic to expand its nuclear arsenal.

"The North Koreans have said they'll come back to the talks. That's a done deal. But we don't want to just have people come back to the talks," said US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"It really is what are the expectations of this next round and that may take some time. And it may take further discussions," she said.

Gaza Truce Won't Be Widened To West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 3 -- Extending a tenuous cease-fire between Israel and Palestinian armed groups in the Gaza Strip to the far larger West Bank proved elusive Sunday as Israel's security cabinet decided against doing so and the governing Hamas movement withdrew from negotiations on the matter.

But the Israeli government reaffirmed its commitment to the temporary truce in Gaza despite the continuing rocket fire from there into southern Israel, which violates the eight-day-old agreement.

Israeli military officials say 15 rockets have been launched from Gaza since the truce was reached between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who has suggested that the modest achievement could be a first step toward reviving dormant negotiations over the creation of a Palestinian state.

"The situation is sensitive," Olmert told the cabinet. "We must act wisely and with serious consideration."

The cease-fire, hailed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during a visit here last week, has brought a pause to months of fighting in and around Gaza.

Israeli forces have killed more than 250 Palestinians there, most of them gunmen, since the military wing of Hamas captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid on June 25. Palestinian rocket fire, a terrifying daily menace to many towns along the strip's edge, has killed two Israelis since then.

Rice urged Olmert and Abbas to build upon the rare accord by extending its terms to the West Bank, an area of far greater strategic importance to Israel and the Palestinians than the remote, enclosed strip.

But Israeli military officials have warned against doing so, fearing that the armed groups would use the respite to replenish arsenals and plan attacks against Israel. That argument appeared to win over the cabinet, already under some pressure to renew operations in Gaza in light of the continuing rocket fire, which has not caused any injuries since the cease-fire took effect.

One rocket fell inside Israel on Sunday, military officials said. Later in the day, Israeli forces killed a 15-year-old Palestinian boy near the West Bank city of Nablus who was throwing rocks at troops during what military officials characterized as a riot.

A few hours later, Hamas officials in Gaza announced that the radical Islamic group was quitting talks with other Palestinian factions over whether to include the West Bank in the truce.

A Hamas spokesman, Ismail Radwan, said Israel was violating the terms of the cease-fire in Gaza, although he did not specify how. He also signaled that the talks to extend the truce were distracting from Palestinian efforts to form a national-unity government, a process that has broken down in recent days.

"The comprehensive cease-fire must come as a part of a comprehensive national plan, and at this time, the talks on a cease-fire are being held at the expense of talks on internal Palestinian issues," the group said in a statement issued in Gaza.

Those talks between Hamas and Abbas's rival Fatah movement are designed to produce a government acceptable to international donors, who cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas's victory in January parliamentary elections. Hamas, classified as a terrorist organization by Israel, the European Union and the United States, has so far refused to meet international demands that it recognize Israel's right to exist.

In another indication of the cease-fire's fragility, the radical Islamic Jihad issued a statement Sunday warning that "calm is on the edge of collapse" because of Israeli violations. The group, which did not formally agree to the cease-fire, said it would begin attacks on Israel "in the coming hours."

Gaza Cease-Fire In Danger (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

GAZA, Dec. 3 (AP) — Israelis and Palestinians threatened Sunday to scrap a truce that has largely ended five months of violence in Gaza, with Palestinian militants insisting that it must also apply to the West Bank and Israeli leaders saying that rocket squads were still active.

DOJ_NMG_0101607

Speaking to the Israeli cabinet, Defense Minister Amir Peretz said militants in Gaza had continued to fire rockets, including one on Sunday.

Abu Hamza, a spokesman for the militant group Islamic Jihad, charged that Israel was violating the cease-fire by continuing operations in the West Bank.

Israel Revamps Its Training After Hezbollah Conflict (USAT)

By Yaakov Katz

USA Today, December 4, 2006

JERUSALEM — Israel's military is overhauling its training and expanding a guerrilla warfare school in response to problems the army had in fighting Hezbollah militants in Lebanon this summer.

"If there is one lesson from the war (in Lebanon), it is that we need to train more and be better prepared," said Maj. Gen. Benny Gantz, head of the Israel Defense Force's Ground Forces Command.

Israel's military encountered a tougher-than-expected fight in Lebanon, where Hezbollah militants fought from a series of underground bunkers dug into the rocky and brushy hills of southern Lebanon.

Militants, armed with anti-tank missiles and other sophisticated weaponry supplied by Iran and Syria, killed 119 Israeli soldiers during the 34-day war.

The fighting erupted after a cross-border attack July 12 during which two Israeli reservists were kidnapped. Israel claims to have killed 500-700 Hezbollah militants during the conflict.

The fighting ended Aug. 14 with a United Nations-brokered cease-fire and a decision to beef up the U.N. force in Lebanon to more than 10,000 troops.

"There is still danger there," said Shimon Boyarski, a retired colonel and former intelligence officer. "And we need to be ready."

Israel's military overhaul includes:

•Expanding the Elyakim base, where soldiers train on terrain resembling the hilly and rocky surfaces of southern Lebanon. Training includes using paint ball guns to simulate close combat.

•Increasing overall training of Israeli forces by 40%, Gantz said.

•Creating a "Red Unit," which will study Hezbollah and Palestinian militia tactics and act as "enemy forces" during training exercises. Gantz said the Israeli military got the idea from the U.S. military.

•Opening an urban warfare center in southern Israel, meant to replicate downtown Nablus in the West Bank and Gaza City in Gaza. The center will be used to train units that conduct raids in the Palestinian territories and operate mostly in towns and cities.

Israeli officers say the military forgot many of the lessons learned during its 18-year presence in Lebanon in the 1980s and '90s.

For example, Israel's elite Egoz Unit was redeployed after Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000. The unit was formed with the mission of tracking Hezbollah militants in the terrain of southern Lebanon. After 2000, the unit was moved to the West Bank, where there is mostly urban fighting. The Egoz Unit ceased its training in more open terrain, said Lt. Col. Yair Lipshitz, commander of the Elyakim training base. This summer, the Egoz Unit lost five soldiers during one day of fighting with Hezbollah guerrillas in the Lebanese village of Maroun al-Ras, less than a half-mile from the Israeli border.

Lipshitz said Israel's military began sending all of its infantry brigades in October to Elyakim for training. Israeli brigades are typically about 2,000 soldiers. Before that, there was limited training of individuals at the base.

Elyakim provides training in camouflage and navigation with Global Positioning System devices. In Lebanon, Israeli troops trekked dozens of miles in enemy territory and laid ambushes in the thick southern Lebanese brush.

The open terrain of Lebanon also meant large formations of soldiers clashing on the battlefield, a sharp contrast from the small-unit tactics of the Palestinian territories. For some commanders, the war was the first time they had commanded their entire units in a battle, said retired major general Yoram Yair, formerly head of Israel's Southern Command. In Gaza and the West Bank, most units were deployed in small contingents of 30 troops.

"Moving on a battlefield with an entire brigade or battalion requires different skills that the commanders did not have," said Yair, who oversaw the internal military investigations into the Lebanon fight this past summer.

Cuts to the defense budget in recent years and a shift in focus over the past six years to the Palestinian insurgency in the West Bank and Gaza led to a decline in the number of days allocated to units for training, Yair said. "During the war, these gaps in the training were obvious," he said.

Infantry brigades, Lipshitz said, were not accustomed to using long-range weapons such as rocket launchers and mortars.

Israel's military will also focus training on coordinating tanks and infantry units to work better together. In Lebanon this summer, Israel deployed 400 tanks, some of which were involved in friendly fire incidents, Lipshitz said.

"Training is our insurance policy," Gantz said. "And we plan to be prepared."

Shi'ite-Sunni Battle Worsens Divide (WT/AP)

By Zeina Karam

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

BEIRUT -- Violent clashes broke out yesterday between Shi'ite and Sunni Muslims in the capital, leaving one man dead and exacerbating tensions that threaten the country's fragile political balance.

Hezbollah supporters on Friday began an open-ended sit-in in the capital in an effort to bring down the government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora. But Mr. Siniora, emboldened by Arab and U.S. support, vowed yesterday to stay in office.

As revolutionary and nationalist songs blared from protesters' tent camp in the heart of Beirut, a Mass was held at Mr. Siniora's office in memory of Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel, who was assassinated by gunmen in a Beirut suburb last month.

The service was seen as a show of solidarity with the government, which draws its support largely from Sunni Muslims and Christians who oppose involvement in the country's affairs by neighboring Syria.

A few yards away, a rival Mass organized by supporters of Michel Aoun, a Christian leader allied with the Shi'ite Muslim Hezbollah, was held at the St. George Cathedral.

The clash in Tarik Jdideh occurred as Hezbollah supporters were returning from Beirut's downtown and passed through the Sunni neighborhood.

Police officials said the two sides threw stones at each other and the clash escalated into gunfire, which killed Ahmed Ali Mahmoud, a 20-year-old Shi'ite. At least 10 persons were slightly injured in similar clashes elsewhere in West Beirut.

Hezbollah, an ally of Syria that is backed by many Shi'ite Muslims and some Christians, contends that the fight is against American -- not Syrian -- influence, saying the United States dominates Lebanon in the interests of Israel.

Mr. Siniora warned that any attempts by Hezbollah supporters to storm his office, ringed by hundreds of police officers and soldiers, tanks and armored vehicles, would lead to "a major and serious problem." The prime minister, a Sunni, appeared to be cautioning against open fighting between Sunnis and Shi'ites.

Addressing the flag-waving protesters in central Beirut, pro-Hezbollah speakers vowed to continue the campaign to remove Mr. Siniora from power.

"We will not leave until the government is changed," former Interior Minister Suleiman Franjieh, an ally of Syria, told the crowd.

The anti-Syrian coalition pledged to confront what it called "a coup" by pro-Syrian groups to undermine Lebanon's independence after last year's withdrawal of Syrian troops after three decades of domination in Lebanon.

In Jerusalem, Israeli officials warned that the fall of Mr. Siniora's moderate government could lead to the establishment of an Iranian proxy state on Israel's northern border and increase the probability of war between the two nations.

Mass Protests Continue In Lebanon (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Both sides in Lebanon's power struggle on Sunday vowed not to budge with thousands of anti-government demonstrators camping out in the heart of Beirut for a third night while prime minister Fouad Siniora insisted that he would not resign.

DOJ_NMG_0101609

The protests have been largely peaceful, but last night four people were injured in a clash when Shia demonstrators entered a largely Sunni neighbourhood of Beirut. Smaller incidents have also been reported from other areas.

The western-backed Mr Siniora, on Sunday repeated that he would not resign and said that "protest is no solution". The opposition, led by the pro-Syrian, Shia Hizbollah movement, is demanding a government of national unity.

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, and Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the German foreign minister, were in Beirut over the weekend. They met Mr Siniora separately and expressed their support for him.

In the Arab world, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak voiced strong support for the Lebanese government.

But, while visiting Beirut over the weekend Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League, called for a compromise, "an agreement between all".

In Beirut, opposition activists said that they would continue demonstrating until they had brought down the government. They also said that they would be prepared to take "additional steps" if their demands were not met.

After a mass rally on Friday, the demonstrators set up tents in front of the prime minister's office, the main government building in the heart of Beirut.

Mr Siniora and several of his ministers have been spending the night there recently out of security concerns and the building is surrounded by security forces, armoured personnel carriers and barbed wire.

At the weekend Syria came out publicly in support of the demonstrators.

Faisal Mekdad, Syria's deputy foreign minister, emphasised what he called: "the importance of respecting the choice of the Lebanese people to establish a government of national unity as demanded by the mass demonstrations".

The Israeli cabinet meanwhile voted on Sunday to go ahead with transferring control over the border village of Ghajar to the Unifil peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon.

The step, which would complete the Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon after this summer's war with Hizbollah, is seen by some as potentially strengthening Mr Siniora. Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert warned on Sunday night that Israel "would not be able to hold back for much longer" if Palestinian violations of a week-old ceasefire in the Gaza Strip continued.

His comments came as Palestinian groups accused Israel of not adhering to the increasingly shaky truce.

Under the deal struck on November 26, Israel agreed to withdraw its troops from Gaza, where they have been operating for the past five months, if militants stopped firing rockets.

Since the agreement, more than a dozen rockets have been fired into southern Israel, causing minor damage but no injuries.

Israel, meanwhile, has stayed out of Gaza.

Shiite Protester Shot Dead In Beirut As Tensions Rise (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 3 -- Sunni residents and Shiite protesters clashed in the capital Sunday, leaving one man dead and raising tension across Lebanon on a third day of demonstrations aimed at toppling the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

The shooting death of the Shiite protester was the first reported since Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim movement, and its allies launched their anti-government campaign Friday, sending hundreds of thousands of followers to downtown Beirut, where armor, barricades and troops guarded the government headquarters where the prime minister has taken up residence. Thousands have camped there since, housed in canvas tents spread across downtown; tens of thousands more joined them Sunday.

Lebanese television stations and Hezbollah officials reported several clashes in Beirut and in the Bekaa Valley, and rumors swirled about the extent of the violence in a city and country riven by divisions of politics, personal loyalties and sect. The worst clash was at the edge of the Sunni neighborhood of Tariq Jdideh, for weeks one of the city's tensest fault lines. Television stations said Sunni residents threw stones at a van carrying Shiite protesters from downtown after nightfall. Passengers got out and, in the ensuing melee, a few cars were damaged before the army stepped in and broke up the crowd.

Accounts differed on the death of the protester, whom Hezbollah officials identified as a 26-year-old. Some said he was shot during the melee, others after it was broken up. Lebanese security officials said they were still trying to confirm the details of the death. News agencies reported that as many as 12 people were hurt in all in the clashes.

There is a deep worry here that the mobilization of supporters by Hezbollah and its allies -- as well as another demonstration by Hezbollah's foes during a funeral last month -- will worsen clashes along the city's many fault lines: pro- and anti-government, Christian allies and opponents of Hezbollah, and the sectarian divisions among Christians, Shiites and Sunnis. Several fights have already broken out in Tariq Jdideh. On Thursday, dozens of Sunni and Shiite residents fought in the streets there.

In downtown, the biggest crowds gathered since the protests began Friday, giving rise to scenes that took on a surreal air. The crisis could decide the fate of the government and Lebanese politics for years to come.

Organizers said 20,000 runners took part in the Fourth International Beirut Marathon, scheduled long before the demonstration. One of its advertisements read, "Run for life." The routes were redrawn to skirt parts of the protest, but at one intersection near downtown, the marathon's posters and flags mixed with green and orange banners carried by demonstrators.

"This is democracy," said Helena Shaar, a little winded from the race. "Some demonstrate. Some go to a marathon.

"This is the puzzle of Lebanon," she added.

Near the protest itself, within eyeshot of the government headquarters known as the Serail, there were dueling Masses. One was organized by supporters of Michel Aoun, a Christian leader allied with Hezbollah, at the St. George Cathedral. Up the street, another was held inside the Serail itself, in memory of Pierre Gemayel, a Christian government minister assassinated last month. It drew Siniora, some of his government supporters and Gemayel's relatives, in what amounted to a show of solidarity.

"A solution to any problem does not come through the streets," Siniora told reporters afterward.

But there appears to be almost no attempt to reach a compromise in a crisis that erupted with Hezbollah's demand in October for a greater share of power in the cabinet and that, since Friday, has become part waiting game, part test of wills. Hezbollah has promised to keep the protests open-ended; government officials speak privately about a fear that demonstrators might try to storm the Serail, which Hezbollah and its allies denied.

After the Mass, Siniora appealed for parliament speaker Nabih Berri, an ally of Hezbollah whose movement backs the protest, to restart dialogue between the two camps. They are divided by ideology, priorities for the country and alliances -- backing for the government comes from the United States and France, while support for Hezbollah comes from Iran and Syria. Both bring different views, as well, of the summer's 33-day war with Israel. Hezbollah considers it a victory; the government blames Hezbollah for starting it. Siniora seemed to suggest counter-protests were possible, but a key ally said government supporters would simply wait. The protesters said they would, too.

"The war went for 33 days, but the protests can go on for a year," said Mohammed Zeinati, a 26-year-old protester.

Around him, tents had multiplied, some going up along the barbed wire and barricades guarding the Serail.

He smiled. "I don't think it will take that long," he said, pointing at the Serail. "I'm hoping tomorrow they all leave."

Losing Lebanon (TIME)

By Tim Mcgirk

Time, December 4, 2006

It's never a good sign for a country when the Prime Minister and most of his Cabinet members spend their days barricaded in an Ottoman-era compound. That's what Fouad Siniora and Lebanon's other top officials have done since Nov. 21, when gunmen assassinated Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel in broad daylight. Siniora's worries go beyond his personal safety. With Lebanon still trying to recover from last summer's 34-day war between Israel and the Shi'ite militant group Hizballah, the government has seen its authority undermined, renewed meddling from the country's neighbors and the growing assertiveness of Hizballah. Organized by Hizballah and its allies, about 800,000 protesters--a rather grand figure in a country of just 3.8 million--gathered in the center of Beirut last Friday to demand the resignation of Siniora. At the time, Lebanon's leader was in his barracks, surrounded by machine guns and barbed wire.

DOJ_NMG_0101611

Lebanon wasn't supposed to turn out this way. In March of last year, President George W. Bush was hailing Lebanon as a shining beacon of his Administration's "democracy agenda" for the Middle East. Close to 1 million Lebanese had flooded into Beirut to demand that Syria pull its troops out of Lebanon and end its 29-year domination of the country. The U.S. State Department coined the protests the Cedar Revolution, a more folksy title than the Lebanese term, Independence Intifadeh, which smacked of radicalism. But with six ministers having resigned since Nov. 11, sectarian tensions rising and government officials fearing for their lives, the vision of a new Lebanon is dimming fast--and with it, the Administration's bid to build a positive legacy in the Middle East beyond the wreckage of Iraq.

There are worrying signs, in fact, that Lebanon may be closer to a total meltdown than at any time since the 1975-90 civil war. An Arab diplomat told TIME that General Michael Suleiman, the commander in chief of the Lebanese Army, recently admitted that his troops would be able to contain a series of demonstrations "for only a few weeks." If Hizballah organizes protests around the country similar to those in Beirut last week, "We will not be able to cope," Suleiman reportedly said. His concern was that because many of his troops are Shi'ite, they would refuse to act against their brethren within Hizballah.

The nightmare scenario is that Hizballah's show of strength could provoke a backlash against its mostly Shi'ite supporters by Lebanon's Sunni Muslim, Christian and Druze communities. If that happens, most Lebanese believe the situation could quickly escalate into all-out civil war. As a river of pro-Hizballah demonstrators flowed toward Siniora's besieged compound last week, poultry seller Ahmad Sahd, 65, wept. "These youngsters didn't live through the civil war. I did. And it looks like it's starting again."

So why is the Cedar Revolution crashing down? Part of the answer rests outside Lebanon's borders. During the summer's war with Israel, Hizballah relied heavily on the Syrians for logistic, military and financial support. According to Israeli officials, Western diplomats in Beirut and Arab sources, Damascus acted as a conduit for Iranian weapons to reach Hizballah, allowing the group to fight the Israelis to a standstill.

Now it is payback time. Lebanese officials, along with Israeli military sources and Western diplomats, say that while Syrian President Bashar Assad may be willing to help pull the Bush Administration out of the Iraqi quicksand, he hopes to exact concessions that would allow him to treat Lebanon, where the Syrian regime has vast financial interests, as his private turf. And according to these same sources, he is unnerved by a U.N.-sponsored inquiry that implicates top Syrian officials in the February 2005 car bombing that killed former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and 22 others. Assad is hoping that the international probe will peter out. Indictments issued by a U.N.-sponsored court against members of the Syrian leadership could critically weaken the Damascus regime and lead to U.N. sanctions against Assad's clique. Hizballah pulled its six ministers out of the 24-seat Cabinet rather than vote to support an international court to prosecute the Hariri case, and the assassination of Gemayel, the scion of a powerful Christian family and a fervent anti-Syrian, was seen as further warning to Siniora. His Cabinet voted anyway to recommend an international tribunal into the Hariri killing, pushing Hizballah into the streets last week.

Hizballah also accuses Siniora's ministers of secretly siding with Israel and the U.S. by failing to provide backup during the July-August war with Israel. With its massive street demonstrations, Hizballah hopes to intimidate the country's other parties into giving it more than the six Cabinet seats it had held, enabling it to block any legislation seen as contrary to the interests of Hizballah and its backers in Damascus and Tehran.

Whether Hizballah succeeds depends on how long it can capitalize on the p.r. boost it gained from waging war with Israel. Among Lebanon's downtrodden Shi'ites, Hizballah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah now enjoys mythical status. The many faces of Nasrallah appear everywhere. At times he is portrayed as a jolly preacher, a wise scholar or a glowering warrior with his turban like a black storm cloud overhead. When a starstruck woman requested the abaya, or robe, that he wore during the war, Nasrallah obliged, and since then TV crews have been following the woman across Lebanon as she displays this now holy garment for other faithful fans.

And yet even in Lebanon, Nasrallah isn't universally adored. Many Lebanese consider it a heroic but colossal blunder on Nasrallah's part to have provoked the Israelis by having his fighters stage a cross-border raid in July and kidnap two Israeli soldiers. War damage in Lebanon is assessed at $3.6 billion. More than 1,200 Lebanese died, and 3,700 were wounded. Another 974,184 were left homeless. Says parliamentarian Saad Hariri, son of the slain former Prime Minister: "When it starts raining and getting cold, people will realize what a huge mistake it was for Hizballah to start this war." What's more, the olive groves and hills of southern Lebanon are sown with more than 1 million bomblets from Israeli cluster bombs, say U.N. experts, making it hazardous if not lethal to wander into these areas.

Hizballah was badly swatted by the Israelis too. The Israeli military says it has the names of over 550 Hizballah fighters who were killed, including 400 belonging to the Iranian-trained Ã©lite special forces unit, the Nasr Brigade. In Lebanon, the thinking is that those numbers are probably inflated, that many of the dead were militants unaffiliated with Hizballah who grabbed a gun and joined the fighting. Whatever the body count, Hizballah has lost assets. As part of a cease-fire agreement, 10,000 U.N. peacekeepers and 15,000 Lebanese troops moved into southern Lebanon, long an exclusive preserve of Hizballah. As a result, Nasrallah's men lost possession of a number of strategic underground bunkers, complete with showers and dining halls, honeycombing the limestone hills for miles near the Israeli border. Many of its field commanders were killed in the fighting, and according to Lebanese and Israeli sources, Hizballah inquisitors are now weeding out and shooting suspected collaborators who helped the Israelis by pinpointing militia targets. And every Hizballah office in Beirut was sledge-hammered by Israeli warplanes. The rubble of concrete slabs, steel and scraps of clothing was scooped up by bulldozers into heaps; it has added a dozen large hills to the coastal landscape south of Beirut.

Hizballah's opponents say that as time passes, resentments toward Nasrallah are likely to build. That may be the main reason that Hizballah is again girding for war. The next round could be even uglier. While most of the other communities still have stockpiles of arms stashed away from the days of the civil war, Hizballah's force is stronger and better organized than its rivals, say Beirut-based diplomats. But the various players in Lebanon may find outside backers. The Christians could again find support from the Israelis; and the Saudis, who are alarmed at the growing Shi'ite influence in Lebanon through Hizballah, may find Sunni militias to bankroll. Sunni jihadists may also join the fray, turning Lebanon into a mini-Iraq. Lebanese intelligence recently broke up a ring of 200 Syrian-backed Islamists holed up in a Palestinian refugee camp who had a hit list of 36 Lebanese politicians.

Posters of Nasrallah, usually grinning, may crop up everywhere, but the cleric himself is still deep in hiding. During the summer's fighting, the Israelis made no secret that they were trying to assassinate him. Western diplomats in Beirut say they are trying to persuade the Israelis that killing the Hizballah boss is no longer a good idea. His murder could spark reprisals across the Middle East. Hizballah has ways of taking revenge. After Israelis targeted a previous Hizballah leader in 1992, the militia blew up the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires. Should Nasrallah be killed, Israeli missions today would be similarly at risk--as would U.S. interests around the world. But these sources say that the Israelis may be willing to court that danger if they have a chance to take out Nasrallah, whom they view as a particularly clever and dangerous enemy. The damage that Lebanon and the Middle East will face if another war breaks out could make the destruction caused by Hizballah and Israel last summer look like a brisk whirlwind by comparison. Somali Troops Seek To Recapture Town (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, December 4, 2006

Somalia's government has sent hundreds of troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers to recapture a strategic southern town seized by the country's powerful Islamic movement, military officials and witnesses said Sunday, as dozens of families began fleeing the area.

The Islamic militia, which has seized the capital and most of the country's south since June, declared itself in control of the southern town of Dinsor on Saturday, saying it moved into the area without encountering resistance or firing a shot.

With the seizure of the town, the Islamic Courts Union has now effectively surrounded the weak, transitional government in its fortified base in Baidoa, the only town it controls.

Fears were mounting that a battle for Dinsor, about 75 miles southwest of Baidoa, could be the spark that ignites a war in Somalia. The town controls a vital bridge linking Baidoa with southern Somalia and the key port of Kismayo.

"The Courts' provocative and unjustified act of aggression in the region must be faced with force," warned the government's justice minister, Sheik Aden Nour Mohamed.

DOJ_NMG_0101613

Some 600 government troops were deployed late Saturday in pickup trucks mounted with machine guns to drive the Islamic group out of the town, said a senior military official on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Another official speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation said two Ethiopian battalions were in support.

The Islamic movement's spokesman, Sheik Abdirahim Ali Mudey, promised that any government assault would be met with resistance. Witnesses said there were about 200 Islamic fighters with dozens of armed trucks preparing defensive positions in the town.

"Since the town is now under the control of the Islamic courts with the willingness of the local people, any attack waged against it would meet a fierce battle," Mudey said.

One shopkeeper, Mo'alim Isgow Ahmed, said at least half the town's residents have fled.

"We left Dinsor to save our lives," said Mad Ali Gab, who arrived in Baidoa by car. "They are preparing for war, so we cannot wait for the fighting to begin."

Ethiopia, a largely Christian nation, fears the emergence of a neighboring Islamic state and has acknowledged sending military advisers to help the Somali government.

A confidential U.N. report recently obtained by The Associated Press said there were up to 8,000 Ethiopian troops in the country supporting the government. Last week, Ethiopia's parliament authorized military action if attacked by the Islamic movement, which has declared holy war on Ethiopia over its troop incursions.

The U.N. report said Ethiopia's regional rival, Eritrea, had 2,000 troops in the country.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another. The transitional government was formed with the help of the U.N. two years ago, but has struggled to assert its authority.

The U.S. circulated a draft U.N. resolution late Friday that would authorize the deployment of a regional military force to protect the fragile government. The troops would likely come from a seven-nation East African group, but would not include Somalia's neighbors, like Ethiopia.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Friday he expects Security Council experts to discuss the draft on Monday.

Tehran Court Judgment Could Turn Over US Embassy To Plaintiff (CSM)

By Mike Theodoulou

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

NICOSIA, CYPRUS

The United States is in danger of losing its sprawling embassy in Tehran to an Iranian businessman who was abducted in a bungled sting operation by US customs agents 14 years ago.

A Tehran court awarded Hossein Alikhani more than half a billion dollars in damages in the first lawsuit by an Iranian against the US for supporting terrorism.

Now, three years after that ruling, a writ of enforcement is due to be served this week, from when the US will have 10 days to respond by paying or presenting a list of assets in Iran to be seized as compensation.

The most valuable of those assets is the defunct US embassy. Mr. Alikhani, a Cyprus-based businessman, estimates it to be worth at most $120 million.

He spent 105 days in a US jail in 1992 after being abducted in the Bahamas for allegedly violating US sanctions against Libya. He argued the sanctions did not apply to non-Americans outside the US.

The Bahamian government was furious, saying it had not been consulted. Alikhani's case also caused consternation in Congress.

In his ruling three years ago, Chief Justice Mansour Pour Nouri of the Third Branch of the Tehran Public Court accused US investigators of "kidnapping, false imprisonment, using force, battering, abusing, and ultimately inflicting physical and psychological injuries."

DOJ_NMG_0101614

Alikhani says he has made no plans yet what to do with the embassy if he receives the deeds. "Maybe I would make it into a school, a university or a public park," he told the Monitor from Tehran.

While few observers expect the embassy's title to land in Alikhani's hands any time soon, the embassy is a potent emblem of the enmity between the US and Iran since 1980, after militant students seized the embassy and held 52 US diplomats hostage for 444 days. The compound, its walls scrawled with anti-American graffiti, has long housed Revolutionary Guards.

The US says that under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, diplomatic premises are immune from court judgments. But Alikhani counters that the US flouted that convention in 1996 when it adopted the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act. The act stripped countries on the State Department's list of sponsors of terrorism of their immunity from lawsuits in US courts for terror acts perpetrated against US citizens.

Since then, US courts have awarded hundreds of millions of dollars in damages to victims of terror overseas.

"So how can they come back and say that according to the Vienna Convention their assets are immune?" Alikhani asks.

Alikhani says his action was motivated by principle and followed US court rulings to hold Iran responsible for damages awarded to Americans held hostage by pro-Iranian groups in Lebanon during the 1980s.

"Everyone is suing Iran. For instance, the hostages in Lebanon. They were taken in Lebanon by Lebanese but they sued Iran and not the hostage-takers themselves or the Lebanese government," Alikhani says.

His legal action in Iran followed his bid in a Florida court to sue the US for $360 million. The case collapsed in 2001 with a ruling that he had agreed not to sue as a condition of his release. His lawyers argue that was invalid because Alikhani agreed under threat of an indefinite prison term.

Alikhani's saga began in July 1990, when he sought to buy $1.6 million of spare parts for gas generators from a Florida company. He planned to ship the equipment through Germany to Libya for use in a government oil field.

The company said that the parts could not be supplied because Libya was under US sanctions for supporting terrorism. Alikhani did not pursue the deal. However, the Florida company tipped off US Customs and agreed to set up a sting operation that resulted in Alikhani's arrest.

For 30 days, Alikhani was questioned in several Florida hotels, where he says he was shackled to his bed at night, before being moved to a Miami prison where inmates included Manuel Noriega, former dictator of Panama. With anger in the Bahamas and in Congress over the abduction, Alikhani accepted a token charge and was freed after being sentenced to time served.

Paulson Reaches Out On China (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Hank Paulson, US treasury secretary, will on Monday begin a series of policy talks with industry leaders to discuss the Bush administration's policy towards China ahead of a high-level delegation to Beijing next week.

The former head of Goldman Sachs, an investment bank, will on Monday meet executives from manufacturing companies, including Procter & Gamble, before on Wednesday sitting down with financial services companies - including Citigroup – as well as those from other sectors.

A Treasury official said Mr Paulson was "reaching out on his China agenda" before heading to Beijing for a "strategic economic dialogue" that will include top-ranking cabinet officials and Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman.

The delegation will press for greater currency flexibility, but Mr Paulson also wants to cultivate an intimate discourse about long-term economic goals with the Beijing leadership, many of whom he knows personally from his time at Goldman.

Mr Paulson's negotiating tactics will on Monday be questioned by impatient manufacturers, who blame Beijing for fuelling a record US trade deficit with China of more than $200bn by maintaining a cheap currency.

Frank Vargo, from the National Association of Manufacturers, said executives would "make sure he understands how frustrated manufacturers are over China's currency", suggesting there would be a "pretty vocal back-and-forth discussion".

Mr Vargo praised the Treasury secretary as "a guy who exudes confidence he can get the job done", but said there was demand for "action early next year" from key figures such as Doug Oberhelman, head of Caterpillar, and John Surma, president of US Steel.

DOJ_NMG_0101615

Some manufacturers are understood to be ready to throw their political and financial weight behind Democratic lawmakers who are threatening to initiate punitive sanctions against China in the wake of the mid-term elections.

But among financial services groups there is support for Mr Paulson's patient pursuit of reforms that would give them access to sectors such as pensions, insurance, and broking.

Jeremie Waterman, a director at the US Chamber of Commerce, said the goal of the dialogue for business was to "institute practices to allow mergers and acquisitions, allow trade and allow capital to flow freely." He said there was widespread corporate backing for Mr Paulson.

Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, will also meet business leaders this week as she prepares for the China visit and holds separate talks with South Korea in Montana in a frantic bid to reach a free-trade deal.

The five-day negotiations with South Korea are seen as the last chance to agree the outline of a bilateral trade pact before President George W. Bush's special fast-track trade promotion authority expires this summer.

A US trade official said: "We need to move the ball down the field this week to have a realistic chance of completing a deal in time."

Negotiators were downbeat about the prospect of a breakthrough despite signs of US concessions on the most politically-sensitive issues for Seoul, where there have been mass protests against the deal.

China Export Controls Contested (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

Business groups are upset about a Bush administration move to strengthen restrictions on exports to China. They said the controls will not keep the communist country from acquiring sensitive technologies and will cost too much to implement.

In July, the Commerce Department proposed tighter restrictions on exports of certain high-technology products.

"The administration has not demonstrated that this proposed change would provide any additional security benefit and has not articulated a clear purpose for it," a group of 24 trade associations -- ranging from the General Aviation Manufacturers Association to the American Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong -- said Thursday in a letter to the Commerce Department.

The proposal would cover specified software, machine tools, computers, marine equipment and other exports.

If the purpose is to deny access to China's military, "it is destined to be ineffective due to widespread foreign availability ... including production in China, and the fact that all indications thus far are that it will be unilateral," said the letter, released Friday.

Executives say they also are concerned about the cost of compliance.

Business Software Alliance President Robert Holleyman said the rule would impose "stifling financial costs on American companies seeking to comply."

High-technology business groups often comment on this type of regulation, but Dirk Van Dongen, president of the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors, said his organization has not been involved in other export-control issues.

The proposed changes "will shut down markets for American firms without denying Chinese buyers the products they desire," he said.

The administration is committed to the proposal, said Assistant Commerce Secretary Christopher A. Padilla, who was in Berlin on a trip to discuss the controls with European allies.

He said the proposal is "motivated by fundamental national security concerns and it's consistent with basic U.S. foreign policy toward China, which is to encourage legitimate civilian trade while discouraging China's double-digit, rapid military modernization."

The administration encouraged companies to submit evidence that the technologies were available in China, he said, and would examine ways to ease the compliance burden without endangering national security.

Mr. Padilla said businesses have dealt with more stringent nonproliferation controls, but business representatives insisted that the China proposal would be more difficult to handle.

One European telecommunications company has determined that its compliance cost alone would be $165 million, several sources said.

DOJ_NMG_0101616

Larry M. Wortzel, chairman of the bipartisan, congressionally mandated U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission, said business had legitimate concerns about restricting only U.S. companies and about the compliance burden.

The proposed controls could hold U.S. businesses accountable if the Chinese government conceals a company affiliation, he said.

"When this all sorts out, I hope that the government will not require business to do the sorts of intelligence work to figure out what subsidiaries in China might be really defense-related or hidden parts of the government, when for itself the government really can't do that effectively with its own intelligence apparatus," he said.

Beijing Steps Up Movement To Integrate Tibet (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, December 4, 2006

LHASA, China — Chinese supermarket baron Zhang Xiaohong reveres Tibet's austere Buddhist culture so deeply that he spent $12.5 million to build a luxury hotel that doubles as a Tibetan folklore museum.

The Brahmaputra Grand Hotel, in Tibet's high-altitude capital of Lhasa, is the region's only five-star hotel. It houses Zhang's extensive collection of Tibetan antiquities, including a 1,000-year-old warrior's costume. “I must do something to protect and promote Tibetan culture,” says Zhang, founder of the Bright Red Supermarket chain.

In reality, the culture Zhang wants to preserve risks disappearing beneath a surge of Chinese investment, migration and tourism. Beijing is accelerating its 5½-decade campaign to bring Tibet to heel. It is spurring high-growth economic policies and crushing political dissent in a drive to integrate the separatist-minded region into the rest of China.

Tibetan exiles say political repression is on the rise. In recent months, Chinese authorities have jailed several Tibetans, including monks, for possessing or distributing pro-independence leaflets, posters or photographs of the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader.

In September, Chinese border guards fired on an unarmed group of about 80 Tibetans fleeing to Nepal through a Himalayan pass. One of those fleeing, a Buddhist nun, was killed. A Romanian mountaineer filmed the attack.

“The killing of Tibetans by Chinese authorities is a matter of common practice,” the Dalai Lama told Asahi Shimbun, a Japanese newspaper, last month.

Since May, Chinese officials have directed “an unprecedented wave of criticism” at the Dalai Lama, says his brother Gyalo Dhondup. “This is a major shift in their attitude, unprecedented in the past 27 years of contact with Chinese officials,” Dhondup told Radio Free Asia last month.

Beijing's political crackdown has coincided with major economic initiatives that have brought:

•Tourism. In July, China completed construction of the 2,500-mile Beijing-Lhasa rail line, which carries the world's highest-elevation passenger train. Since then, tourist arrivals — mainly of ethnic Chinese — have soared. In July and August, 913,000 travelers surged into the sparsely populated region, a 54% increase over the same two-month period a year ago, says Lhaba Phuntsok, a Tibetan who heads the official China Tibetology Research Center in Beijing.

Government banners hanging across the streets of Lhasa proclaim the railway to be “the happiness line for all the peoples of Tibet.”

Phuntsok says the railway creates a healthy incentive. For Tibetans to benefit economically from tourist traffic, he says, they must preserve the things that lured tourists in the first place: Tibet's distinct culture and the pristine beauty of its high plateaus and mountains.

The Dalai Lama, though, has warned that a tide of outsiders brought in by rail could lead to “cultural genocide” in Tibet, which is home to just 2.8 million of China's 1.3 billion people.

Zhang, the Chinese tycoon, says Chinese influences could overwhelm Tibet. “It's a challenge, and we will have to work hard” to protect the local way of life, he says.

•Migration. Figures on the number of ethnic Chinese living in Tibet remain highly sensitive. At a news conference for foreign journalists in July, Tibet's Beijing-appointed governor, Champa Phuntsok, declined to break down the current population of Lhasa.

DOJ_NMG_0101617

He said the railway will bring “an inevitable increase” in Chinese workers, but maintained the official line that Tibet is more than 95% non-Han. Han is the ethnicity of the Chinese majority.

Many Tibetan Lhasa residents say their capital of 500,000 people is now at least half Chinese. At the time of the Chinese takeover in 1950, the city's population barely topped 30,000, and only a few dozen were Chinese.

“The authorities are trying to stamp out any breath of dissent and are deliberately encouraging people to move there,” says Robbie Barnett, a Tibet specialist at Columbia University in New York.

•Jobs and investment. Beijing has poured money into giant infrastructure projects, and private investment has followed. But opportunities created by a boom in construction, retail and services have gone disproportionately to Chinese newcomers. Only 10% of the workers on the new rail line were Tibetans, says Zhu Zhensheng, senior engineer at the Ministry of Railways. Most of the current railroad staff is Han, he says.

At Zhang's Brahmaputra Grand Hotel, where rooms range from $170 to $1,100 a night, the management team was imported from neighboring Sichuan province. Only a third of the employees are Tibetan, sales manager Hong He says.

In October, hundreds of young Tibetans staged a rare public protest in Lhasa to complain about government job discrimination. The protest followed the regional government's decision to fill 98 of 100 job openings with ethnic Chinese applicants.

Beijing says it has taken steps aimed at protecting Tibetan culture, such as ensuring that 70% of the books published in the region are in the Tibetan language. Government officials also have loosened restrictions on Tibetan religious worship and reopened many of the monasteries and holy sites that were closed in the 1980s.

Even so, the government keeps a firm grip. “Every month, a work team from the religious affairs bureau and the police come to the temple to make us oppose the Dalai Lama,” says a young monk at the Jokhang temple, Lhasa's holiest site. He declined to be identified for fear of persecution.

The vice director of administration at the temple, monk Ngawang Quzha, acknowledges that all monks must undergo “patriotic study lessons.”

Interviewed in the presence of officials from the regional government, he says: “Most of the monks in Tibet would not hope the Dalai Lama returns to Tibet.”

The mistrust between Chinese and Tibetans is deep.

“The Tibetan people are very suspicious,” Barnett says, “and the Chinese are suspicious that Tibet is not grateful for this largesse.”

Mao Pengfei, a farmer who moved to Lhasa from China's Henan province in 2003, says he has no Tibetan friends. “We live in different areas, and I don't speak any Tibetan,” says Mao, who now works as a taxi driver.

Fan Liming, a Chinese engineer who helped build a rail station 70 miles outside Lhasa, scratches his head at the slow pace and religious underpinnings that are central to Tibetan life. “I saw Tibetan pilgrims prostrate themselves on the ground, get up, walk three paces, then prostrate again,” Fan says. “They could take months to get to Lhasa. It's difficult for us Han to understand their faith. These people are not in a hurry.”

Tashi Tsering, a Tibetan author who has funded construction of 69 rural schools to preserve the written language, lives near Jokhang in a house squeezed between two Chinese-owned fast-food restaurants, Dicos and California Beef Noodles. He marvels at the new rail system but says it shouldn't be used to bring in migrants. “I hope the Chinese government will never make that decision,” he says.

Development has brought shopping malls and giant apartment blocks to Lhasa. The city's old quarter is now dotted with shiny, tiled buildings familiar throughout China. Yuthok Lam, the main shopping street, has been modernized in keeping with Tibetan architectural style, albeit with one incongruous import — plastic palm trees.

Tourists like to see the original buildings, “but that doesn't suit development needs,” says Que Longkai, director of architecture at Lhasa's Tibet University. Chinese outsiders “are not wolves,” says the academic, a Lhasa resident for the past five years. “Development is the only way.”

DOJ_NMG_0101618

Kelsang Phuntsok, president of the exile group Tibetan Youth Congress, based in Dharamsala, India, says China's view of development does little for the people he left behind. “Tibetans don't need skyscrapers. They need education, food, security and freedom,” he says. “A hungry man doesn't need a Mercedes.”

Chinese Doublespeak (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

Who said China's Communists don't have a sense of humor? On the same day that the country's politicized courts rejected two closely watched appeals, the mandarins in Beijing proclaimed that they will ease restrictions on the foreign press ahead of the 2008 Olympics.

On Friday, the Beijing High Court upheld a trumped-up fraud conviction against New York Times researcher Zhao Yan. The decision wasn't a surprise. Mr. Zhao had long been a thorn in Beijing's side for his reporting on the plight of poor farmers. His current legal troubles began in September 2004, when a Times report hinted at a conflict between President Hu Jintao and former President Jiang Zemin over military personnel. A subsequent article predicted that Mr. Jiang would resign his post as head of the military. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Zhao was arrested on charges of leaking state secrets. The Times maintains that Mr. Zhao was not the source for the latter story.

Prosecutors dropped the state secrets charge in August for lack of evidence. But Beijing couldn't lose face, so the court pursued an unrelated, and very fishy, fraud charge against the journalist. After a closed trial (justified by the state secrets charge, even though that count had already been dropped), Mr. Zhao was convicted and sentenced to three years behind bars. In a five-minute "hearing" last week, a court denied Mr. Zhao's appeal. He will spend the next 10 months in jail serving out the rest of his sentence.

Also on Friday, Chen Guangcheng's appeal was rejected by a county court in Shandong province. Mr. Chen, a blind lawyer who worked to reveal abuses of China's one-child policy, was convicted of property damage and inciting mob violence in a trial that, like Mr. Zhao's, stunk of political interference. In the 30-minute retrial, the defense wasn't allowed to present witnesses or evidence, according to the Associated Press. He lost his appeal.

Human rights advocates suggest it's no accident Mr. Zhao's appeal landed on the same day Beijing eased restrictions on foreign journalists. That's because the new "freedoms" do not apply to Chinese research assistants working with foreign correspondents. Mr. Zhao's fate appears designed not just to punish a squeaky wheel but to intimidate other research assistants, too.

Thus, even while Beijing is trying to make itself look more open to foreign reporting as a concession to the International Olympic Committee, the government is menacing the Chinese journalists who make much of that reporting possible. Some correspondents will be able to cover preparations for the 2008 games. But in the wake of the Zhao ruling, no one will be fooled about what Beijing really thinks of a free press.

U.S., Seoul Discuss Free-Trade Deal (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

SEOUL -- Talks on a proposed U.S.-South Korea free-trade agreement -- which is President Bush's biggest bilateral trading initiative and would be Seoul's largest such deal -- resume today with the toughest issues on the table.

The progress the two countries make this week at a Montana ski resort will determine whether they can reach a deal in time for Mr. Bush to seek a simple yes-no vote on it from Congress. His trade-negotiating authority will expire in June and Congress will then take back the ability to change trade deals, a power that inhibits countries from negotiating with the U.S.

For South Korea, the pact would provide a boost to its already-healthy sale of products to the U.S. and drive a broad restructuring of numerous protected industries as well as its consumer market. For the U.S., the deal would have a smaller relative effect, though it should help American farmers and manufacturers sell more goods in South Korea, now the world's 10th-largest economy.

Earlier negotiating rounds progressed more slowly than expected and the two countries are just now tackling the thorniest issues, such as how to reduce tariffs on food and autos. The session this week in Big Sky, Mont. -- the fifth formal negotiating round -- was previously expected to be the last one.

As the round opens, the two countries are also squabbling over South Korea's ban on U.S. beef, which was imposed in late 2003 after a case of mad-cow disease was reported in Washington state. In October, Seoul lifted the ban partially by agreeing to buy boneless beef, which is considered the safest because the disease, when present, is in bones.

But South Korea has rejected the first two multi-ton shipments of U.S. beef, the latest on Friday, after X-rays found a coin-size bone fragment in the first shipment and three sliver-size pieces in the second. The bone fragments posed no health hazard, but South Korea wants assurance it is receiving boneless beef.

A proposed free-trade agreement is particularly contentious in South Korea because it represents a major break with the country's economic history. South Korea set up sizable trade barriers in the 1960s and 1970s to assist its transformation from a poor, agrarian backwater into a wealthy industrial power. An FTA with the U.S. would remove many of those barriers and open the door for other countries to seek better trade terms with it.

In autos, South Korea imposes an 8% duty on imports and assesses taxes, based on engine size, that fall hardest on imports. And in food, duties affect almost every import, from 8% on candy to 42% on beef to 600% on popcorn. U.S. duties on Korean goods are lower in almost every case.

The two countries traded $72 billion in goods and services last year, with South Korea selling about $16 billion more to the U.S. than the U.S. sold to it.

A deal with South Korea would be the largest free-trade agreement in value for the U.S. since the North American Free Trade Agrement was reached 12 years ago. Mr. Bush's administration is also hoping to complete FTAs with Malaysia, Panama and Thailand before its negotiating authority ends.

Though nearly invisible in the U.S., the FTA negotiations are in the news almost every day in South Korea as protesters, supporters and economists argue about the potential effect of a pact. Farmers and trade-union members recently stepped up the frequency and size of their protests.

Free-trade supporters in both countries worry their message is being drowned out. "In Korea, business groups and other supporters are not prepared to beat up the passionate opposition, while, in the U.S., we do that," said Myron Brilliant, president of the U.S.-Korea Business Council.

South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun has repeatedly expressed commitment to forging an FTA with the U.S. The country has completed FTAs with Chile and Singapore and is negotiating one with Canada, which has drawn token protests. On a trip to Australia this week, Mr. Roh is expected to announce that South Korea will begin free-trade talks with that country.

Chavez Wins Re-election By Wide Margin (AP)

By Ian James

AP, December 4, 2006

President Hugo Chavez won re-election by a wide margin Sunday, giving the firebrand leftist six more years to redistribute Venezuela's vast oil wealth to the poor and press his campaign to counter U.S. influence in Latin America and beyond.

Challenger Manuel Rosales conceded defeat but vowed to remain in opposition. During the campaign, Rosales accused Chavez of edging Venezuela toward authoritarian rule and warned the president could undertake even more radical policies if re-elected.

Minutes after the results were announced, Chavez appeared on the balcony of the presidential palace singing the national anthem. He pledged to deepen his effort to transform Venezuela into a socialist society.

"Long live the socialist revolution! Destiny has been written," Chavez shouted to thousands of flag-waving supporters wearing red shirts and braving a pouring rain.

"That new era has begun," he said, raising a hand in the air. "We have shown that Venezuela is red!... No one should fear socialism... Socialism is human. Socialism is love," Chavez said. "Down with imperialism! We need a new world!"

DOJ_NMG_0101620

Since he first won office in 1998, Chavez has increasingly dominated all branches of government and his allies now control congress, state offices and the judiciary. He has called President Bush the devil, allied himself with Iran and influenced elections across the region.

Chavez also has used Venezuela's oil wealth to his political advantage. He has channeled oil profits toward multibillion-dollar programs for the poor including subsidized food, free university education and cash benefits for single mothers. He has also helped allies from Cuba to Bolivia with oil and petrodollars.

He now promises to solidify his social program.

With 78 percent of voting stations reporting, Chavez had 61 percent to 38 percent for challenger Rosales, said Tibisay Lucena, head of the country's elections council. Chavez had nearly 6 million votes versus 3.7 million for Rosales, according to the partial tally.

Turnout among the 15.9 million eligible voters was 62 percent, according to an official bulletin of results, making Chavez's lead insurmountable.

"We will continue in this struggle," Rosales told cheering supporters as he conceded defeat.

Some supporters at his campaign headquarters wept, while others were clearly angry.

"We have to do something," said Dona Bavaro, a 36-year-old Rosales supporter. "My country is being stolen. This is the last chance we have. Communism is coming here."

Rosales, a cattle rancher and governor of western Zulia state who stepped down temporarily to run against Chavez, focused his campaign on issues such as rampant crime and corruption, widely seen as Chavez's main vulnerabilities.

A top Rosales adviser, Teodoro Petkoff, said the voting was carried out in a "satisfactory manner." He said some irregularities had occurred but most were resolved. Another member of the Rosales camp had accused pro-Chavez soldiers of reopening closed polling stations and busing voters to them.

Even before polls closed, Chavez supporters celebrated in the streets, setting off fireworks and cruising Caracas honking horns and shouting "Chavez isn't going anywhere!"

Earlier, Chavez loyalists jarred voters awake hours before dawn in Caracas with recordings of reveille blaring from truck-mounted loudspeakers.

"We're here to support our president, who has helped us so much," said Jose Domingo Izaguirre, a factory worker who waited hours to vote. His family recently moved into new government housing.

Rosales supporters accused Chavez of deepening class divisions with searing rhetoric demonizing his opponents.

Alicia Primera, a 54-year-old housewife, was among voters so passionate about the choice that they camped out overnight in voting queues.

"I voted for Chavez previously. I cried for him," Primera said. "Now I'm crying for him to leave. He's sown a lot of hate with his verbiage."

The campaign has been hostile, with Chavez calling Rosales a pawn of Washington and Rosales saying he was on the alert for fraud. Rosales' campaign had endorsed the electronic voting system as trustworthy — as long as no attempts were made to thwart it.

More than 125,000 soldiers and reservists were deployed to safeguard the balloting.

In Washington, State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus stressed "the importance of a free, fair and transparent process."

Conflict and ambition have marked the rise of Chavez, 52, from a boy selling homemade sweets in a dusty backwater to a failed coup commander in 1992 and now a leader who could set the tone of Latin American politics for years to come.

Constitutional reforms he oversaw in 1999 triggered new elections the following year that he easily won. Loyalists helped him survive a 2002 coup, a subsequent general strike and a 2004 recall referendum.

Chavez says he would convene a commission upon re-election to propose constitutional reforms, likely including an end to presidential term limits. Current law prevents him from running again in 2012.

DOJ_NMG_0101621

The president insists he is a democrat and will continue to respect private property — though he has boosted state control over the oil industry and has said he might nationalize utilities. Venezuela is the world's fifth largest oil exporter and soaring oil prices have made it the continent's fastest growing economy.

Chavez has pledged at least $1.1 billion in loans and financial aid to Latin American countries in the past two years, and billions more in bond bailouts for friendly governments as well as generously financed oil deals. But the largesse has proved a weakness at home, with polls suggesting many Venezuelans believe the aid impedes efforts to address the country's own problems.

Chavez, who says Fidel Castro is like a father to him, has built increasingly close ties with Cuba, sending the island oil while thousands of Cuban doctors treat Venezuela's poor for free.

Chávez Wins Easily In Venezuela, But Opposition Protests (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 3 — President Hugo Chávez was re-elected in a landslide on Sunday night, as voting tallies poured in from throughout the country. But representatives of the opposition candidate contended that the results were tainted by irregularities.

With 78 percent of the votes counted, Mr. Chávez was ahead with 61 percent, compared with 38 percent for Manuel Rosales, the governor of Zulia State, Venezuela's electoral council said late Sunday night as it declared Mr. Chávez the winner. Thousands of supporters filed into the streets around Miraflores, the president palace downtown, to hear Mr. Chávez deliver a victory speech in the rain.

"Long live the socialist revolution!" Mr. Chávez yelled to the crowd, pumping his fist in the air. His supporters, many of them dancing, reacted by chanting, "Ooh-ah, Chávez isn't leaving!"

The win for Mr. Chávez gives him a stronger mandate to press forward with his socialist-inspired policies in Venezuela and abroad. He signaled as much in his victory speech, invoking figures from Jesus Christ to Pancho Villa as influences for his ambitious plans.

The tension between the campaigns of Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales reflected a polarized electorate in Venezuela, but by contrast the voting itself was largely tranquil, with few reports of clashes or other violence. Both candidates spent heavily in the race, with supporters for Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales each using American polling companies until well into Sunday evening.

Evans/McDonough, a polling company based in Oakland, Calif., and hired by Venezuela's national oil company, released an exit poll indicating that Mr. Chávez was ahead, with 58 percent of the vote, to 40 percent for Mr. Rosales.

The results showed Mr. Rosales doing better than had been forecast in some polls, and his advisers said that quick counts indicated that he had won in several states and Caracas. But Mr. Rosales conceded defeat in a brief speech Sunday night, while saying the margin of Mr. Chávez's victory was narrower than official results indicated.

"It's been a hard fight against the mechanisms, all the dimensions of the government," Mr. Rosales said.

Antonio Márquez, an official with Mr. Rosales's campaign, said: "There's been a great deal of pressure exerted by the government to demonstrate that they won. This climate of tension is not positive for the country."

Other campaign officials for Mr. Rosales said soldiers had forced some polling places to remain open past the 4 p.m. closing time on Sunday to allow supporters of Mr. Chávez to vote. International observers in various parts of the country, however, said the election took place without signs of wrongdoing.

"One had to be moved by the earnestness and attention to detail," said Martin Garbus, a trial lawyer from New York invited by Venezuela's government to observe the election in Sarare, a town in the state of Lara. "it was a lesson in participatory democracy."

Once the official results are in, how Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales react will determine whether Venezuela will return to the instability and street violence that had marred earlier elections. Mr. Rosales said Sunday night that he would continue leading the political opposition in the country, but it was clear that many critics of Mr. Chávez were hoping for a stronger response.

DOJ_NMG_0101622

Still, the margin in Mr. Chávez's favor reflected widespread support for the president as Venezuela reaps the economic benefits of high oil prices. Mr. Chavez has redirected government spending by creating an array of social welfare programs that benefit the poor.

In Caracas, voting at the Simón Bolívar elementary school in San Blas, a slum in the Petare district, proceeded calmly on Sunday morning. Once outside after voting, some voters put on red shirts and hats, indicating their support for Mr. Chávez. "I'm red, very red," said Carlos Gelvis, an unemployed man from Petare, in a reference to a refrain of Mr. Chávez's campaign.

Chavez Re-elected Venezuela's President (FT)

By Andy Webb-Vidal

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Hugo Chávez was re-elected Venezuela's president for a six-year term on Sunday with 61 per cent of the vote, 23 percentage points ahead of his main challenger, according to preliminary official results from electoral authorities.

Manuel Rosales, the predominant opposition candidate, won just over 38 per cent of the vote, the National Electoral Council said on Sunday evening.

Tibisay Lucena, head of the CNE, said that the preliminary result was based on the tally from 78 per cent of polling stations around the country.

Mr Chávez's margin of victory of between 20 and 25 percentage points - if confirmed after an audit comparing electronic voting results with paper records - would be roughly in line with opinion polls published in the run-up to Sunday's ballot.

An exit poll released on Sunday evening by US pollster Evans/McDonough suggested Mr Chávez was leading with 58 per cent compared with 40 per cent for Mr Rosales.

Mr Chávez, a former army officer who often rails against the Bush administration and who has governed the world's fifth largest oil exporter for almost eight years, pledged to radicalise his left-leaning "Bolivarian Revolution".

"Today begins a new era," screamed Mr Chávez during his victory speech from a balcony at the presidential palace. "The central idea of that new era will be the deepening and the expansion of the Bolivarian Revolution towards Socialism."

But earlier in the evening, opposition leaders had alleged that voting centres had been re-opened in some areas to allow hastily mobilised presumed pro-Chávez supporters to vote.

Mr Rosales, who stepped down as governor of the western oil-rich state of Zulia to challenge the incumbent, was expected to address his supporters on Sunday night.

On Sunday, Mr Rosales had claimed that "problems" were delaying and adversely affecting voting in as many as a third of polling stations.

He alleged that were signs that voters who claimed they had voted for him received "null vote" paper receipts from the electronic voting machines.

Before the first partial official result was announced, Teodoro Petkoff, a leading political commentator and Mr Rosales's chief campaign strategist, urged opponents to be patient for the result of the auditing process, which was expected to take several hours.

Electoral witnesses and some international observers from the Organisation of American States and other institutions were due to oversee the audit of electronic ballot results at about 17,500, or 54 per cent, of polling stations.

Shortly after the partial results were announced, Mr Chávez celebrated by singing the national anthem from a balcony at the presidential palace.

Government supporters set off a volley of fireworks in the centre of the city and in the poor slums that encircle the city, home of Mr Chávez's political constituency.

During the day, Mr Chávez, who often portrays himself as the voice of the people, turned up to vote in a poor neighbourhood of Caracas driving a red Volkswagen Beetle.

Venezuela's ChÃ¡vez Wins Decisive Victory (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101623

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 3 -- By an overwhelming margin, Venezuelans reelected President Hugo ChÃ¡vez on Sunday, further extending a presidency that began when the former paratrooper was swept into power eight years ago, intent on overturning Venezuela's old social order. ChÃ¡vez will receive another six years in office to broaden his leftist revolution and contest American initiatives across Latin America.

"Today is a new era," the fiery populist leader told screaming supporters. "Venezuela is red, very red."

With 78 percent of the votes counted by 10 p.m., electoral authorities announced that ChÃ¡vez, 52, had secured 61.3 percent of the vote to 38.4 percent for Manuel Rosales, whose candidacy united a fractured opposition but had only four months to gather momentum. Minutes after the National Electoral Council announced that ChÃ¡vez had garnered 5.9 million votes to 3.7 million for Rosales, the president appeared at the balcony of the presidential palace.

Euphoric supporters, ignoring a downpour, burst into the streets, waving flags, shooting off fireworks and chanting pro-ChÃ¡vez slogans.

"Everything has been completed, the great victory of the Bolivarian revolution," ChÃ¡vez said as rain soaked him and close aides on the balcony. "It's another great victory: a victory of love, a victory of peace, a victory of hope. It's a victory for all Venezuela. May Venezuela be victorious always."

With the win, ChÃ¡vez's Bolivarian revolution will last until at least 2013, although ChÃ¡vez told reporters on Thursday that a change to the constitution could permit him to rule even longer.

"I'm not planning to say in the constitution, 'Hugo ChÃ¡vez will remain in the presidency until he dies,' because that would be perverse," said ChÃ¡vez, who under the law can serve only one more term. "It's very different to study the possibility of indefinite reelection. It will always be the will of the people."

Rosales, 53, later conceded defeat without declaring fraud, as opponents had done in the last major election they lost to ChÃ¡vez, a recall referendum two years ago. Rosales did, however, say that his campaign believed the electoral council's figures were off and that the final results were tighter.

"The truth is that though the margin is closer, we recognize that today we were defeated. But we continue to fight. We will remain in the street," he said. "It's not time to give up."

Earlier in the evening, an aide close to Rosales, Julio Montoya, called early voting estimates "false and manipulated," without offering proof. Other officials in the Rosales campaign said voting equipment malfunctioned at several polling sites and that there were delays in pro-Rosales districts.

Authorities with the five-member National Electoral Council said they had not found serious discrepancies.

"Everything is perfectly normal in the country," Vicente DÃ-az, who is considered partial to the opposition, told reporters Sunday night. Observers from the European Union, the Atlanta-based Carter Center and the Organization of American States monitored the vote and reported only isolated incidents by early Sunday night.

The ChÃ¡vez victory further consolidates the tide of leftist politicians who have won office in Latin America in recent years, including a former labor leader in Brazil, Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva; Michelle Bachelet, a market-friendly socialist in Chile; and Evo Morales, the indigenous leader of Bolivia. Although Colombia, Peru and Mexico this year elected pro-trade, pro-U.S. presidents, leftist leaders who criticize market reforms and sharply question the Bush administration's policies in the region were elected last month in Nicaragua and Ecuador.

But Venezuela's government is the most defiantly anti-Bush, with ChÃ¡vez making theatrical accusations about U.S. designs on Venezuela's oil deposits, even though many of the biggest producers here are American multinationals.

ChÃ¡vez's government will ensure that Venezuela, which says it has the largest oil reserves outside the Middle East, remains a price hawk in the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries. The president has also said he would solidify Venezuela's relations with Cuba and Iran, countries the Bush administration is working to isolate. ChÃ¡vez, who survived a 2002 coup that the White House tacitly endorsed, often accuses Washington of backing undemocratic opposition groups.

"This is another defeat for the devil," ChÃ¡vez said, referring to Bush with a term he used to describe his U.S. counterpart at the United Nations in September. "Venezuela has independence. Venezuela is free. Venezuela will never be a North American colony."

With bugles and fireworks awakening voters across Caracas and beyond early Sunday morning, Venezuelans flocked to 32,000 voting booths guarded by 125,000 soldiers and reservists. ChÃ¡vez drove himself in a red Volkswagen Beetle to cast his ballot at the 23rd of January housing development, not far from the presidential palace.

"I feel very happy, very happy," he said. He added that with this election, he has faced off and defeated his opponents four times, including his first win in 1998, an election in 2000 after the constitution was changed to permit him to be elected to a six-year term, and the 2004 recall that left his foes demoralized.

With oil prices having reached historic highs, and ChÃ¡vez's Fifth Republic Movement in control of the National Assembly and other institutions, the government has funneled billions of dollars into education, health and nutrition programs. Venezuela's economy has been roaring, growing at 18 percent in 2004 and 9.3 percent last year.

Although private investment has dwindled and half of Venezuelans work in the black market, the government's spending has put money in banks and in people's pockets. Business sectors dependent upon government contracts are booming, and the stock index on Friday had its biggest increase in nearly four years on the strength of the belief that ChÃ¡vez would win.

In a recent opinion poll conducted by Ipsos for the Associated Press, 66 percent of respondents said they approved of ChÃ¡vez's administration. The poll showed that although most Venezuelans see ChÃ¡vez as authoritarian, they also overwhelmingly approve of his social policies, which have given a voice to a vast underclass that had felt forgotten under previous governments.

In CaÃ±o Amarillo, a working-class neighborhood near downtown Caracas, several people said they voted for the president, overlooking concerns they had about crime and his combative style.

"I think the president has done what he said he would do," said Jose Medina, 54, a schoolteacher. "He's put the social policies above everything else."

Another voter, Pedro Fiaggio, 76, summed up his support for ChÃ¡vez by rattling off the programs that benefit him and his wife, Lesbia, 62 -- a healthy pension, subsidized food and educational programs for seniors. He said the opposition would never have offered the same.

"They are people who are always out for their own self-interest," he said. "We didn't have a real vote with them."

The opposition, which has suffered a series of setbacks since the coup, had hoped to appeal to voters by focusing on issues such as spiraling crime, alleged corruption and unchecked spending. Rosales, 53, governor of Zulia state, the historic heart of Venezuela's oil industry, had proposed a populist handout program to cut into ChÃ¡vez's support base.

"The future of Venezuela is at stake," Rosales told supporters as he cast his ballot.

There were, to be sure, millions of Venezuelans who agreed that a change was needed. "We've had eight ears without work, nothing stable," said Victor Castellanos, 53, a construction worker.

Another voter, Marco Ravelo, 39, a cabdriver, said he was tired of ChÃ¡vez's obsession with the Bush administration, as well as the government's generous outlay of aid to poor countries. "We need better relations with other countries," he said. "ChÃ¡vez divides countries. He gives away all this oil, and we still have poverty and misery here."

Chávez Landslide May Speed Venezuela Changes (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- President Hugo Chávez won a landslide election to a new six-year term, sparking fears among foes that he will accelerate his quest to install what he calls "21st-century socialism" in the world's fifth-largest oil exporter.

With 78% of the vote counted, Mr. Chávez, who has built a massive base of support by spending billions on subsidized health, education and other social programs benefiting poor Venezuelans, won 61% of the vote to opposition candidate's 38%. His victory stoked concern among his opponents that Mr. Chávez, an admirer of Cuban leader Fidel Castro, would press the accelerator on what his opponents fear is his attempt to remake Venezuela along the lines of communist Cuba.

"Long live the socialist revolution," cried Mr. Chávez after singing the Venezuelan national anthem from a window in the presidential palace as a crowd below shouted "Uh, Ah, Hugo no se va," or "Uh, Ah, Hugo's not leaving."

Teodoro Petkoff, a top official in the campaign of opposition candidate Manuel Rosales, said while there had been scattered "incidents," the election had "developed in a satisfactory way." Mr. Rosales conceded late last night.

Encouraged by his victory, Mr. Chávez will no doubt redouble efforts to create an anti-American and anti-free-trade bloc in the hemisphere, while lending diplomatic support to other anti-U.S. countries such as Iran. Last week, Rafael Correa, a Chavez ally, won Ecuador's presidential election. But most analysts believe that Mr. Chávez's populist "Bolivarian" revolution, which relies on his free spending of billions in oil income, isn't easily exportable.

Mr. Rosales, a tough and experienced politician, managed to unite a fractured and inept opposition and mount a feisty campaign against Mr. Chávez, who had enormous state resources. It was unclear whether Mr. Rosales, who took a leave of absence as governor of Zulia, Venezuela's second-most-important state, to run for the presidency, would try to mount a national opposition movement to Mr. Chávez or return to Zulia, where he retains a regional power base.

Opponents fear Mr. Chávez's landslide could consolidate his power for years. Already Mr. Chávez, who has repeatedly said he will stay in power until 2021, controls all 167 seats in Venezuela's National Assembly, as well as Venezuela's judicial branch. With the political wind at their backs, Mr. Chávez, 52, and his congressional allies are expected to push through a constitutional overhaul abolishing term limits, permitting the fiery populist to run repeatedly for re-election.

Mr. Chávez may also move to increase state control over private education, and further extend control over Venezuela's highly centralized economy by promoting noncapitalist forms of production and exchange such as cooperatives. Quirkily, Mr. Chávez last month called for the introduction of barter in the country's rural economy. The Venezuelan government already has in place extensive foreign-exchange controls, while Mr. Chávez exerts control over the state oil company, Petróleos de Venezuela SA, or PDVSA, which is the motor of this oil-dependent economy.

Mr. Chávez has also said he favors forging a single government party from the handful of parties that now support him. Analysts believe Mr. Chávez would also increase the already prominent role of Venezuela's armed forces in the government.

The landslide was a not-unexpected triumph for Mr. Chávez, who has dominated and convulsed Venezuelan politics for more than a decade. He first erupted on the scene as one of the ringleaders of a failed coup in 1992. He served two years in prison but was released as part of an amnesty in 1994.

Four years later, capitalizing on a general sense of disgust with Venezuela's political parties, widely seen as corrupt, Mr. Chávez won the presidency with 56% of the vote. He then redrew Venezuela's constitution, giving him much wider powers. In 2000 he again was elected president. But his fiery rhetoric directed against Venezuela's middle and upper classes, which he labeled "oligarchs," his confrontational stance with the U.S., and his closeness with Mr. Castro violently split the country.

Mr. Chávez is expected to continue Venezuela's bankrolling of Cuba's hard-pressed economy. Analysts say Venezuela's aid to the island, which includes about 103,000 barrels per day of petroleum products, could be as much as $3 billion a year. In turn, Cuba provides the services of more than 20,000 doctors as well as an untold number of security agents. While Mr. Chávez already exerts almost total control over Venezuela's government institutions, he could well face resistance if he tries to mold Venezuela's chaotic, consumerist and largely nonideological society along austere Cuban lines.

"In Cuba if you have two televisions, you have to give one to the government. You can't do that because we are free," says Yelitza Ojeda, 33, a maid at a luxury Caracas hotel whose 15-member family all voted for Mr. Chávez. "The same way we put him in power, we can knock him out of power, but I don't think he wants to do a Cuban-style government here."

Another likely restraint on Mr. Chávez' radical ambitions is the widespread corruption that has flourished under his government. A newly rich class of government officials, military officers and businessmen with close links to the government, known as Boliburgeses, or Bolivarian bourgeoisie, has sprung up in the last few years. These wealthy and powerful barons now have foreign bank accounts, apartments in Miami and private jets they are loath to lose. "The powers in the Chavista movement - the military, mayors, government ministers, and top managers of state companies -- are all capitalists," says Juan Carlos Zapata, a political analyst here. "They are nervous about where the system is going and where Chávez is going."

Lebanon Again At The Brink (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101626

BEIRUT, LEBANON

Fresh from fighting Israeli troops in south Lebanon this summer, militant Hizbullah is engaged in a new battle - this one political. Its supporters and its opposition allies are camping on the streets of Beirut determined to bring down the Western-backed Lebanese government.

Hizbullah's new campaign, which entered its third day Sunday, brings into sharp relief the conflicting motivations underpinning the group, in which its ambitions as a national party are balanced against obligations as an Iranian and Syrian ally in the struggle to curb US regional influence.

But to win politically at home, especially in its bid to bring down the anti-Syrian March 14 ruling coalition, Hizbullah has to convince Lebanon that it isn't simply pushing an agenda dictated by Tehran and Damascus.

"The Syrian-Iranian camp, led by Hizbullah, has begun to implement a plot for a coup," proclaimed a headline in Saturday's Al-Mustaqbal newspaper, which is owned by the family of Saad Hariri, who heads the March 14 bloc.

To be sure, Hizbullah denies that its actions are dictated by outsiders. "Definitely Michel Aoun is not allied to Syria and Iran, and he's a big component of this opposition movement," says Ali Mokdad, a Hizbullah member of parliament, referring to a retired general who heads a mainly Christian opposition party and fought the Syrian Army in Lebanon in 1989-90. "This accusation is not logical. We are a completely Lebanese movement."

Rows of coiled razor wire and armored vehicles mark the new front line in Lebanon's latest political crisis. The barricades are strung across roads leading to the Grand Serail, the Ottoman-era military barracks that today houses the offices of the prime minister, Fouad Siniora. Mr. Siniora and several cabinet colleagues have been working and sleeping in the safety of the Grand Serail since the assassination two weeks ago of Pierre Gemayel, industry minister and a Christian leader.

A stone's throw from the hilltop building are dozens of white canvas tents erected by the protesters Friday evening. One city square facing theGrand Serailand the glass and stone United Nations building is occupied by supporters of Hizbullah and its allies in the Amal Movement, another by Christian and Druze opposition groups.

A towering bank of loudspeakers broadcasts a steady diet of Hizbullah military songs and recorded speeches by Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbullah's charismatic leader.

"We will be here not less than five days," says Ali Allawi, a Hizbullah supporter from Tyre in south Lebanon. "It might take longer because those people up there are crocodiles," he adds with a dismissive gesture at the nearby Grand Serail.

The long-simmering political crisis escalated two weeks ago when a depleted government endorsed a UN resolution to form an international tribunal to try those suspected of killing Rafik Hariri, a former prime minister who died in a truck bomb explosion in February last year. The vote went ahead without the participation of six ministers - including all five Shiites - who quit the government prior to the emergency cabinet session.

Emile Lahoud, Lebanon's staunchly pro-Syrian president, as well as Nabih Berri, the parliamentary speaker and ally of Hizbullah, has ruled the government's approval of the tribunal as unconstitutional due to the absence of the Shiite ministers and the lack of prior coordination between the president and prime minister.

The March 14 coalition suspects that the Hizbullah-led opposition is acting on behalf of Syria to hinder or delay the formation of the tribunal. A UN commission investigating Hariri's murder has indicated the involvement of senior Syrian and Lebanese security officials.

But Hizbullah dismisses the notion that the tribunal lies at the root of the present troubles, insisting that the street protest is solely about domestic grievances. "The talk about the tribunal is just an excuse by the government," says Mr. Mokdad. "This is a Lebanese affair. We want a government of national unity that represents all the Lebanese, including the groups that make up March 14."

The opposition says its campaign was spurred by the March 14 coalition refusing to grant it a number of cabinet seats proportionate to its share of parliament. The opposition component of the 24-seat government included four ministers considered allies of Mr. Lahoud. But recently they had begun to distance themselves from the president, shifting the balance of power in the cabinet firmly in favor of the March 14 bloc.

"All we wanted was to replace Lahoud's share with our allies to restore the balance in the government," says Ali Hamdan, an official with Amal. "They [the government] should stop saying that Hizbullah is hijacking a large part of Lebanese society," he adds. "These are not the Taliban, they are Lebanese."

Still, Hizbullah's opposition also reflects a deep mistrust of a government that it regards as a tool of US foreign policy. The Shiite party was angered by what it considered to be a lack of support from the government during the war with Israel and has accused it of plotting to disarm Hizbullah's military wing on US orders to benefit Israel.

The Bush administration, which fully endorsed the mass street protests of 22 months ago that brought down the pro-Syrian government of then Prime Minister Omar Karami, has likened the Hizbullah-led equivalent to a "coup" attempt.

With US authority in Iraq steadily waning, Lebanon finds itself playing a key role in the confrontation pitting Washington and its regional allies against an anti-Western alliance grouping Iran, Syria, Hizbullah, and Hamas.

If Hizbullah and its allies succeed in toppling the government, US influence in Lebanon will inevitably weaken in favor of Syria and Iran. And that, say some analysts, is an underlying motive for Hizbullah's political gambit.

"I think Hizbullah's primary perspective has to be regional," says Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut. "They are stuck in a regional agenda because they are financed by Iran."

Chávez Easily Wins Fourth Term (MH)

By Phil Gunson And Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, December 4, 2006

CARACAS - President Hugo Chávez won his fourth presidential bid in eight years on Sunday, defeating career politician Manuel Rosales and boosting his "21st Century Socialism," which includes widespread social projects, increasing relations with countries such as Cuba and Iran, and diminishing relations with the United States.

The National Electoral Council, or CNE, announced at 9 p.m. EST that Chávez had received 61 percent of the vote and Rosales 38 percent, with 78 percent of the votes counted.

The victory was greeted with fireworks, small parades, dancing and chants of "Uh, Ah, Chávez no se va!" -- Chávez will not go -- throughout a rain-soaked Caracas.

"Long live this day of victory! -- your destiny was already written!" Chávez told the thousands of red-clad supporters who had gathered in front of the presidential palace to celebrate with their leader.

Rosales, who had succeeded in reuniting a fractious opposition movement in his short campaign, conceded victory to Chávez.

"They beat us, but we will continue to fight," Rosales told a crowd of supporters.

But the lifelong politician from the western oil producing state of Zulia may have a difficult time keeping a united front, as previous Chávez victories have been greeted with incredulity and cries of fraud.

Chávez's incredible rise to president in 1998 -- after participating when he was an army lieutenant colonel in a failed military coup in 1992 -- is almost as amazing as his seven-year run as the leader of this oil-rich nation of 27 million people.

Chávez survived a coup attempt in 2002, a national strike later that same year and a recall referendum in 2004. Along the way he changed the country's constitution, and stacked almost all of its courts, councils and prosecutors' offices with his allies. A Chávez-controlled legislature has also passed laws squelching opposition press and given rise to fears that he is more a dictator than democrat.

Internationally, Chávez played a key role in rebuilding a fragmented OPEC and driving oil prices to record highs. He built a name as an outspoken critic of the Bush administration and world leader of the poor: From northern New York State to the Patagonia, Chávez's name resonates with the underclass.

"He's not given me anything," said José Brito, a 45-year-old handyman who voted for Chávez in the poor Catia district in western Caracas near where Chávez himself voted. ``But he's helped members of my family, my friends, my neighbors."

Chávez's freewheeling use of his oil revenue helped his friend and mentor, Fidel Castro, create an economic coalition outside the U.S. sphere of influence. Courting countries like Iran perturbed Washington, seemingly powerless to slow Chávez' march toward ``21st Century Socialism."

DOJ_NMG_0101628

About the only one who seems to be able to slow Chávez down is the Venezuelan president himself, who may have overstepped his bounds recently by declaring the podium at the United Nations smelled of "sulfur" because President Bush had spoken there, and that Israel was in the wrong for attacking Lebanon-based Hezbollah guerrillas. The outbursts may have cost his country a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council last month.

Still, oil affords Chávez tremendous latitude in foreign and domestic affairs. Chávez's oil wealth has bought friends abroad and helped him start widespread health, education and subsidy programs at home that sustain his popularity despite rising crime and corruption that rank this country among the most dangerous and graft-prone in the hemisphere.

"I voted for my commander," said Jorge Mendoza, a 48-year-old carpenter, referring to Chávez, after voting in the poor neighborhood of Catia in western Caracas. ``He does things that no other government has done."

Mendoza said two of his sons got new houses from the Chávez administration after mudslides destroyed their homes in 1999.

And if this election proved anything, it was that Chávez is as much image as substance. The president arrived to vote in a poor neighborhood in western Caracas in a red Volkswagon Beetle, a longtime symbol of working class and intellectual revolutionaries in Latin America. After voting, he spoke about his leftist partners in the hemisphere.

But Chávez's socialist messages aside, Venezuela continues to be a largely capitalist country. Restaurants and malls remain packed with patrons of all classes taking advantage of an oil boom that has created a new wealthy class that has some of the same tastes in whiskeys and private airplanes as the old.

Still, Chávez remains the symbol of a seismic shift in Latin American politics. From Nicaragua to Brazil, the region is electing leftists who spend more money on their own social welfare than paying off their foreign debt. Chávez plays the dual role of financier and cheerleader of these changes and promises to continue pushing for more regional integration of its loosely knitted components.

The future also promises more controversy and changes at home.

The president has said he would create a commission to study changing the country's constitution again, possibly giving him endless opportunities to run for president in the future.

At the same time, he's reiterated that he is not a threat to private property, even while he's hinted that his "socialist" revolution here will be more profound in years to come.

Chávez has some problems. His own movement is splintered by corruption and envy, and crime rates are rising.

But if this election is any indication, Chávez still seems to have the confidence of the poor majority.

"He's the president of the humble people," said Lady Fernandez, a 52-year old nurse who voted in Catia.

Clashes Break Out On 3rd Day Of Protests In Beirut (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, December 4, 2006

BEIRUT — Tens of thousands of protesters led by the militant Shiite group Hezbollah poured into Beirut for the third day Sunday in a show of force aimed at toppling the elected government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora.

“Saniora out, Saniora out!” Abbass Kaiss, 19, of Beirut chanted with fellow Hezbollah supporters.

The protests, which Saniora described as an attempted coup, had been peaceful until Sunday, when clashes broke out between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Police officials told the Associated Press that a 20-year-old Shiite Muslim was shot and killed in a neighborhood of West Beirut. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not allowed to speak to the press.

The death happened as a group of Hezbollah supporters were returning home from the downtown protest and passed through the predominantly Sunni neighborhood. Police officials said the two sides threw stones at each other before shots were fired.

Saniora says the protests are an attempt by Syria and Iran to bring down a democratically elected government. Syria and Iran support Hezbollah, sending arms and money to what the U.S. State Department says is a terrorist group.

Saniora said he has received words of support from other Arab nations as well as the United States and France.

DOJ_NMG_0101629

"This government will continue as long as it enjoys the support and backing of the constitutional institutions in the country, most importantly Parliament," he said.

The Saniora government is largely backed by Sunni Muslims and Christians who oppose involvement in Lebanon's affairs by neighboring Syria.

"We will remain strong," said Walid Jumblatt, a senior member of the Saniora coalition in Parliament. "There is a legitimate government and an illegitimate government that wants to topple it."

The majority of the seats in Lebanon's elected parliament are held by a coalition opposed to Syrian influence. Syria withdrew its military forces from Lebanon last year after a 29-year occupation but is accused of assassinating politicians in the country since its departure.

Hezbollah controls 35 of the 128 seats in Parliament but is demanding a third of the seats, which would allow it to veto some policies. Among those is an attempt to prosecute individuals for the assassinations.

Hezbollah's five members in the government resigned after its demands were refused.

Friday, hundreds of thousands of people descended on the capital to demand the government resign. They set up tents and appeared to be prepared to remain for days.

The Lebanese army has dispatched armed security services and thousands of soldiers backed by armored vehicles to central Beirut. They are under orders to stay neutral but protect government offices from any attempt to storm them.

The government has urged its supporters to stay at home and not confront protesters.

"We will stay 50 days and nights, or until Saniora goes away," said protester Nadir Ghabress, 15, who was camping in a tent city in Martyrs and Riad al-Solh squares.

"We want to change the government; we want Nasrallah," he said, referring to Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader who orchestrated the kidnapping of Israeli soldiers in the summer the sparked a 34-day war with Israel.

Also turning out in force were thousands of supporters of Michel Aoun's Christian Free Patriotic Movement, who sported their orange colors while Hezbollah waved its yellow flags.

Aoun has aligned himself with Hezbollah, perhaps in a bid for greater power since he has long fought Syrian influence.

"This goes beyond religion," said Patrick Nakhle, 33, a Beirut lawyer and Aoun supporter.

"We are Christians, they are Shiites," he said, pointing to Hezbollah demonstrators. "But we are all Lebanese under one flag."

Chavez Defeats Foe In Landslide (WT)

By Kelly Hearn

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- A barrage of fireworks rattled windows last night in this expectant city as election officials announced that President Hugo Chavez, the oil-funded socialist revolutionary who has vilified the Bush administration, won a landslide victory over his conservative opponent.

The first-round preliminary results showed Mr. Chavez with 61.3 percent of the vote and Manuel Rosales with 38.4 percent.

The news erupted through a city grown tense in recent weeks.

Within minutes of the announcement, Mr. Chavez was addressing a rain-soaked crowd of screaming supporters in his trademark red shirt -- a symbol of his socialist revolution.

Standing on the balcony of the presidential palace, he led the crowd in song, declaring the historic election a "victory for the future" and at times chanting "justice, justice, justice."

A loss by Mr. Rosales, a conservative who unified a fragmented opposition, hands Mr. Chavez six more years to guide the world's fifth-largest oil producer down a socialist path seen by many as a line against waning U.S. influence in Latin America.

Since coming to power in 1998, Mr. Chavez has earned a near iconic status among Venezuela's poor.

Mr. Chavez's party controls Venezuela's legislature and judiciary.

Flush with oil money and seemingly impervious to domestic political challenge, he has publicly called President Bush "the devil" and frequently lambasted U.S. foreign and economic policy.

DOJ_NMG_0101630

Meanwhile, he has sought oil, trade and military ties with nations such as Iran, Russia and China.

Voting tables that had no voters waiting in line were officially closed at 4 p.m. as a steady rain settled over Caracas, the capital.

But opposition leaders complained that Venezuelan troops loyal to Mr. Chavez had in some cases intervened to keep voting booths opened after the official closing time.

Enriche Marquez, a Rosales campaign official, called on the military to cease interfering and "respect the law."

Officials at Venezuela's National Election Council (CNE), had released no results by press time though recent polls gave Mr. Chavez a comfortable lead over Mr. Rosales.

Other polls showed Mr. Rosales narrowing that lead in recent days.

Voting tables that had no voters waiting in line were officially closed at 4 p.m. as a steady rain settled over Caracas, the capital.

Soon afterward, however, opposition figures appeared on television accusing army officials in Caracas and the state of Sucre of forcing some voting centers to reopen. Enrique Marquez, a Rosales campaign official, called on the military to cease interfering and "respect the law."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Rosales had asked the CNE to examine reported voting-machine malfunctions at some stations located in areas heavily populated by his supporters.

But Mr. Chavez dismissed the claims as "excuses" in a subsequent press conference.

"The information I have is that the process is moving along normally," the former military officer said before driving himself from a Caracas polling station in a red Volkswagen that was mobbed by his supporters.

Election officials later assured the public that no irregularities had been found.

In Caracas, voters had awakened by pre-dawn fireworks lined up for city blocks to pass their judgment on Mr. Chavez's socialist platform, which blends nationalist and militarist rhetoric with oil-fueled social spending.

"I will vote for my commandant Hugo Frias Chavez," said Jordi Romero, a 21-year-old security guard. "He has fixed our streets, built clinics and given the poor houses to live in."

But Manuel, a 30-year-old taxi driver and evangelical Christian who did not want to give his last name, said while he supports Mr. Chavez's social efforts, he fears the president will restrict freedom.

"I am scared that the police will have too much power and that he will restrict the church," he said.

Opposition leaders have criticized Mr. Chavez for his lavish foreign spending and for installing what they say is a Cuban-style dictatorship here. Mr. Chavez has cast his opponent as being a puppet of U.S. interests.

He is the region's staunchest critic of Mr. Bush and U.S. foreign and trade policies. But his rhetoric belies strong trade ties with the United States, especially petroleum sales made through the Venezuelan-owned Citgo Petroleum Corp., based in Texas.

Recent elections in Nicaragua, Bolivia and Ecuador have brought leftist allies of Mr. Chavez to power. And some analysts say a victory would secure his place as the anchor of a regional alternative to the United States and its regional allies, such as Colombia.

David Dent, a Towson State University political scientist, said an alliance between Mr. Chavez and incoming president Rafael Correa in Ecuador could signal "a Bolivarian effort to zero in on Colombia for a trifecta in northern South America."

Venezuela's Chavez Reelected (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez was resoundingly reelected Sunday, setting the scene for a promised "deepening" of his socialist revolution and a broader role as leftist lightning rod on the world stage.

With about 80% of the ballots counted, Chavez had captured 61% of the vote, compared with 38% for Manuel Rosales, election officials said.

His reelection is expected to further Latin America's move to the left after victories by five left-leaning presidential candidates in the region in little more than a year.

DOJ_NMG_0101631

Chavez, who pledges to revise his nation's constitution to allow him to serve indefinitely, may try to fill the leadership void created in July by the illness of Cuba's Fidel Castro, supporters say.

Relations between the firebrand Chavez and the United States are at an ebb because of suspicion by the Bush administration over Chavez's overtures to Iran, his billion-dollar arms purchase agreements with Russia, and what Washington says is his lack of cooperation in fighting terrorism and drug trafficking.

Venezuela is the fourth-largest supplier of oil to the United States, and revenue generated by high crude oil prices has allowed Chavez to wield considerable influence among his neighbors through energy subsidies and aid programs.

Chavez, addressing a crowd in front of the presidential palace, bellowed, "Long live the preordained popular victory. Long live the reign of socialism, the future of Venezuela…. Another defeat for the North American empire. Another defeat for the devil. Down with imperialism."

Rosales conceded Sunday night, saying he was up against "an entire state, all the power of a government in all its structure and dimensions."

"Tonight we have to recognize that they beat us," said Rosales, addressing supporters at his campaign headquarters.

The governor of oil-rich Zulia state, Rosales mounted a challenge to Chavez in September after opposition parties belatedly rallied around him.

Despite his decisive loss, observers credited Rosales with laying the groundwork for a new opposition movement.

His campaign complained of several irregularities, including refusals by National Election Commission officials at some polls to open ballot boxes for audits, as is legally required, and the keeping of voting booths open past the deadline.

Chavez and other government officials said the election was a success with no "relevant" irregularities.

"This is my fourth election where my government has been tested, and you can see the dynamism and depth of Venezuelan democracy," Chavez said after arriving before noon at a polling place in the poor January 23rd neighborhood in Caracas, driving an old Volkswagen Beetle. "It's a happy day for Venezuela."

Chavez, who was imprisoned after a failed coup attempt in 1992, was first elected in 1998 and reelected in 2000. He withstood a recall vote in 2004.

Observers say he will waste little time in reshaping the Venezuelan Constitution to advance his "socialism for the 21st century," which includes opposition to U.S. economic policies, among them a regional free-trade agreement.

Constitutional revisions probably will include unlimited reelections, Chavez told reporters. Without the change, his upcoming term would be his last.

Carlos Escarra, a Chavez confidant and congressman, said in an interview Sunday that he and other legislators would meet this week with Chavez to plan for a sweeping new constitutional "architecture" that would strengthen the legal standing of presidential decrees, such as the transfer of ownership stakes in businesses and factories to worker cooperatives.

Legislative approval of such a revision is considered a foregone conclusion because Chavez loyalists occupy all of the 165 seats in Congress.

Opposition candidates boycotted congressional elections in December 2005.

Opponents fear that the constitutional revisions might produce a more authoritarian state. Although acknowledging his popularity among Venezuela's poor, Chavez's critics say he has weakened democratic institutions by taking control of the judiciary, Congress and the military, leaving little room for dissent.

"What is coming is not the deepening of the revolution, because there is none, but of the authoritarianism of Chavez," said historian Agustin Blanco Muñoz of the University of Central Venezuela.

Human rights lawyer Asdrubal Aguilar fears that Chavez will use a constitutional assembly to "liquidate political plurality…. He wants to eliminate diversity and replace it with a personal relation with society."

Voters waited hours to cast ballots. Lines stretched for blocks, and there were reports of polling machine failures. Opposition voters such as university student Sheila Bermudez, interviewed near the American School, claimed the breakdowns were "tortoise maneuvers" to discourage supporters of Chavez's opponent.

But long waits to vote were the norm even in pro-Chavez, lower-class neighborhoods such as Las Minas. Store manager Noreliza Iza said her three-hour wait was typical for Venezuelan elections and was "acceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0101632

The Chavez victory had been predicted by virtually all pollsters, who cited his lavish spending on social programs and public works. Escarra said the victory would extend "the leadership of Chavez and Venezuela in the world."

Since last year, left-leaning candidates have won presidential elections in Chile, Brazil, Ecuador, Nicaragua and Bolivia, although not all adhere to Chavez's agenda.

Escarra predicted that Chavez would "fill the leadership space" created by Castro's illness.

Chavez has rhetorically pummeled the United States in recent years while seeking to counter U.S. influence with oil-financed aid programs to Argentina, Bolivia and the Caribbean. Of most concern to the United States are his commercial relations with Iran and his arms deals with Russia.

Chavez this year signed agreements to buy scores of Russian military airplanes and helicopters. He also sealed a deal with Moscow to build an assault rifle factory here.

"Soon we will be selling them to countries in Latin America," Chavez told reporters last week.

Chavez also criticized Bush in the Thursday interview, saying the U.S. president would "not accept the new world is multipolar, that it won't kneel before the United States."

Chavez plans to launch additional massive public works projects, including lumber, steel and aluminum factory cities in eastern Venezuela, and to build another bridge over the Orinoco River, in addition to the $1.2-billion span opened last month.

The links to Brazil, as well as a proposed natural gas pipeline to Argentina, are part of Chavez's southward development push.

He said his plans also included extending trade relations with China, which announced $5 billion in planned investments here. China and Venezuela also established a $6-billion fund to finance social projects in Venezuela.

Chavez also said he planned to increase the construction of subsidized housing, which totaled 120,000 units this year.

When he took office in 1999, Venezuela was "lost, a ship sinking at sea," Chavez told reporters. "Now Venezuela has direction…. Yes, we have committed mistakes, and there are many things left to do. That's why we are getting six more years."

Chirac And Merkel Unite Over Turkey (FT)

By Hugh Williamson, Peggy Hollinger And Wolfgang Proissl

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Germany and France will on Tuesday demand tougher conditions for Turkey's troubled European Union membership bid, in a move likely to cause new divisions over Ankara at next week's EU summit.

Jacques Chirac, French president, will use a meeting with Angela Merkel, German chancellor, to back her proposal that would effectively set Turkey a new 18-month deadline to open its ports to Cyprus, an EU member, the Financial Times has learned.

Such a deadline was not included in the European Commission's proposal last week on the partial freezing of the EU's membership talks with Ankara. But both Berlin and Paris believe such a deadline is necessary to maintain pressure on Turkey, officials said.

Ms Merkel said at last week's Nato summit in Riga that the Commission position needed to be "strengthened". A "review clause" on whether Ankara had opened its ports "would be desirable so that the council [EU summit] can review Turkey's progress, perhaps in 18 months' time", she said.

An official in Mr Chirac's office told the FT on Sunday: "France and Germany are on the same page with regard to Turkey."

Officials close to the French government said Mr Chirac would endorse Ms Merkel's stance at the bilateral summit on Monday near Saarbrücken, in Germany.

A Franco-German axis could unify EU countries, including Portugal, Greece and Cyprus, that are sceptical of Turkey's bid, but is also likely to alienate the Turkish government further.

Britain and some Scandinavian countries oppose setting Ankara new deadlines.

Finland, which holds the EU presidency, hopes an agreement on partial freezing of talks can be reached at an EU foreign ministers' meeting on December 11. But a spokeswoman for Ms Merkel's office said last night that the chancellor "expects the review clause to be discussed" at the EU summit on December 14-15.

DOJ_NMG_0101633

Officials in Brussels criticised the Franco-German move. A Finnish senior diplomat said: “We don’t think there should be an additional clause. The Turks already feel strongly punished by the Commission proposal as it is.”

The Commission is proposing that the bloc agree on the freezing of eight of the 35 separate policy areas under the membership talks. Ankara has refused to open its ports – a condition of EU membership – because of its long-running political dispute with Cyprus, but would have unlimited time to do so under the Commission draft.

EU Pacts With Kazakhstan Aim To Ease Reliance On Russia For Gas (WSJ)

By Marc Champion

Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

ASTANA, Kazakhstan -- In the European Union's growing struggle to break Russia's grip on the bloc's gas imports, all roads are leading to Kazakhstan.

Today, the EU signs a memorandum of understanding with Kazakhstan on energy aimed at binding Europe closer to this vast country -- which stretches from the Caspian Sea to China.

Yesterday, EU Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs signed an accord on nuclear cooperation, with a view toward increasing Kazakhstan's share of uranium sales in the EU to 20% from 3%. Kazakhstan has one of the world's largest uranium reserves. Last week, Mr. Piebalgs, a Latvian who speaks fluent Russian, attended an EU-inspired meeting in Kazakhstan of regional energy ministers that produced a road map toward integrating their countries' energy grids and regulatory systems with the EU's.

Yet in all this flurry of documents and initiatives, the thing Mr. Piebalgs and many EU countries want most -- the construction of a gas pipeline across the Caspian Sea that would connect the gas-rich countries of Central Asia directly to Europe -- isn't mentioned.

Kazakhstan is critical to building the home stretch of a new southern energy corridor that would carry gas from the Caspian and beyond to the EU, via the Caucasus and Turkey. Such a corridor for the first time would allow the countries of Central Asia to sell gas directly to the EU, rather than to Russian gas monopoly OAO Gazprom, which can then re-export the gas at a high profit, as it does currently. Russia accounts for 44% of EU gas imports, a proportion that is expected to rise significantly, especially after Russia builds a northern gas corridor directly to Germany, under the Baltic Sea.

"The trans-Caspian gas pipeline for us is really important to take more seriously," Mr. Piebalgs said in an interview here. He said that by 2015, Kazakhstan could be producing 106 billion cubic meters of gas annually, about 20% more than Germany consumes each year. Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, which also could supply the pipe, already are big producers.

A raft of pipelines to make this new East-West energy corridor are either in planning stages or under construction. A gas connector from Turkey to Greece and from there to Italy is being built. Another pipeline, known as Nabucco, is planned to take gas from Turkey north to Central Europe, Austria and beyond. Another, newer pipeline project, promoted since Gazprom cut off gas supplies to Ukraine in a price dispute last winter, would take gas across Georgia and directly to Ukraine and Romania via the Black Sea.

To make these pipe dreams a reality, there has to be gas to fill them. Russia is offering to expand its pipeline, called Blue Stream, across the Black Sea to Turkey, but that would increase the EU's dependency on Gazprom. Iran, with the world's second-biggest gas reserves, after Russia, could hook up to Turkey's grid and send gas to Europe, but relations between Tehran and the EU are poor. Connections to bring gas from Iraq and Egypt to Turkey also are possible but equally uncertain.

Gazprom is skeptical about the EU's pipeline ambitions. At a recent conference on the EU's external energy policy in Brussels, Gazprom Deputy Chairman Alexander Medvedev joked about the Nabucco project: "with names like that, pipelines don't get built."

Mr. Piebalgs is eager to secure a new southern gas route as soon as possible. Kazakhstan could choose to pipe its gas to China instead of Europe, even if the cost and distance involved would be far higher than crossing the Caspian. But Kazakhstan President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who visits Brussels this week, is proving cautious. Closely allied to Moscow, the Kazakh government is wary of inviting the kind of retribution that has met Georgia's snubbing of Russian power.

DOJ_NMG_0101634

Nine oil- and gas-pipeline projects mentioned in an early draft of the Astana meeting's road map were all taken out, largely for fear of angering Russia over the trans-Caspian issue, according to an official familiar with the matter.

"It's too early to start talking about a trans-Caspian pipeline," Kazakh Energy Minister Baktykozha Izmukhambetov said in an interview yesterday, adding that the first thing to do is to agree with Russia on expanding capacity in the existing Russian pipeline routes.

Mr. Izmukhambetov agreed that Kazakhstan has a strong interest in selling its gas directly to Europe, but he noted that the EU and U.S. are launching feasibility studies for a potential trans-Caspian gas route. Only once those are complete will it be possible for Kazakhstan to judge if the project is commercially viable, and only then could negotiations with Russia start, he said.

UK Team To Visit Russia In Spy Probe (FT)

By Jimmy Burns And Neil Buckley

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

The investigation into the death of the former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko is broadening into an international police probe into organised crime, alleged state-sponsored murder and the activities of individuals who have worked for the Russian secret service.

A team from SO15, the UK counter-terrorism investigation squad, is expected to fly to Moscow on Monday or Tuesday to interview witnesses and gather information on potential suspects.

The Russian state-run television channel Rossiya said on Sunday night that the arrival of the nine British detectives was important as it would demonstrate Moscow's willingness to co-operate. It was also a guarantee of an "objective investigation", against the highly "politicised background" to the case in London.

John Reid, UK home secretary, plans to brief European counterparts on Monday on the UK investigation at a meeting in Brussels of EU justice and interior ministers.

"We want our European colleagues to be brought up to date and we are seeking co-operation from them," a UK government aide said Sunday night. The investigation could extend to other European countries, including France, Italy and Spain.

International co-operation on the case has so far been largely limited to a sharing of information with the US Federal Bureau of Investigation, with which the British have developed a strong working relationship since September 11, 2001.

In recent days UK police have been in Washington, interviewing a witness in the presence of FBI agents. The interviewee is thought be a former KGB agent, Yuri Shvets, a contact of Mario Scaramella, the Italian who allegedly met Mr Litvinenko on November 1.

Mr Scaramella, a self-proclaimed expert on the activities of the former KGB, is under observation in a London hospital after he was found to have been contaminated with the radioactive isotope polonium-210, which killed Mr Litvinenko on November 23.

The UK government has in recent days tried to play down any suggestions that the Kremlin itself is implicated in Mr Litvinenko's murder, amid some nervousness about the damage controversy over the case is having on Anglo-Russian relations, according to diplomatic sources in London.

It emerged on Sunday that Vladimir Putin, Russian president, expressed his anger in a message to the UK Foreign Office last week.

Trails being followed by UK investigators include contacts Mr Litvinenko had with three Russians who visited him in London, and who have returned to Moscow.

Investigation Widens In Poisoning Of Ex-KGB Spy (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

LONDON — British authorities said today they are widening their investigation into the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko on the heels of a fresh series of leads into the Russian's murky political and business connections that spanned from Moscow to the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0101635

"Over the next few days, I think all of these things will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain," Home Secretary John Reid told Britain's Sky News Sunday Live program.

Quoting unidentified law enforcement sources, British press reports said police investigators are in the U.S. interviewing former KGB agent Yuri Shvets, who purportedly has information on a dossier Litvinenko had in his possession relating to the Kremlin's pursuit of figures connected to Yukos Oil Co.

The company was forcibly broken up and effectively renationalized in 2004 after Russian authorities imprisoned its chief executive, Mikhail Khodorkovsky. One of President Vladimir V. Putin's closest lieutenants, KGB veteran Igor Sechin, became board chairman of the state-owned company that took over Yukos.

In Moscow, British investigators were said to be planning to interview another former KGB agent, Andrei Lugovoy, who had recently traveled to London from Moscow and met with Litvinenko on the day of his suspected poisoning. Lugovoy was one of those Litvinenko himself is said to have suspected, "We can't go into detail on operational matters, but obviously the investigators will go wherever needed," a police spokeswoman said today.

While Litvinenko in the days before his death accused the Kremlin of responsibility for the large dose of radioactive polonium-210 that is believed to have killed him, police are exploring a growing number of leads, some relating to Litvinenko's own investigative work into the shadowy world of Russian and Chechen organized crime, wealthy Russian oligarchs and international politics.

In a first-person account and interview provided to Britain's Observer newspaper, a Russian academic researching a book on Chechnya said she had met Litvinenko several times over the past year and learned he had accumulated secret and damaging dossiers from the Federal Security Service, the successor to the KGB known as the FSB, on a number of influential figures that he planned to use for blackmailing purposes.

"He told me he was going to blackmail or sell sensitive information about all kinds of powerful people, including oligarchs, corrupt officials and sources in the Kremlin," she said. "He mentioned a figure of 10,000 pounds they would pay each time to stop him broadcasting these FSB documents.

"Litvinenko was short of money and adamant that he could obtain any files he wanted," she said.

The file he was most excited about, she told the Observer, related to the takeover of Yukos Oil by the Russian state-a mysterious tax sale, never fully understood, under which the bulk of the private firm's assets came under the ownership of the state-owned Rosneft Oil Co.

Former Yukos executive Leonid Nevzlin, who fled Russia to Israel when it became clear he was also facing imprisonment, has said Litvinenko recently flew to Israel to give him potentially incendiary documents relating to Yukos and the Russian authorities.

"Alex had information on crimes committed with the Russian government's direct participation. He only recently gave me and my attorneys documents that shed light on the most significant aspects of the Yukos affair," Nevzlin said in a statement.

Nevzlin said he had passed the documents on to British authorities, and had been requested not to discuss their specific contents.

A Moscow court in 2004 issued an arrest warrant charging Nevzlin with organizing a double contract killing and a string of attempted murders, but the former executive says it is part of the same alleged campaign to target Yukos executives and critics of the Putin government.

Meanwhile, an Italian security consultant who also met Litvinenko on the probable day of the poisoning, Mario Scaramella, released a statement over the weekend saying he believes he and Litvinenko were jointly targeted as a result of information the two had been sharing over the past several months.Scaramella has also tested positive for polonium exposure, though doctors said he did not yet show any symptoms of radiation toxicity.

"I have reason to believe that my poisoning and that of Litvinenko is connected to the information that for months the same Litvinenko was passing me," Scaramella said in a statement released through his lawyer.

Scaramella said his samples showed significantly lower traces than those that killed Litvinenko, "but they were still considered to be potentially lethal, and therefore capable of killing me."

DOJ_NMG_0101636

Scaramella was working with an Italian-based commission that was looking into possible past connections between Russian intelligence services and Italian politicians. Commission members said they found evidence that the former Soviet Union had ordered the attempted assassination of former Pope John Paul II and the 1978 murder of former prime minister Aldo Moro by the Italian militant Red Brigades.

But Italian press reports, some quoting wiretapped conversations between Scaramella and Sen. Paolo Guzzanti, a member of Silvio Berlusconi's right-wing Forza Italia party, have suggested there may also have been political motivations to the probe aimed at finding connections, prior to the elections eight months ago, between Prime Minister Romano Prodi and the KGB.

British authorities have refused to comment on any of the theories except to say that they are following all possible leads.

"The worst thing we can do is speculate. We will end up with egg on our face. This isn't a game of Cluedo," Reid said.

Probe Of Ex-spy's Death Widening Beyond Britain (USAT)

By Ellen Tumposky Special For

USA Today, December 4, 2006

LONDON — The investigation into the poisoning of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko is widening beyond Britain's borders, a top British official said Sunday.

“The police will follow wherever this investigation leads; inside or outside Britain,” Home Secretary John Reid told Sky News. “Over the next few days … all of these things, I think, will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain.”

Reid didn't specify where investigators would go to delve further into the death of Litvinenko. The former spy was poisoned with polonium-210, a highly radioactive isotope, and died in a London hospital on Nov. 23.

The Associated Press, quoting unnamed police officials, reported that a Scotland Yard team was expected to travel to Russia early this week. Scotland Yard refused to confirm the report, saying police aren't commenting on the investigation.

Scotland Yard officers, assisted by the FBI, have already traveled to Virginia to interview former KGB officer Yuri Shvets, according to the Associated Press.

Shvets told the AP he gave investigators the name of the person he believed was behind Litvinenko's death. He declined to confirm the name of the person he told police about or to offer details of a document he said he had given to the British officers.

“This is firsthand information, this is not gossip. I gave them the firsthand information that I have,” Shvets told the AP.

“I want this inquiry to get to the bottom of it, otherwise they will be killing people all over the world — in London, in Washington and in other places,” Shvets said.

The news of an expanding police probe came as Mario Scaramella, who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at the Itsu sushi bar, remained at University College Hospital for further tests.

Traces of radiation have been found at the sushi bar, though police have not confirmed that Litvinenko was poisoned there.

Scaramella was lunching with Litvinenko to discuss the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, according to an interview Litvinenko gave the BBC before he became seriously ill.

Scaramella, who worked with an Italian parliamentary commission that was probing possible links between Italian politicians and the KGB, was rushed to the hospital on Friday when it was determined that he tested positive for polonium-210.

In a statement he released Saturday through his lawyer, Scaramella said he had no symptoms. Scaramella said Scotland Yard spoke to him as a witness in its investigation.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov has vowed to cooperate with the British authorities, according to the British government.

Litvinenko's friend and family spokesman, Alex Goldfarb, said that he has doubts about how serious Russia is about cooperating.

“The Russian authorities at the highest level have formally said that they will provide full cooperation,” Goldfarb said. “I am skeptical. Let's see.”

Before his death, Litvinenko accused Russian President Vladimir Putin of involvement in his poisoning. The Kremlin has denied it.

DOJ_NMG_0101637

Goldfarb said that he had seen Walter Litvinenko, Alexander's father, on Saturday. The elder Litvinenko lives in Russia but had traveled to London when his son became ill.

"If Putin gives up people who killed my son, then I would publicly apologize to him," Goldfarb quoted Walter Litvinenko as saying. "If he does not, I consider him an accomplice."

Goldfarb, who has no official knowledge of the investigation, said he thinks Scotland Yard will want to interview the group of Russians who met with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel after the sushi lunch.

Britain Says Inquiry Into Poisoning Of Russian Will Broaden (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 3 — The investigation into the poisoning of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a former Russian K.G.B. operative, will likely broaden in coming days, Britain's highest ranking law enforcement officer said Sunday, and media reports said British counterterrorism officers were planning to fly to Moscow to interview witnesses.

Mr. Litvinenko died Nov. 23 of radiation poisoning, and a radioactive isotope, polonium 210, was found in his urine. Since then, the investigation into his death has led the police along a trail of places where traces of radiation were found — including British Airways airplanes flying to and from Moscow and several locations in central and north London.

The reported plan to send officers to Moscow has deepened speculation that the British police are looking increasingly to Moscow for information about the origins of the poison and the identity of people who may have been in contact with Mr. Litvinenko before his death. Mr. Litvinenko had, since the late 1990's, become a staunch critic of the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin.

The possible Russian connection has spilled into the realms of diplomacy. Senior Russian officials have complained to their British counterparts about the publication of a death-bed statement by Mr. Litvinenko accusing Mr. Putin of responsibility for the poisoning, according to a British official who spoke on condition of anonymity under civil service rules. Moscow has said it will cooperate in the British investigation.

Shortly before his death, Mr. Litvinenko secured British citizenship, according to his associates, and that has raised the diplomatic stakes, particularly if foreign agents were responsible for his death, which would make it an assassination on British soil. In a television interview on Sunday, Britain's head law enforcement official, Home Secretary John Reid, said: "The police will follow wherever this investigation leads, inside or outside of Britain." He added, "Over the next few days, I think all of these things, I think, will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain."

News media reports in Moscow and London said nine British counterterrorism officers planned to fly to Moscow to interview people, possibly including Andrei Lugovoi, a former K.G.B. agent. Mr. Lugovoi met with Mr. Litvinenko on several occasions, including on Nov. 1, when Mr. Litvinenko began feeling unwell.

Radioactive traces have been found in the Pine Bar of the Mayfair Millennium Hotel, where the two men met. Mr. Lugovoi was quoted in The Sunday Times of London as saying he had been framed by people laying a false trail for the police.

Mr. Litvinenko also met Nov. 1 with an Italian contact, Mario Scaramella, who has since then tested positive for radioactive traces. In a statement on Sunday, London's University College Hospital said that Mr. Scaramella remained "well" and that the results of pathology tests showed no abnormalities.

Mr. Scaramella has said the contamination is evidence that he, too, was a target. "I have reason to believe that the poisoning of myself and Litvinenko may be connected to information that Litvinenko himself, for months, had transmitted to me," Mr. Scaramella said in a statement published by Italian news media, according to [a news agency].

British newspapers on Sunday suggested the narrative was becoming not only murkier, but broader. One report said the British officers had interviewed a former K.G.B. officer in Washington, identified as Yuri Shvets, about a dossier on the Yukos oil company affair — in which the company's former chairman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, has been imprisoned for tax evasion. Leonid Nevzlin, an exiled Russian oil tycoon living in Israel, has said in interviews with two news organizations that Mr. Litvinenko had passed him a dossier on the company.

DOJ_NMG_0101638

Another report in The Observer quoted a Russian academic living in London, Julia Svetlichnaya, as saying Mr. Litvinenko told her he planned to make a living blackmailing Russian billionaires and spies. Ms. Svetlichnaya did not respond immediately to an e-mailed request for comment on the article.

U.K. Probe Into Death Of Ex-Spy Gets Closer To Moving To Russia (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Aaron O. Patrick In London And Stacy Meichtry In Rome

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

U.K. authorities investigating the poisoning death of Russian former spy Alexander Litvinenko in London are closer to moving the inquiry to Russian soil amid talks with the Russian government, according to a person familiar with the situation.

The diplomatic talks will include London's Metropolitan Police Service, which is leading the investigation, and the U.K.'s Foreign and Commonwealth Office, led by Margaret Beckett. The talks will include a list of people Scotland Yard will want to interview in Moscow. Russian authorities have said they will cooperate but they would like to know the game plan of British investigators.

Over the weekend, the U.K. inquiry into Mr. Litvinenko's death Nov. 23 broadened as his wife and the man he had lunch with a month ago were found to be contaminated with radiation and police searched yet more locales for traces of a radioactive substance.

Police Extend Searches

The investigation appears far from determining who administered the poison, or how or why. Police expanded their searches of premises that may hold traces of the radioactive substance polonium 210, including a country club about 19 miles southeast of London. British health officials are seeking to stem public concern about radioactive particles that have been found in three London locations and on two British Airways planes.

The Health Protection Agency said yesterday it had identified 179 people who warrant further investigation and had referred 27 for assessment for possible exposure as of Saturday night. The agency reiterated that the risk to the public remains low.

Polonium, which is made in nuclear laboratories, is used in some devices that measure radiation. The amount and potency of the poison used to kill Mr. Litvinenko has prompted speculation it was procured from a nuclear facility, but no ties to any such facility have been formally established, a person familiar with the investigation said.

Even a tiny amount is intensely radioactive if it enters the body, where it quickly is distributed to soft tissue including bone marrow. It can enter the body through inhalation, ingestion or a wound. Doctors test for polonium 210 by measuring the amount of alpha radiation in urine.

One person who could provide information in the U.K. probe is former KGB spy Andrei Lugovoy, who met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1. That night, Mr. Litvinenko fell ill from the poison. U.K. authorities currently consider Mr. Lugovoy a cooperating witness who has been willing to detail his whereabouts in London.

Testing Positive

On Nov. 1, Mr. Litvinenko had lunch at a restaurant in London with Italian political adviser Mario Scaramella. Mr. Scaramella, who initially claimed he wasn't contaminated, was at a London hospital Friday night after testing positive for radiation. So far, he hasn't shown signs of overt poisoning such as vomiting or diarrhea, according to a person familiar with the investigation.

Investigators are looking at whether Messrs. Litvinenko and Scaramella came in contact with the poison together or if it happened at different times. After lunch, the two went separate ways, the person familiar with the inquiry said. The two men have told authorities there wasn't a third party at the meeting.

U.K. health officials said a close relative of Mr. Litvinenko also had been exposed to polonium. A person familiar with the matter identified the relative as Mr. Litvinenko's wife. The U.K. Health Protection Agency said the level of contamination was unlikely to lead to serious illness. It is possible she was exposed from dealing with Mr. Litvinenko during his illness.

Mr. Scaramella served as an adviser to Paolo Guzzanti, a right-wing Italian senator who formerly headed a parliamentary commission. The commission was formed in 2002 with the aim of uncovering links between KGB spies and Italian politicians during the Cold War. Although the senator tapped Mr. Scaramella on the basis of his expertise in Italian security, many elements in Mr. Scaramella's résumé have recently come under public scrutiny.

Faculty at the Universita Federico II in Naples have disputed Mr. Scaramella's claim that he once served as an adviser to the university's aerospace-and-engineering department. Neither Mr. Scaramella nor his lawyer could be reached to comment.

Poisoning Probe Not Limited By Borders (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

LONDON -- Britain's senior law-enforcement official said yesterday that an inquiry into the death of a former KGB agent had expanded overseas, and a U.S.-based friend of the former agent said he had told police the name of the person he thinks orchestrated the poisoning.

Yuri Shvets said he had known the poisoned ex-spy, Alexander Litvinenko, since 2002 and spoke with him on Nov. 23, the day Mr. Litvinenko died from exposure to a rare radioactive element, polonium-210.

"The truth is, we have an act of international terrorism on our hands. I happen to believe I know who is behind the death of my friend Sasha and the reason for his murder," Mr. Shvets said by telephone from the United States, referring to Mr. Litvinenko by his Russian nickname.

Mr. Shvets, also a former KGB officer, declined to say who he thought was behind Mr. Litvinenko's death because of concern it could disrupt the investigation. He also declined to offer details on a document that he said he had given to the British officers.

"This is firsthand information, this is not gossip. I gave them the firsthand information that I have," Mr. Shvets said.

In London, meanwhile, Home Secretary John Reid said the inquiry would go wherever "the police take it."

"Over the next few days, I think all of these things will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain," Mr. Reid told Britain's Sky News television.

The British police official said police were expected to travel to Russia in coming days for interviews, including with Andrei Lugovoi. Mr. Lugovoi is another former Russian spy who met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1, the day Mr. Litvinenko fell ill.

The Sunday Times newspaper quoted Mr. Lugovoi as saying he had also been contaminated with polonium-210, but he did not say whether he had fallen ill. He denied that he and two business associates who accompanied him to the Nov. 1 meeting were involved in Mr. Litvinenko's death.

"We suspect that someone has been trying to frame us," the Times quoted Mr. Lugovoi as saying. "Someone passed this stuff onto us ... to point the finger at us and distract the police."

Repeated attempts by the Associated Press to reach Mr. Lugovoi in Moscow through a business associate have been unsuccessful.

Mr. Litvinenko said from his deathbed that he thought Russian President Vladimir Putin was behind his poisoning. Mr. Putin has dismissed the accusation as "nonsense."

Revisiting Putin's Soul (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

The fatal poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko in London, along with all the other suspicious murders and attempted murders of Kremlin critics in recent months, poses fundamental questions about Russia, and how the West should treat it.

Since most of these crimes remain unsolved, we can only speculate about who is behind them. We would certainly prefer not to suspect that anyone connected to President Vladimir Putin is involved, even if the attacks have the hallmarks of professional assassinations. The West needs a good relationship with Russia and its cooperation in containing nuclear proliferation and fighting terrorism. No one wants to return to the time when Russia was seen as an enemy.

Yet the recent events — a Russian defector is killed by a radioactive element, a Russian economic reformer suddenly is sickened in Ireland, a crusading Russian reporter is shot down in her doorway — cannot simply be dismissed as unrelated occurrences, as Mr. Putin would prefer.

What is indisputable is that a culture of lawlessness is spreading throughout Russia, and Mr. Putin has done little to stop it. On the contrary, he has weakened Russia's democracy by stuffing his administration with shadowy fellow veterans of the old K.G.B. and by fanning Russians' deep-seated feelings of insecurity and mistrust of the outside world.

Under the guise of restoring Russian honor, Mr. Putin's government is quashing the freedoms won by the post-Soviet press, judiciary and legislature. Government critics have been branded "enemies of Russia" on lists that circulate openly in government circles. The Kremlin claims to see American wiles behind every real or perceived setback.

The West has no choice but to continue dealing with Russia, and with Mr. Putin. But when Kremlin critics are attacked or murdered, the West must demand a full, transparent investigation and punishment for the criminals — no matter who they are. It is time to let Mr. Putin know that we are looking hard into his soul, and we don't like what we see.

Pinochet In Stable Condition After Heart Attack (NYT)

By Pascale Bonnefoy

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 3 — Gen. Augusto Pinochet, the former dictator of Chile, suffered a serious heart attack on Sunday morning and underwent angioplasty and, later in the day, another surgical procedure, hospital officials and his family said.

General Pinochet, who turned 91 on Nov. 25, underwent the angioplasty in the morning, said his son Marco Antonio Pinochet, who added that the procedure had "virtually rescued him from death." Hospital officials said he was to have bypass surgery that afternoon.

Later, a news release from the Military Hospital of Santiago, where he is being treated, said that the second procedure was instead an evaluation of the angioplasty, and that his condition was "stable."

Dr. Juan Ignacio Vergara, leader of the medical team treating General Pinochet, said that the general was conscious and communicating with his family and doctors. He said that treatment so far had progressed "satisfactorily," that the lung edema that General Pinochet had when he was admitted "has been resolved" and that a bypass "will probably not be necessary" for now.

He said, though, that General Pinochet's condition "continues to be serious," and that the next 24 to 48 hours are "critical."

Marco Antonio Pinochet said his father had received last rites in the morning.

The commander in chief of the army, Gen. Óscar Izurieta, met with General Pinochet's wife, Lucía Hiriart, and children at the hospital.

Government officials had no comment on General Pinochet's health or on what might happen when he dies, but Ricardo Lagos Weber, a spokesman and the son of a former president, said the government "was prepared" for whatever the outcome of his illness might be.

In an interview on Chilean television in August, President Michelle Bachelet said that General Pinochet would not be entitled to a state funeral, given that he had been indicted for crimes. "The conscience of Chileans would feel violated" were he given official honors, she said.

General Pinochet had been suffering from several ailments, including diabetes, and has had several strokes in recent years. His faltering health and what doctors have diagnosed as "mild dementia" have allowed him to evade trials for human rights violations and other crimes committed during his 17-year rule, which began after a military coup toppled the democratically elected president, Salvador Allende, in 1973.

Last week, General Pinochet was indicted on charges of kidnapping and murdering two Allende bodyguards after the 1973 coup, and was placed under house arrest. In recent years, he has also been indicted in cases involving the disappearance of opponents in 1975, the kidnapping and torture of political prisoners in the mid-1970s, and on charges of tax fraud, falsifying public documents and fabricating and using false passports in connection with an investigation into his illicit fortune, hidden abroad.

In 2004, a United States Senate report disclosed that General Pinochet had stashed up to $8 million in secret accounts at the Riggs Bank in Washington. A human rights report issued in 1991 by a government-appointed commission established that during the military dictatorship, almost 3,200 people were killed or disappeared. In 2004, a commission on political prisons and torture found that at least 28,000 people had been victims of torture.

Pinochet In Intensive Care After Heart Attack (WP)

By Jonathan Franklin

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 3 -- Gen. Augusto Pinochet, a former military dictator accused of killing and torturing thousands of people, underwent emergency angioplasty and was placed in intensive care after suffering a heart attack Sunday morning, his family and doctors said.

Pinochet, 91, was expected to be monitored for the next 24 to 48 hours to see whether a bypass was necessary. Doctors have called that procedure extremely risky and were seeking to avoid it.

"He is stable but of course serious," said Juan Ignacio Vergara, a doctor at the military hospital where Pinochet was taken.

Pinochet, who ruled Chile from 1973 to 1990, has multiple health problems, including diabetes, and has suffered several strokes over the past six years.

Pinochet was under house arrest at his home in an upscale Santiago neighborhood when a family member called for an ambulance. Special judicial permission was granted to transfer Pinochet to the hospital.

Pinochet's son Marco Antonio Pinochet said the doctors performed surgery "to virtually save him from death. He's bad, very bad."

Pinochet's supporters gathered outside the hospital with placards reading "Immortal" and with dated pictures of him in uniform.

Pinochet faces multiple investigations for his role in the deaths and disappearances of 3,000 Chilean civilians during his rule. The most recent charges against him emanate from a secret military mission known as "The Caravan of Death," in which a helicopter hit squad traveled throughout Chile executing political prisoners.

"We've never seen him in such conditions," said Luis Cortes Villa, one of Pinochet's closest allies. He recounted that in the last week, Pinochet told his inner circle that he thought he was dying. "He said, 'I am in the final phase of my life.' "

Chilean President Michelle Bachelet, a socialist who was arrested and tortured by security forces during Pinochet's rule, made no immediate comment.

Ban Cluster Bombs In Civilian Areas (WT)

By Dianne Feinstein

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

In 2005, three young Cambodian boys were playing near their village when they found four small steel objects that they picked up and used to play an impromptu game of marbles. Their new-found toys, however, were actually "bomblets" left from a cluster bomb that had been dropped years before. In the middle of their game, one of the balls was struck by another, triggering an explosion. One boy died from massive abdominal wounds. The other two boys survived with serious injuries.

Similarly, in Kosovo in 1999, a teenage boy went for a swimming in a lake near his home, where he found a small yellow canister. When he showed off his discovery to his family, the bomblet fell to the ground and exploded. It left him permanently wounded and killed his older brother and father. Several months later, his sister stepped on another cluster bomb in the region and was killed.

These terrible stories, unfortunately, are all too common in war-torn areas around the world. Tens of thousands of innocent men, women, and children have been killed or maimed by these indiscriminate and deadly weapons. They were used in Laos in the 1970s and 1980s, Eritrea and Ethiopia in 1998, Serbia and Montenegro 1999, Afghanistan in 2001, Iraq in 2003, and most recently by both sides during the conflict between Israel and Lebanon.

The time has come to ban the use of these weapons in or near civilian areas.

Cluster bombs are intended for attacking large-scale enemy troop formations. They come apart in the air before making contact, dispersing between 200 and 400 small bomblets that can saturate a radius of 250 yards.

The changing nature of warfare, though, has meant cluster bombs have been used against enemies in or near highly populated areas. So, all too often, cluster bombs critically injure or kill innocent victims instead of their intended military targets.

DOJ_NMG_0101642

The danger is this: These weapons are unreliable and cannot be used with precision. Up to 40 percent of the bomblets from cluster bombs fail to detonate immediately. This leaves a trail of unexploded munitions in war-torn areas.

These tiny bomblets end up in streets and cities. They land in trees and fields where children play. They have been found in rice fields.

Bomblets are usually no bigger than a size D battery. In some cases, they resemble small metal tennis balls. They are attractive to curious young children who find them and pick them up. And 40 or 50 years after used, these munitions remain extremely volatile.

The simple truth is that the remnants of cluster bombs become de facto land mines. They kill, maim, and wound civilians every day, even long after conflict has ended. In fact, 98 percent of cluster bomb victims are civilians. I believe use of these weapons in or near civilian areas runs counter to our values and counter to the international laws of war.

Today, the arsenal of the U.S. military contains 5.5 million cluster bombs. That's 728 million bomblets. We need to take steps to ensure civilians are protected when these weapons are deployed.

So, when the Senate convenes for the new Congress in January, I will seek to ban the use of federal funds spent on cluster bombs until the Defense Department has articulated a new policy that will minimize civilian death and suffering from these weapons.

This means cluster bombs used or purchased by the U.S. military or sold to another country can only be used against clearly defined military targets and will not be used where civilians are known to be present or in areas normally inhabited by civilians.

The International Committee for the Red Cross and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan recently called for prohibiting use of cluster bombs in populated areas. Their calls echoed a growing international consensus that the unintended humanitarian cost of these weapons is simply too high.

During the 1990s, a comprehensive pact was forged to protect civilians from land mines worldwide. The United States and the international community have since spent millions to remove mines in post-conflict regions. These efforts have helped to save countless lives. There is no question there should be a similar program for cluster bombs.

In November, a wide-ranging treaty went into effect to protect civilians, peacekeepers and other humanitarian agencies in post-conflict regions from cluster bombs. It will require parties to an armed conflict to clear all unexploded cluster bombs and other munitions once hostilities have ended. It is a good first step.

The United States and the international community should work together to stop use of cluster bombs when the lives of civilians are at risk. We need to ensure we don't needlessly endanger innocent men, women, and children by dropping cluster bombs where they live, work, and play. This is the right and just thing to do.

The U.N. Menu (WSJ)

By Henry I. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

CHIBA, Japan -- The U.N. task force that wrapped up here on Friday deliberated on the regulation of foods obtained with recombinant DNA (or gene-splicing) technology. They ignored the rule of holes: When you're in a hole, stop digging. The more this ongoing project progresses, the worse for science and technology -- and consumers everywhere.

The scope of this exercise, held under the auspices of the Codex Alimentarius Commission, which sets food standards on behalf of the U.N.'s Food and Agriculture Organization and World Health Organization, makes no sense. Now in its seventh year, the mission is to create more stringent regulatory requirements only for those foods made with the newest, most precise and predictable techniques of biotechnology -- gene-splicing, or genetic modification -- while exempting others made with far less precise and predictable conventional technologies. Having already stifled innovative research on food plants and microorganisms, the commission is now penetrating other areas, such as animals and even animals immunized with high-tech vaccines.

It is one thing to regulate novel foods with traits that are of potential concern, but quite another to regulate merely because a certain technique has been used, especially when that technique is state-of-the-art. It is rather like circumscribing for extra regulation only cars outfitted with disk brakes, radial tires and air bags -- and then limiting only those vehicles to a lower speed.

The members of this task force, including representatives of the U.S. government, disregard the scientific consensus that gene-splicing is an extension, or refinement, of older, traditional techniques of genetic modification, and that it does not warrant discriminatory, excessive regulation. They overlook the fact that during two decades of widespread use, the performance of gene-spliced crops has been spectacular, with farmers enjoying increased yields, decreased use of agricultural chemicals, and lower occupational exposures to pesticides.

The approach of Codex is also incompatible with FDA policies, which are the most scientifically defensible, risk-based approach to biotech regulation in the world. Dr. Eric Flamm, a senior FDA bureaucrat and the head of the U.S. delegation, is unfazed by the inconsistency; he says that the members of the delegation to Codex represent not their own agencies, but the U.S. One wonders whether the commissioner of the FDA -- who proclaims during every speech that the agency is committed to science as the basis for policy -- shares this view.

Why does the U.S. go along with this travesty? The representatives of U.S. regulatory agencies on the task force offer several rationales: Because virtually every other country has in place irrational, unscientific regulation, we must follow suit; the task force is really addressing issues of trade, not science; and most important, American industry demands that we play along.

Unpersuasive on all counts. The Codex standards only provide cover for unfair trade practices, because with them in place, a country wanting to block trade in gene-spliced foods for any reason can defend against charges of unfair trade practices simply by remonstrating that it's deferring to Codex.

It is true that big agribusiness companies (dozens of whose lobbyists flock to the task force meetings) endorse the Codex process. They like regulation because it limits competition and provides a sort of Good Housekeeping seal of approval. But they fail to realize that encouraging excessive, unscientific regulation is like eating your seed corn: a short-term expedient but a long-term catastrophe, especially for smaller farmers, plant breeders and academic researchers (who are not represented at Codex).

American regulators have become surrogates of big agribusiness companies at the expense of academic research and the well-being of other sectors of the U.S. economy. American officials now regularly encourage unscientific, excessive regulation, although the outcomes consistently sacrifice U.S. interests to those of the European Union and anti-technology NGOs (which, inexplicably, are permitted full participation in the task force). What makes this particularly absurd is that the U.S. provides about a quarter of the base budget of the U.N. As a scientist, I feel embarrassed; as a former regulator, appalled; and as an American taxpayer, violated.

Dr. Miller, a fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, was the founding director of the Office of Biotechnology at the FDA from 1989 to 1993.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Video Is A Window Into A Terror Suspect's Isolation (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

One spring day during his three and a half years as an enemy combatant, Jose Padilla experienced a break from the monotony of his solitary confinement in a bare cell in the brig at the Naval Weapons Station in Charleston, S.C.

That day, Mr. Padilla, a Brooklyn-born Muslim convert whom the Bush administration had accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack and had detained without charges, got to go to the dentist.

"Today is May 21," a naval official declared to a camera videotaping the event. "Right now we're ready to do a root canal treatment on Jose Padilla, our enemy combatant."

Several guards in camouflage and riot gear approached cell No. 103. They unlocked a rectangular panel at the bottom of the door and Mr. Padilla's bare feet slid through, eerily disembodied. As one guard held down a foot with his black boot, the others shackled Mr. Padilla's legs. Next, his hands emerged through another hole to be manacled.

Wordlessly, the guards, pushing into the cell, chained Mr. Padilla's cuffed hands to a metal belt. Briefly, his expressionless eyes met the camera before he lowered his head submissively in expectation of what came next: noise-blocking headphones over his ears and blacked-out goggles over his eyes. Then the guards, whose faces were hidden behind plastic visors, marched their masked, clanking prisoner down the hall to his root canal.

The videotape of that trip to the dentist, which was recently released to Mr. Padilla's lawyers and viewed by The New York Times, offers the first concrete glimpse inside the secretive military incarceration of an American citizen whose detention without charges became a test case of President Bush's powers in the fight against terror. Still frames from the videotape were posted in Mr. Padilla's electronic court file late Friday.

To Mr. Padilla's lawyers, the pictures capture the dehumanization of their client during his military detention from mid-2002 until earlier this year, when the government changed his status from enemy combatant to criminal defendant and transferred him to the federal detention center in Miami. He now awaits trial scheduled for late January.

Together with other documents filed late Friday, the images represent the latest and most aggressive sally by defense lawyers who declared this fall that charges against Mr. Padilla should be dismissed for "outrageous government conduct," saying that he was mistreated and tortured during his years as an enemy combatant.

Now lawyers for Mr. Padilla, 36, suggest that he is unfit to stand trial. They argue that he has been so damaged by his interrogations and prolonged isolation that he suffers post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to assist in his own defense. His interrogations, they say, included hooding, stress positions, assaults, threats of imminent execution and the administration of "truth serums."

A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Todd Vician, said Sunday that the military disputes Mr. Padilla's accusations of mistreatment. And, in court papers, prosecutors deny "in the strongest terms" the accusations of torture and say that "Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security."

"His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner, including Halal (Muslim acceptable) food, clothing, sleep and daily medical assessment and treatment when necessary," the government stated. "While in the brig, Padilla never reported any abusive treatment to the staff or medical personnel."

In the brig, Mr. Padilla was denied access to counsel for 21 months. Andrew Patel, one of his lawyers, said his isolation was not only severe but compounded by material and sensory deprivations. In an affidavit filed Friday, he alleged that Mr. Padilla was held alone in a 10-cell wing of the brig; that he had little human contact other than with his interrogators; that his cell was electronically monitored and his meals were passed to him through a slot in the door; that windows were blackened, and there was no clock or calendar; and that he slept on a steel platform after a foam mattress was taken from him, along with his copy of the Koran, "as part of an interrogation plan."

Mr. Padilla's situation, as an American declared an enemy combatant and held without charges by his own government, was extraordinary and the conditions of his detention appear to have been unprecedented in the military justice system.

Philip D. Cave, a former judge advocate general for the Navy and now a lawyer specializing in military law, said, "There's nothing comparable in terms of severity of confinement, in terms of how Padilla was held, especially considering that this was pretrial confinement."

Ali al-Marri, a Qatari and Saudi dual citizen and the only enemy combatant currently detained in the United States, has made similar claims of isolation and deprivation at the brig in South Carolina. The Pentagon spokesman, Lieutenant Vician, said Sunday that he could not comment on the methods used to escort Mr. Padilla to the dentist. Blackened goggles and earphones are rarely employed in internal prison transports in the United States, but riot gear is sometimes used for violent prisoners.

One of Mr. Padilla's lawyers, Orlando do Campo, said, however, that Mr. Padilla was a "completely docile" prisoner. "There was not one disciplinary problem with Jose ever, not one citation, not one act of disobedience," said Mr. do Campo, who is a lawyer at the Miami federal public defender's office.

In his affidavit, Mr. Patel said, "I was told by members of the brig staff that Mr. Padilla's temperament was so docile and inactive that his behavior was like that of 'a piece of furniture.' "

Federal prosecutors and defense lawyers are locked in a tug of war over the relevancy of Mr. Padilla's military detention to the present criminal case. Federal prosecutors have asked the judge to forbid Mr. Padilla's lawyers from mentioning the circumstances of his military detention during the trial, maintaining that their accusations could "distract and inflame the jury."

But defense lawyers say it is unconscionable to ignore Mr. Padilla's military detention because, among other reasons, it altered him in a way that will impinge on his trial.

Dr. Angela Hegarty, director of forensic psychiatry at the Creedmoor Psychiatric Center in Queens, N.Y., who examined Mr. Padilla for a total of 22 hours in June and September, said in an affidavit filed Friday that he "lacks the capacity to assist in his own defense."

"It is my opinion that as the result of his experiences during his detention and interrogation, Mr. Padilla does not appreciate the nature and consequences of the proceedings against him, is unable to render assistance to counsel, and has impairments in reasoning as the result of a mental illness, i.e., post-traumatic stress disorder, complicated by the neuropsychiatric effects of prolonged isolation," Dr. Hegarty said in an affidavit for the defense.

Mr. Padilla's status was abruptly changed to criminal defendant from enemy combatant last fall. At the time, the Supreme Court was weighing whether to take up the legality of his military detention — and thus the issue of the president's authority to seize an American citizen on American soil and hold him indefinitely without charges — when the Bush administration pre-empted its decision by filing criminal charges against Mr. Padilla.

Mr. Padilla was added as a defendant in a terrorism conspiracy case already under way in Miami. The strong public accusations made during his military detention — about the dirty bomb, Al Qaeda connections and supposed plans to set off natural gas explosions in apartment buildings — appear nowhere in the indictment against him. The indictment does not allege any specific violent plot against America.

Mr. Padilla is portrayed in the indictment as the recruit of a "North American terror support cell" that sent money, goods and recruits abroad to assist "global jihad" in general, with a special interest in Bosnia and Chechnya. Mr. Padilla, the indictment asserts, traveled overseas "to participate in violent jihad" and filled out an application for a mujahedin training camp in Afghanistan.

Michael Caruso, a public defender for Mr. Padilla, pleaded "absolutely not guilty" for him to charges of conspiracy and of providing material support to terrorists. Mr. Padilla faces two charges that each carry a maximum penalty of 15 years.

Over the summer, Judge Marcia G. Cooke of United States District Court in Miami threw out the most serious charge, of conspiracy to murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country, saying that it replicated accusations in the other counts and could lead to multiple punishments for a single crime. This was a setback for the government, which has appealed the dismissal.

Mr. Padilla's lawyers say they have had a difficult time persuading him that they are on his side.

From the time Mr. Padilla was allowed access to counsel, Mr. Patel visited him repeatedly in the brig and in the Miami detention center, and Mr. Padilla has observed Mr. Patel arguing on his behalf in Miami federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0101648

But, Mr. Patel said in his affidavit, his client is nonetheless mistrustful. “Mr. Padilla remains unsure if I and the other attorneys working on his case are actually his attorneys or another component of the government’s interrogation scheme,” Mr. Patel said.

Mr. do Campo said that Mr. Padilla was not incommunicative, and that he expressed curiosity about what was going on in the world, liked to talk about sports and demonstrated particularly keen interest in the Chicago Bears.

But the defense lawyers’ questions often echo the questions interrogators have asked Mr. Padilla, and when that happens, he gets jumpy and shuts down, the lawyers said.

Dr. Hegarty said Mr. Padilla refuses to review the video recordings of his interrogations, which have been released to his lawyers but remain classified.

He is especially reluctant to discuss what happened in the brig, fearful that he will be returned there some day, Mr. Patel said in his affidavit.

“During questioning, he often exhibits facial tics, unusual eye movements and contortions of his body,” Mr. Patel said. “The contortions are particularly poignant since he is usually manacled and bound by a belly chain when he has meetings with counsel.”

On Tape: An 'Enemy' Interrogation (NSWK)

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Newsweek

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - Lawyers for "enemy combatant" Jose Padilla claim he is so disoriented from three years of isolation and aggressive interrogations that he is now mentally ill. In new court filings, Padilla's lawyers also assert for the first time that Padilla's interrogations were taped, thereby providing a potentially extensive video record of how the government treated a man once considered a dangerous Qaeda operative.

U.S. officials have denied Padilla's claims that he was mistreated after he was thrown into a U.S. naval brig on orders from President Bush in June 2002. "It is our policy to treat all detainees humanely," said Pentagon spokesman J. D. Gordon. (A Justice spokesman declined to comment on the new claims about Padilla's mental state or the existence of tapes.) But the disputes about Padilla's treatment have raised issues that are likely to come up in future prosecutions, whether in regular criminal courts—where Padilla is due to be tried early next year—or in military commissions where the Bush administration plans to prosecute Qaeda figures. A former Chicago gang member and a U.S. citizen, Padilla was proclaimed an "enemy combatant" by Bush and denied access to a lawyer amid White House assertions he had plans to set off a radiological "dirty" bomb. Administration officials have since backed off that claim. Last year Padilla was removed from the brig and indicted in Miami on charges that he's part of a North American jihad cell that provided material support to Islamic extremists overseas.

Padilla's lawyers recently moved to have the entire case dropped because of government conduct that allegedly included subjecting him to sleep deprivation, extreme cold, injecting noxious fumes into his cell and giving him mind-altering drugs. Justice lawyers said there was not a "shred of record evidence" to support claims of "torture," but have declined to address specific interrogation techniques. Defense lawyers then submitted an affidavit from psychiatrist Dr. Angela Hegarty, who asserted Padilla was so "traumatized" by his treatment that he cannot bear to watch tapes of his interrogation, and when "approached by his lawyers, he begs them, 'Please, please, please' not to have to discuss his case." Hegarty says Padilla is suffering from post-traumatic-stress disorder and cannot assist in his defense—a claim that could be a basis to put off his trial. Another new affidavit says Padilla suffers from "facial tics" and bodily "contortions," and fears that his lawyers are government agents. Human-rights lawyer Scott Horton said he expects lawyers for other Qaeda detainees at Gitmo to make similar claims, and also to press for access to tapes of clients' interrogations. "This is going to wind up being an enormous issue," he said.

A Judge's Sharp Opinion (WP)

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler issued a blunt indictment Friday of the Bush administration's legal handling of prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba. Frustrated with the plight of prisoners held without charges for years at the base, Kessler expressed disgust with the federal government's repeated efforts to block courts from hearing detainees' complaints.

Kessler's written opinion was particularly unusual in that it came in a ruling about a technicality. The Justice Department had asked her to dismiss the complaint of an Afghan detainee, Hamid al-Razak, and to bar him from ever seeking the court's help. Below is a portion of her denial of the government's motion:

-- Carol D. Leonnig

The Petitioner . . . identifies the legal, cultural, and psychological isolation in which the detainee exists which demonstrate his inability to challenge the legality of his detention. They are as follows:

DOJ_NMG_0101649

He is a resident of Afghanistan.

He has had virtually no contact with the news media or any word from outside the closed Guantanamo prison system for over 3 years.

He has had no contact with his friends or family members outside Guantanamo.

He is unfamiliar with the United States Court System.

He does not speak English.

He likely does not know what the term Habeas Corpus means.

He has no criminal charges against him.

He has every reason to distrust his captors and keepers.

He has every reason to rely on the friendship with other detainees, who speak his language and suffer the same disabilities.

He has every reason to challenge his confinement.

No party outside Guantanamo is aware of the specific camp in which he is being detained, nor the "grade" or "level" of detention he is presumed to be, each level being determinative of the privileges he receives.

He does not have access to a law library.

He cannot communicate with his attorney, nor does he even know at present that he has an attorney.

He has no expectation of release, ever.

In light of these facts, there can be little doubt in the Court's mind that Mr. Al Razak is not able to challenge the legality of his detention. . . .

The fact that some of the unfortunate petitioners who have been detained for many years in the terrible conditions at Guantanamo Bay have been knowledgeable enough to file their own petitions certainly does not demonstrate that Mr. Al Razak himself had either the sophistication, or confidence in the American justice system which has so delayed ruling on his status without even filing criminal charges against him, or the physical or mental stability, to do so on his own.

Finally, the Government has offered no evidence to contradict Petitioner's statements that he . . . knows that Mr. Al Razak wants a lawyer to assert his legal rights. . . .

In numerous cases, the Court has felt compelled, for purposes of judicial economy and efficiency, to grant Respondents' Motions to stay proceedings of the Guantanamo Bay cases until completion of related appeals. The longer those appellate proceedings drag on, the more problematic it becomes as to whether a stay serves the interest of justice. It is often said that "justice delayed is justice denied."

Nothing could be closer to the truth with reference to the Guantanamo Bay cases.

Pentagon Invoking Emergency Authority For Guantanamo Court (MBSN/MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News/McClatchy, December 4, 2006

MIAMI - The Pentagon is invoking emergency authority to fast-track funding of a comprehensive war-crimes court compound at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to a letter to Congress obtained by The Miami Herald.

Department of Defense spokesmen would not say when - if ever - the Pentagon had last invoked similar authority.

Nor would they specify which military construction already approved by Congress would be frozen to fund the courtroom project, which could cost as much as $125 million, according to U.S. government documents.

But, in a Nov. 17 letter to several Republican and Democratic senators and House members, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England explains the unusual move this way:

"Due to national security implications and extreme urgency, emergency construction was authorized pursuant to Section 2808 of title 10, United States Code."

Congressional staff members say the price tag and the funding mechanism have stirred protests among key members of Congress with fiscal and operational oversight of the Department of Defense.

The Pentagon wants to build, in three months, a mini-city on an abandoned airfield to stage the trials - two new courtrooms with space for two more, dining, housing and work space for up to 1,200 military and civilians working at the trials, and media, conference and classified information centers.

At issue is how swiftly and at what cost the Pentagon will kick-start its on-again, off-again Military Commissions process at the U.S. Navy base.

DOJ_NMG_0101650

The military envisions night-and-day court sessions in at least two courtrooms to allege war crimes against about one-fifth of the so-called enemy combatants held as terror suspects at Guantanamo, some since early 2002.

An internal worksheet for what would be Project 68043 says the Pentagon anticipates trying "75 to 80" of the 430 or so detainees under an "increased operations tempo."

In a bipartisan move, Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and the man who will succeed him in the next Congress, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., have filed a letter of protest, say congressional staff members who asked that they not be named because they were not authorized to speak to reporters.

Moreover, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, wrote England in a two-page letter dated Nov. 29 that, while he understands the need for more facilities, the price tag "is a little excessive at this point," said Hunter spokesman Josh Holly.

Hunter has been a key supporter of the Bush administration's detention policy, and last year staged a photo opportunity on Capitol Hill - in which he presented a Guantanamo lemon chicken meal - to answer critics who contend detainees are abused at the facility in southeast Cuba.

But on the court complex, Duncan "would urge significant reductions of costs through greater use of temporary portable or modular structures," added Holly.

"There's no need to build something that needs to be down there for 30 years."

The Pentagon would not elaborate, but it appears to be relying on a National Emergency Construction Authority Executive Order, which President Bush signed more than five years ago - after the Sept. 11, 2001, World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks.

The compound would supplement an existing courtroom, lock-up, office space and security facilities. The Bush administration had held pre-trial hearings there, until the U.S. Supreme Court in June declared them unconstitutional on a challenge by Osama bin Laden's driver.

Now, armed with a new Military Commissions law, the Pentagon is preparing to hold multiple trials in multiple venues - even as Justice and Defense Department lawyers are still writing new guidelines for new trials.

Moreover, new legislation introduced by Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., in the lame-duck Congress, seeks to redesign the court system again and, significantly, accelerate civilian court scrutiny of the system's constitutionality.

Unclear is what defense projects will be set aside and put at risk with the extraordinary move.

Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman said in a Nov. 28 e-mail to The Miami Herald that "offsets have been identified."

Rep. Jim Walsh, R-N.Y., who chairs the House subcommittee on military appropriations, over the weekend declared his opposition to the Pentagon move, too.

Diverting money "would affect military readiness, and we're at war," the 18-year veteran congressman was quoted as saying in the Post-Standard of Syracuse. "It sounds like their priorities are skewed."

In the letter, England asks the Congress members to support a future request to restore the projects that the emergency move would preempt - an idea that Hunter replied was unlikely to succeed.

Also unclear is the true cost of the project.

A Navy presolicitation notice to would-be builders, dated Nov. 3, with a response deadline of Dec. 20, put the value of the project at $75 million to $125 million, and a fast-track deadline of July 2007.

England's Nov. 17 letter put the price tag at $102 million - and did not explain the discrepancy.

The CIA And The Militant Who Eluded It In Norway (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

OSLO -- Two months after he helped kidnap a Muslim cleric in Italy, records show, an undercover CIA officer boarded a flight to Norway on another secret mission. Two other U.S. spies followed a few weeks later and checked into the same hotel.

Shortly after the agents arrived in the spring of 2003, an Islamic militant living in Oslo known as Mullah Krekar received a warning from an anonymous Norwegian official, according to Krekar's lawyer. The message: Krekar, then head of a Kurdish insurgent group, was a CIA target and should watch his back.

The spies left Norway by the end of the summer, according to records of their travels compiled by European investigators. If the CIA was planning to abduct Krekar, like other Islamic radicals it had secretly apprehended in Europe after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, those plans were quietly abandoned.

But it would not be the first or last time that the U.S. government had sought to push Krekar out of Norway. For more than a decade, the Kurdish cleric had enjoyed protection in the Nordic country as a political refugee, even as he frequently slipped back into his homeland in northern Iraq to lead an armed separatist movement called Ansar al-Islam, which has carried out attacks on civilians and U.S. troops.

The case shows how the United States has struggled to deal with Islamic militants who are allowed to live freely in Europe despite being labeled serious security risks. Others have included radical clerics in London and supporters of the Hamburg cell responsible for the Sept. 11 hijackings.

But the pursuit of Krekar also demonstrates how U.S. tactics in confronting those militants have sometimes backfired, giving ammunition to critics who accuse the Bush administration of skirting the law or relying on questionable evidence.

Before the invasion of Iraq, the U.S. government publicly portrayed Krekar and his network as an organizational link between al-Qaeda and the government of Saddam Hussein. Under pressure to prove that connection, the United States tried a variety of tactics to forcibly remove Krekar from Norway and hand him over to friendly security services in the Middle East.

Each attempt failed. Today, although the Norwegian government has declared Krekar a security threat and ordered him deported, the mullah is still in Oslo.

Most evidence against him remains classified. But other charges have been refuted in court or publicly discredited, including allegations by U.S. and Iraqi officials that Krekar ordered followers to carry out suicide bombings and that Ansar controlled a chemical weapons factory.

"At first, I didn't think I had done anything that was a threat to the Americans," Krekar said in an interview. "Later, some people told me I had become a target, but I didn't think the Americans would come for me themselves. They wanted to use me, to show that there was a link between Saddam and al-Qaeda."

The intense U.S. interest in Krekar came at a time when the CIA was targeting other Islamic radicals in Europe for "extraordinary rendition," the clandestine practice of seizing terrorism suspects and transferring them to allied nations that sometimes practice torture. Among suspects grabbed by the CIA: a Muslim cleric in Milan, two Arabs living in Stockholm and two others from Germany.

The CIA and the U.S. Embassy in Norway declined to comment on whether Krekar was a rendition target. In a prepared statement for this article, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said, "The United States continues to consider Krekar to be a threat to national security, and we think the same with respect to Ansar al-Islam."

U.S. officials have made no secret of their desire to see Krekar booted from his Scandinavian haven. As secretary of state, Colin L. Powell repeatedly urged his Norwegian counterparts to expel Krekar, singling out Ansar al-Islam as proof of a connection between the Iraqi government and al-Qaeda in a February 2003 speech to the United Nations.

In August 2003, a few weeks after the CIA operatives left Oslo, Attorney General John Ashcroft made his own trip to this nation of 4.6 million people to ratchet up the pressure. He called Ansar "a very dangerous group," whose leaders "merit the very close attention of those who are fighting terrorism."Made 'Bigger Than He Is'

Krekar, whose real name is Najumuddin Faraj Ahmad, is 50 years old. Fluent in four languages and sporting a bushy black beard, he has become a celebrity in Norway. He has published an autobiography -- "My Own Words" -- and aggressively defended his reputation, saying he quit as Ansar's leader in 2002.

Even as he denies involvement in terrorism, he has praised those who practice it. In an interview with a Kurdish newspaper in June 2006, he called al-Qaeda's founder, Osama bin Laden, "a good Muslim" and wished him a long life. He also lamented the "bad news" about the recent death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, chief of al-Qaeda forces in Iraq. "But I am not sad, because he went to paradise," Krekar added.

Krekar has also been questioned by European counterterrorism investigators about his alleged ties to radicals in Germany, Sweden, Italy and Spain, though none of those countries has filed charges against him.

"Everyone -- the Americans, the Islamists, the Norwegian government -- has built up Mullah Krekar into someone bigger than he is, into a symbol," said Brynjar Meling, one of his Norwegian attorneys. "And he has let them do this."

Krekar hasn't always been an enemy of the United States. He fled northern Iraq in 1990 and received asylum in Norway after claiming he had been persecuted by Saddam Hussein's security services.

After the Persian Gulf War of 1991, he returned for long visits to his Kurdish homeland, which was under the protection of U.S. warplanes maintaining a "no-fly" zone. In early 2001, he said, he and other Kurdish leaders met with three CIA officers to discuss how to overthrow Hussein.

Later that year, Krekar founded Ansar al-Islam, or Followers of Islam. The network carved out a small territory near the Iranian border and engaged in skirmishes with other Kurdish factions. U.S. counterterrorism officials suspected that Ansar sheltered al-Qaeda fugitives who had fled Afghanistan after the U.S. invasion there in 2001.

In September 2002, after crossing the mountainous border with Iran, Krekar was detained by Iranian authorities and put on a flight to Amsterdam. Upon landing, he was arrested again, this time by Dutch authorities, who said he was wanted for extradition to Jordan on drug charges.

Krekar said that the allegations were trumped up and that he had never been to Jordan. His attorneys said U.S. officials had orchestrated the detention.

Dutch officials confirmed U.S. involvement in the case but didn't elaborate. "You can assume the Americans have an interest," Dutch Justice Ministry spokesman Martin Bruinsma told reporters.

While he was held in Amsterdam, Krekar said, he was questioned by FBI agents on two occasions, even though he wasn't wanted on U.S. charges. "They wanted to talk about al-Qaeda," he recalled. "I didn't answer anything. I said, 'Just ask about me and my group.' "

Krekar was released in January 2003 after Jordan failed to provide detailed evidence against him. He flew to Oslo, where authorities weren't eager to let him return but didn't have a legal basis for refusing him entry.In U.S. Spies' Sights

Three months later, on April 24, a CIA officer arrived in Oslo on an SAS flight from New York. He checked into the Radisson SAS Plaza Hotel in Oslo, a few blocks from Krekar's apartment, and registered as an employee of a fictitious technology firm in Hyattsville, Md.

The same CIA officer, using a false cover name, had been present in Milan two months earlier for the abduction of a radical Muslim cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, according to Italian prosecutors.

Nasr was taken to Egypt, where he says he was tortured. Italian authorities have filed kidnapping charges against 25 CIA operatives, including the officer who later flew to Norway. None has been arrested.

The spies' European travels were reconstructed by Italian investigators who traced their frequent-flier and credit-card account records. The existence of the records was first reported by Stavanger Aftenblad, a Norwegian newspaper.

Four days after the CIA officer arrived in Oslo, Krekar's attorney, Meling, said he received a warning about his client from a Norwegian government source, via an intermediary. Although the message was vague, it made clear that U.S. spies had Krekar in their sights. In response, the lawyer wrote a letter to Norwegian police, requesting extra protection for Krekar.

The CIA operative left Norway on May 18. But two weeks later, he was replaced by a female U.S. spy -- also charged in the Italian kidnapping case -- who flew to Oslo from Chicago.

She was joined a month later by another female agent, according to Stavanger Aftenblad. Both women registered under fictitious names and businesses and rented a car for a month, the newspaper reported. Both left the country by summer's end.

What else the spies did in Norway is unknown. But at the time of their visit, their cover was jeopardized as rumors swirled about their presence in Oslo.

In May 2003, local news media reported that the Norwegian government had approved plans for undercover U.S. agents to come to Norway to investigate Islamic radicals, including Krekar. Norwegian officials would not confirm or deny the reports but said foreign intelligence agents would not be allowed to operate in the country independently.

Meanwhile, Norwegian authorities, with the aid of intelligence provided by U.S. officials, tried to deal with Krekar in other ways.

The cleric was arrested on the eve of the invasion of Iraq in March 2003 but released a few weeks later for lack of evidence. Later that year, Norwegian prosecutors opened another investigation, this time focusing on allegations that Krekar had ordered Ansar recruits to stage suicide bombings in Iraq.

The case hinged on a key witness: a would-be suicide bomber who was captured in Iraq and handed over to U.S. forces. The failed bomber told Iraqi officials that Krekar was behind the plot. When he was interviewed by Norwegian investigators in Baghdad, however, the man recanted, saying he had been tortured until he agreed to testify against Krekar.

Norwegian immigration officials have tried for years to kick Krekar out of the country. Citing classified evidence, the government first declared Krekar a threat to national security in 2003 and ordered him deported.

He has appealed to the courts, where he has lost repeatedly. On Nov. 22, an appellate court upheld the government's decision, declaring, "Reasons exist to fear that the plaintiff has links with terrorist activities and groups."

But chances are remote he'll have to leave Oslo anytime soon.

Under Norwegian law, no one can be deported to a country where he or she could face torture or the death penalty. Judges in Norway have ruled that Iraq is such a place and will probably remain that way for years.

"I think Mullah Krekar can get a mortgage and prepare for a long and secure stay in Norway," Arvid Sjoedin, another of his attorneys, said last month.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

'Visa Lite' Program Studied To Ease Travel (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman

DOJ_NMG_0101653

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

U.S. officials are providing more details of the president's proposal to broaden the Visa Waiver Program, sketching an ambitious plan for an electronic "visa lite" system that would enable travelers to be cleared against terrorism and immigration watch lists before reaching the United States.

In remarks in Europe last week, President Bush addressed complaints from the leaders of several of the post-Soviet democracies about the restrictive requirements for the program, under which citizens of 27 participating nations are entitled to travel to the United States for up to three months for business or pleasure without a visa.

Mr. Bush said officials in Estonia had been "straightforward and very frank" about the issue. He said there was "deep concern" that people from countries fighting alongside the U.S. military in Iraq weren't able to travel to the United States as freely as they would like.

The issue also arose in Latvia, and had been raised with Mr. Bush by Poland and other former East Bloc countries that are now U.S. allies and in some cases members of NATO and/or the European Union.

Mr. Bush promised last week to send a proposal to Congress to modify the program, "to make sure that nations like Estonia qualify more quickly," while strengthening security.

On Wednesday, the Department of Homeland Security laid down broad outlines of the reform package Mr. Bush would be sending to Congress. They include the new "visa lite" system called an "electronic travel authorization," which would be issued to passport holders before they traveled to the United States, as well as better information-sharing by new member nations on lost and stolen passports and criminal and terrorist watch lists and higher standards for their document and airport security.

In return for subscribing to these additional security measures, officials said, nations that wanted to join the program would be granted flexibility on other requirements of membership, such as the less than 3 percent refusal rate on visa applications.

"We know that, realistically, there are some [countries] that are not going to make the 3 percent bar," said Homeland Security Department spokesman Jarrod Agen, adding that the focus of such measures was on a pre-September 11 conception of how the program might be abused, "looking at economic factors and illegal migration."

After A Rush To Make Repairs, Pace Of Levee Work Downshifts (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — For months, the Army Corps of Engineers raced through the city, frantically patching broken levees and building floodgates to prepare for a hurricane season, now ended, that produced no hurricanes here.

That repair work is essentially complete and the corps has moved on to the task of strengthening flood protection in New Orleans beyond its pre-Hurricane Katrina level, hoping to entice residents back. But lately the bulldozers have been idle, and the trucks motionless. The pace has slowed, those in the region say, with little trace of the round-the-clock frenzy of the first phase.

“We don’t see that anymore,” said Ivor van Heerden, deputy director of the hurricane center at Louisiana State University.

Contractors are waiting impatiently for the chance to bid on jobs. “By now, I would have expected there to be many more jobs bid and under way,” said Robert Boh, the head of Boh Brothers, a major local contractor. “We’re going to dance as soon as anyone asks us.”

The change of pace is obvious to nonexperts as well. Willis Reed, 64, who was fishing at Lake Pontchartrain along a levee that is to grow higher by several feet, said the contrast between the first phase and the second phase was striking. These days, Mr. Reed said, it seems that “Everybody’s dragging a leg.” Even some within the corps say things should have been well under way by now. An engineer who left the corps, and was granted anonymity because he continues to work with the agency, said, “We should have been turning dirt months ago.”

The new, $6 billion phase involves raising the levees above their new levels, armoring the most vulnerable against erosion and creating pump stations to block the surge from Lake Pontchartrain in future storms.

Instead of the placid bank of earthen levee behind the spot where Mr. Reed was fishing, bulldozers could be shaping the terrain to add height and width to the levee. Dump trucks could be bringing their heavy loads of clay-rich earth drawn from borrow pits in the area. But for now there is no noise to disturb Mr. Reed.

Corps officials say the early work was done in the spirit of addressing a crisis, when they had broad latitude to get the job done. Officials on the ground, who call the current lull a “strategic pause,” say the new work has to be planned with great care. And they say it is a greater challenge to design and build new flood protection — the bulk of the second-phase work — than it is to patch breaches.

“The laws of physics have not been repealed,” said Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, commander and chief of engineers for the corps. “It takes time to think through what needs to be done. It takes time to make things happen. You don’t move 5.5 million cubic yards of earth overnight.”

All the new projects are still being designed and their contracts drawn up, but already the corps has postponed a two-day industry forum that was scheduled for last week to familiarize contractors with work that had been expected to be awarded within the next three or four months.

Since levees that are built higher must also become much wider, land has to be acquired. And these days, state and local governments, neighborhood groups, historical societies and others must be consulted before the corps can push forward.

Some trees have grown too close to the toes of levees, which has been identified by experts as one possible cause of some of the breaches that led to the city's flooding. Some homeowners have fought the corps' plans to remove the trees. At community meetings, corps officials have been criticized by residents who argue that the city's sheltering trees give it much of its character. They also said the loss of trees would lower their property values.

It is all very different from the first phase, when the corps group known as Task Force Guardian worked in a city so deeply devastated that virtually no one questioned its plans.

"Guardian kicked down the door," said Walter O. Baumy Jr., chief of the engineering division for the corps' New Orleans District, who worked with the group. "We didn't stop for pretty much anything," Mr. Baumy said, and "we were able to get a lot of cooperation from everybody."

Now, Task Force Guardian has been replaced by the Hurricane Protection Office, which works alongside the district. "We still have that same sense of urgency," Mr. Baumy said, but with so many local organizations back on their feet since the storm, "we're not making decisions alone at this point."

Col. Jeff Bedey, who heads the Hurricane Protection Office, said that what appeared to be a slowdown was just an absence of obvious work like digging and piling dirt; Colonel Bedey said that the planning and contract work was proceeding rapidly. The corps, he added, does not want to build another "system in name only," as its own report referred to the pre-Katrina patchwork of components that failed.

"We've got one opportunity here," he said, "and we've got to do this right."

The challenges are enormous. Congress has ordered the Army Corps to upgrade the city's hurricane protection system to standards first authorized in 1965 — goals that were not reached because of a series of compromises and mistakes, the corps has admitted.

After those standards are reached, the corps must upgrade the system further, to resist a storm that has a 1 in 100 chance of occurring in any given year.

It is also becoming increasingly clear that the billions of dollars in appropriations will not cover the New Orleans area projects Congress has ordered the corps to take on. The situation, in the short run, could require the corps to go back to lawmakers for the authority to move some appropriated money around. Eventually, corps officials say, more money from Congress may be necessary.

To save money, the corps will skip interim steps on some projects and go straight for the higher, 100-year level of protection. But that will leave the city at risk until 2010 at least, say those who oppose the move. The corps has also scaled back plans to armor the levees against being scoured away when water flows over the top. An editorial in The New Orleans Times-Picayune described that cost-saving consideration as "a horrifying argument from an agency whose lack of foresight and competence caused a deadly and costly catastrophe."

But Colonel Bedey said the corps would probably be criticized no matter what it did.

The agency still has not finished its first-phase work on the floodgates for the city's drainage canals. At the $85 million 17th Street Canal project, which has presented the most challenges, the corps has had to do extra work to firm up the mushy soil at the site, and new pumps have had technical problems. There are also not enough pumps at the site to push the enormous amounts of water that would drain into the canals during a hurricane.

Whether the corps is working deliberately and responsibly or "dragging a leg" and falling into old bureaucratic ways is difficult to determine at this early stage, said G. Wayne Clough, president of the Georgia Institute of Technology and chairman of the National Research Council committee that reviewed the corps' post-Katrina investigation. Still, Mr. Clough added, "If they don't get started soon, they will lose momentum, and that's a concern."

What is essential, he said, is oversight from an outside, neutral group — the main recommendation of his committee.

For their part, New Orleans residents say that they want to see more progress from the corps, but that they are cheered by the progress in neighborhoods like Lakeview and Broadmoor, where homeowners are doggedly rebuilding.

Emile Bruneau, a longtime state representative whose renovations on his home in Lakeview are coming along, said, "I'm disappointed by the slowness" of the corps, and added, "If I was the corps, given the colossal failure that their engineering caused here, I would be making every effort to assure as expeditiously as possible that this would never happen again."

Still, Mr. Bruneau said, "Lakeview is going to be fine."

DOJ_NMG_0101655

He said the vacant lots where ruined houses had been cleared away reminded him of the 1960s, when the development was first filling up.

Some residents are building for the future without waiting for the corps. One home in the Lakeview neighborhood is being raised on jacks by about 10 feet. Another Hurricane Katrina might not even dampen its carpets.

Whatever the corps does to protect this vulnerable city, homeowners know that the rules of real estate have changed forever.

Instead of "location, location, location," now it's "elevation, elevation, elevation."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Memo Was Part Of Bush Plan, Officials Say (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush has been actively soliciting ideas and proposals about a course correction in Iraq from an array of senior aides, congressional and military leaders, Iraqi officials and others, and plans to announce a "new way forward" soon, senior administration officials said Sunday.

National security advisor Stephen Hadley and Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad sought to portray Bush's actions as a bold leadership step, not a reaction to calls for a change in strategy by the Iraq Study Group, congressional Democrats and even his own outgoing Defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

They said an internal Rumsfeld memo proposing major changes in Iraq policy that surfaced publicly Saturday was actually part of that initiative, not an admission of failure or a reflection of dissension.

"The president had asked agencies to begin a review of our policy in Iraq, and what Secretary Rumsfeld did, I think, very helpfully, was put together a sort of laundry list of ideas that ought to be considered," Hadley told ABC's "This Week."

"We have to make some changes," he said. "We need a new way forward in Iraq, and that's what this policy review is all about."

On CBS' "Face The Nation," Hadley said there was no timetable for the plan, but "I think it's going to be weeks, not months."

Khalilzad told CNN's "Late Edition" that the efforts by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group — which is expected to release a report Wednesday calling for gradual troop withdrawal — helped spur the administration into seeking its own alternatives on what to do next, particularly from top officials like Rumsfeld.

"It is energizing to review and adjust," Khalilzad said.

Bush repeatedly has rejected a wholesale pullout of troops, or what the White House calls artificially imposed deadlines, saying Thursday: "This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

On Sunday, Hadley and Khalilzad emphasized that even as the president considers calls for a drawdown by the study group, Rumsfeld, Democrats in Congress and others, his main goal is to shift responsibility to Iraqi political and military leaders and force them to more quickly assume control of the country.

The White House is preparing for an important week in the increasingly contentious debate over Iraq, focusing not only on whether — and when — U.S. troops should be withdrawn, but on administration fears that Iraqi officials will not be able to keep their country from plunging deeper into civil war among Kurds, Shiites and Sunni Arabs.

Officials are particularly concerned whether Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and his government can stand up to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr and his armed followers, whom U.S. officials have characterized as "death squads."

Bush is to meet today with Abdelaziz Hakim, a Shiite cleric and Sadr's main rival, to discuss ways of stanching the bloodshed and strengthening Maliki's fractured government.

Hakim, who is linked to a militia blamed for some of the sectarian killing, will press Bush to accelerate the handover of security control to Iraq in exchange for promises to rein in militias accused of using the Shiite-dominated police force as a cover for killing Sunnis, said Sheik Diyadhin Fayadh, a senior member of the Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. He will also reassure Bush that Iran will not be allowed to exert undue influence in Iraq, Fayadh said.

Khalilzad said the meeting with Hakim and one planned with Iraqi Vice President Tariq Hashimi, a Sunni leader, are designed to give Bush a chance to encourage Iraqis "to come together, to unite, to reconcile, and to confront extremists."

The officials' appearances on the Sunday television shows came on the heels of two embarrassing leaks, both to the New York Times, concerning the administration's efforts in Iraq. The first disclosed a classified memo from Hadley to Bush expressing concerns about Maliki's leadership abilities. That came Wednesday, just before a meeting between Bush and the Iraqi.

DOJ_NMG_0101656

The second came Saturday, when an internal Nov. 6 memo from Rumsfeld to Bush surfaced in which the Defense secretary acknowledged that the current strategy in Iraq "is not working well enough or fast enough."

Rumsfeld, who resigned two days after writing the memo, called for a "major adjustment" in U.S. strategy. His proposals included calls for the administration to be more "minimalist" in its goals in Iraq and its troop presence. Many were similar to ideas pushed by Democrats in Congress.

Noting the similarities, some Democrats on Sunday condemned Rumsfeld's memo, saying it was emblematic of an administration that was too inflexible on Iraq until after the GOP's crushing electoral defeat that cost it control of Congress.

Others said they still doubted that Bush would offer a substantially new plan. "I don't think he listens to Republicans, and he doesn't listen to Democrats," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said on "Late Edition." "He listens only to the selected few around him who essentially cater to this 'stay the course' theory."

Some Republicans were also critical of the White House's promises of change.

"We have to have a reality check here. And memos being leaked and all of that — that's interesting Shakespearean drama," Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told CBS. "But bottom line is, if for no other reason, we need a policy worthy of the young men and women serving in Iraq today. And we don't have one."

Adviser Says Bush Plans To Review Panel's Report And Make 'Significant Changes' On Iraq (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — President Bush plans "significant changes" in his approach to Iraq after he reviews options drafted by an outside panel of experts and suggestions from others in the administration and Congress, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said Sunday.

Mr. Hadley, whose own internal memo expressing doubts about the Iraqi leadership stirred a debate when it was disclosed last week, said Mr. Bush would announce "a new way forward" in Iraq in the coming weeks, once he goes through the recommendations from various groups.

Among the options to be examined are those expected to be released on Wednesday from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton. The group has spent most of the last year studying Iraq strategy.

"The president has said that what is going on in Iraq is not going well enough or fast enough," Mr. Hadley said on the NBC News program "Meet the Press." "The president said we need to make changes. Some of those changes are going to be significant changes."

Mr. Hadley said, however, that the principal goal of helping Iraq become a self-governing country that can defend itself would remain, and that a withdrawal of troops "regardless of what was happening on the ground" would not be adopted.

"That's cut and run, and, of course, as the president has said, cut and run is not his cup of tea," Mr. Hadley said.

Asked when Mr. Bush planned to report to Americans on his own conclusions, Mr. Hadley said, "I think it's going to be weeks, not months."

Mr. Hadley described a leaked memo written by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that called for "a major adjustment" in approach on Iraq, possibly including troop redeployments or withdrawals, as part of the overall review being conducted by the president.

"What Secretary Rumsfeld did, I think very helpfully, was put together a sort of laundry list of ideas that ought to be considered as part of that review," Mr. Hadley said on the ABC News program "This Week," referring to the memo.

Mr. Hadley used the phrase "laundry list" to characterize Mr. Rumsfeld's suggestions on each of his three television appearances on Sunday, the third one being "Face the Nation" on CBS News.

He also said that despite his own memo expressing doubts about Iraq and the leadership of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, President Bush had confidence in Mr. Maliki and would work hard to help the Iraqis accelerate their training of military and security forces.

"They're not there yet," Mr. Hadley said of the Iraqi government on "This Week." "They face enormous challenges. They don't have all the tools that they need." He said that when Mr. Bush met Mr. Maliki in Amman, Jordan, last week, they resolved to find ways to help the Iraqis "get greater capabilities" and "more responsibility."

In Mr. Hadley's memo, written on Nov. 8 after he had met with Mr. Maliki in Baghdad, he said it was unclear whether Mr. Maliki was misinformed about violence in Iraq or unwilling or unable to curb sectarian violence, including the spread of Shiite militias loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, one of Mr. Maliki's most important political allies.

But on Sunday, Mr. Hadley said that, since then, the administration had become convinced that Mr. Maliki was doing his best to go after the militias and assume greater responsibility for Iraq's security.

DOJ_NMG_0101657

“That memo was written early in the review process, in the first week of November, as a result of a trip I took,” Mr. Hadley said on “Meet the Press.” “We have been making assessments in a variety of agencies to try and answer the questions I posed in that memo.”

After meeting with Mr. Maliki, Mr. Hadley said, Mr. Bush drew the conclusion that, as he put it last week, the Iraqi leader was “the right guy” for Iraq.

On Sunday, Mr. Hadley was repeatedly asked about his memo, which was disclosed in The New York Times last week. He denied that its disclosure was in any way authorized by the White House or his office. He said leaking it was “an effort to embarrass” Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki on the eve of their summit meeting.

“It was outrageous,” he said of the disclosure. “It could have cast a pall over this meeting, a meeting that was very important to Iraqis and to Americans to chart the future in Iraq.” He declined to say whether the White House would investigate who disclosed the memo.

Analysis: Bush Parries Pressure On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 3, 2006

President Bush has walked a fine line between embracing the mission of a bipartisan, high-profile advisory panel on Iraq and maintaining enough distance not to be bound by all — or even most — of its upcoming recommendations.

This week, the congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group presents Bush with its suggestions for a new way forward in the increasingly messy and unpopular war. Hopes went sky-high that the commission has devised a winning prescription for the beleaguered U.S. effort, now well into its fourth year with violence not abating.

Expectations rose in part because two of Washington's most respected graybeards lead the group: Bush family loyalist James A. Baker III, a former secretary of state, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission that produced a gold-standard report on fighting terrorism.

Aware the study group could recommend some bitter prescriptions, the White House has indicated it will take the advice seriously but not accept it automatically. The president says the report will be only one of many he will consider and still insists that American troops should stay in Iraq until the country can take care of itself.

"We are not going to outsource the business of handling the war in Iraq," press secretary Tony Snow said in October when questions began arising about the panel.

Since then, Bush has ordered examinations of Iraq policy throughout the administration, anchored by a review of military options by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Bush has heard his team's consolidated but still-incomplete conclusions and is expected to get the final report in about two weeks.

Last week, the president portrayed his meeting in Jordan with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as part of conducting his own due diligence. Continuing that effort, Bush meets on Monday with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the Shiite leader of the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament. Next month, Bush will see Iraq's Sunni vice president.

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, emphasized that the White House will not "shoot from the hip" following the study group's Wednesday presentation. Do not expect an immediate response, Hadley said, but one probably weeks off.

"America is ready to make changes to better support the unity government of Iraq," the president said in his Saturday radio address. "I want to hear all advice before I make any decisions about adjustments to our strategy in Iraq."

Hours after he spoke, it was disclosed by The New York Times that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for major changes in tactics two days before he resigned as defense secretary.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote in a Nov. 6 memo to the White House. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign-policy scholar at the Brookings Institution whom the Iraq Study Group consulted, said Bush's parallel maneuvers are not merely attempts to get in front of what may be unpleasant options.

The independent panel took stock of current, smart thinking on Iraq across a broad spectrum. But, O'Hanlon said, it did not do the detailed digging necessary to craft the sort of radical changes needed to turn the tide in Iraq — meaning Bush can go a different direction without too much cost.

"Many got their expectations too high," O'Hanlon said.

Bush's traditional pattern is also at work as he considers how to handle the 100 pages of advice — all nonbinding — he is about to receive.

He often strenuously resists outside recommendations for action, then pivots to embrace them as his own when pressure becomes irresistible.

DOJ_NMG_0101658

The president opposed creation of the Sept. 11 commission in the first place, as well as the establishment of a catchall Homeland Security Department. Bush later changed his mind on both points, and ran campaigns on putting in place that commission's recommendations, and against Democrats who balked at the way he wanted to structure the Homeland Security behemoth.

"He believes that his best chance of getting closer to what he wants is to do it this way," said Bruce Buchanan, a University of Texas political scientist who long has studied the Bush family. "What he wants now is to be perceived as still in charge and not pushed into receivership by a group of wise heads."

Seeking to shift Iraq policy more toward diplomacy, for instance, the panel is expected to call for direct pleas for help from Iran and Syria.

Bush remains cool to that idea, publicly and privately. Those Iraq neighbors are the United States' most vexing rivals in the Middle East and two countries that the U.S. has blamed for destabilizing Iraq and fomenting global terrorist activity.

So in recent days, the White House undertook a pre-emptive flurry of Iraq-focused diplomacy with Mideast nations considered friends, such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan. At the same time, the in-house review is considering reducing the administration's role as a middleman in some of the most contentious fights between Iraq's fractious sectarian and political factions, say officials familiar with the process.

The Baker commission also will endorse a phased withdrawal of troops, perhaps beginning early next year and not conditioned on progress by Iraqi security forces, according to officials familiar with the group's deliberations. The U.S. force posture could be changed — focused less on front-line fighting and more on support and intelligence.

Bush has rejected any American military drawdown before Iraqi security forces are capable. But the panel is not expected to urge a timetable. Because that is not directly at odds with the president's position, it could give him cover to accept some sort of redeployment.

"He's positioning it so he has the opportunity to take it a la carte, or more if he wants," said Frederick Barton, co-director of the Post-Conflict Reconstruction Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Buchanan predicted Bush would "grab the things he can accept and portray that as being cooperative."

The president will have to hope that works.

Otherwise, restive Democrats, who won control of Congress in last month's elections in large part because of public dissatisfaction with the war, could try to force him into a specific timeline for troops to come home.

"Redeployment is now the accepted next step" in both parties, said Ivo Daalder, a White House national security aide in the Clinton administration. "So he's pretty alone in saying we should not redeploy."

Aide: Bush Not Seeking Cover For Pullout (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, December 3, 2006

While President Bush acknowledges the need for major changes in Iraq, he will not use this week's Iraq Study Group report as political cover for bringing troops home, his national security adviser said Sunday.

"We have not failed in Iraq," Stephen Hadley said as he made the talk show rounds. "We will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed."

But he added: "The president understands that we need to have a way forward in Iraq that is more successful."

The White House readied for an important week in the debate over Iraq: Bush planned a meeting Monday with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the Shiite leader of the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament, and awaited the recommendations Wednesday from the bipartisan commission.

Yet his administration, hoping to find a new way ahead in Iraq, found itself on the defensive from the second recent leak of an insider's memo on Iraq in a week.

The latest, first reported in Sunday's New York Times, showed that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for a "major adjustment" in U.S. tactics on Nov. 6 — the day before an election that cost Republicans the Congress and Rumsfeld his job as defense secretary.

Hadley played down the memo as simply a laundry list of ideas rather than a call for a new course of action.

He said that Bush — just before a pivotal election — was not portraying a different sense of the war to the public than his own defense secretary was giving him in private.

The president "has said publicly what Rumsfeld said, that things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," Hadley said.

Democrats did not buy that.

DOJ_NMG_0101659

"The Rumsfeld memo makes it quite clear that one of the greatest concerns is the political fallout from changing course here in the United States," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "The bottom line is there is no one, including the former secretary, who thought the policy the president continues to pursue makes any sense."

Bush has nominated Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld. His confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee is on Tuesday.

As pressure builds for a new strategy, the report from the Iraq Study Group increasingly is viewed as perhaps clearing the way for a U.S. exit strategy in Iraq. Hadley, though, said the review will be just one factor the White House considers, along with views of congressional leaders, U.S. military commanders and the Iraqi government.

Once the president is comfortable on how to proceed, he will spell out his plan publicly in the coming weeks, Hadley said.

Bush repeatedly has rejected a wholesale pullout or what he calls artificial deadlines, saying Thursday, "This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

Hadley said Bush was trying to address those who contend the commission "was just going to be cover for an American withdrawal, almost regardless of what was happening on the ground. And the president needed, and felt he needed to stop that right there. That isn't graceful withdrawal, that's cut and run. And, of course, as the president's said, cut and run is not his cup of tea."

Hadley said the goal remains to shift responsibility to Iraqi forces, an increasing point of emphasis as the unpopular war rolls on.

Bush, after a meeting last week in Jordan, expressed confidence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government can lead the country toward peace with support from the United States.

Yet Hadley was left Sunday to defend his own memo that called that very point into question.

Written on Nov. 8 but disclosed just before Bush's meeting with the Iraqi leader, the memo described al-Maliki as "either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

Hadley said Sunday about the memo: "I made an assessment, raised a number of questions, hard questions that should have been raised. But if you look at that memo and if you look at what the president said in the press conference after the meeting with Prime Minister Maliki, it is clear that this government shares our objective for Iraq and has the will and desire to take responsibility."

The White House maintains that, taken as a whole, the memo was an expression of support for al-Maliki. Hadley rejected the suggestion that Bush administration hadn't shown much displeasure about the leak — or even that it had been authorized to pressure al-Maliki.

"It's unconscionable," he said. "It's an effort to embarrass those two leaders. It could have cast a pall over this meeting."

In Congress, Democrats and Republican continue to wrestle with how and when to withdraw troops without leaving a mess in Iraq, the kind of instability that could jeopardize the region and the United States.

The outgoing Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said Bush is "listening, learning, and he's open to take a change in course."

Bush says the U.S. will stay in Iraq as long as it takes to get the job done. That is the wrong message to Iraqis, said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"It tells them that it's not their responsibility, it's ours," said Levin, pushing for the start of a phased troop withdrawal.

"Nothing has changed," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., about the president. "He said he'll continue to be flexible. But he hasn't been flexible. He doesn't listen. And that's just a fact."

Hadley appeared on ABC's "This Week," NBC's "Meet the Press," and `Face the Nation" on CBS. Warner and Levin were on NBC, Biden was on "Fox News Sunday" while Feinstein appeared on "Late Edition" on CNN.

Amid Hints Bush Will Change Policy, Clues He Won't (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — The debate that will engulf Washington and much of the country this week centers on a question that lurks at the intersection of war strategy and the personality of the commander in chief: after three and a half years, is President Bush ready to abandon his declaration that American forces cannot begin to leave Iraq until the Iraqis demonstrate that they are capable of defending themselves?

DOJ_NMG_0101660

As administration officials tried to prepare the ground over the weekend for the release of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's long-awaited report on Wednesday, the president's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, repeatedly sidestepped questions about how the administration would react to the panel's recommendations.

On three television news programs on Sunday, he offered assurances that Mr. Bush would look at all the new ideas landing on his desk to develop what Mr. Hadley referred to — 12 times — as a "new way forward," one that the president would announce to the nation in "weeks, not months."

But Mr. Hadley knows that one of the commission's core conclusions is that the White House should announce a plan for American forces to begin pulling back, whether the Iraqis are ready or not.

The commission's proposal is carefully calibrated, officials familiar with it say, dangling the possibility that American troops would stay longer if the fragile Iraqi government actually takes on the militias and death squads. But without explicit resort to deadlines or timelines, it also threatens accelerated withdrawal if the government fails to act decisively.

Commission members say they concluded that Mr. Bush's strategy so far has created an expectation that the United States will always be there to hold Iraq together. Breaking that culture of dependency, they concluded, is the key to making the long-discussed "Iraqification" of the country's security a reality. But they are uncertain whether they can persuade a famously stubborn president to adopt that view.

"Is George Bush ready to hear that?" one commission member asked over the weekend. "I don't think any of us really know. I don't know if the president himself knows."

The answer may depend on the impact of the bruising political realities of 2006 — and the prospect that Iraq could define Mr. Bush's presidency as Vietnam defined Lyndon B. Johnson's.

Mr. Bush, of course, has never lacked for certainty about his strategies for Iraq. From his early enthusiastic descriptions about building a model of democracy in the Middle East to his glossy "Victory in Iraq" strategy paper a year ago, Mr. Bush has not shown a hint of doubt in public that eventually his approach would succeed, or that his critics were wildly off course.

That has begun to change just days before the Iraq Study Group's report, which includes a call for phased withdrawal of combat brigades from Iraq, starting next year and ending in 2008. Now Mr. Bush and his aides are suddenly trying to embrace uncertainty as a virtue — a sign of flexibility toward new ideas.

A flood of memos written by Mr. Bush's top advisers — two of them leaked in recent days — offer a host of ideas, some of them internally inconsistent and some proposing actions dismissed by Mr. Bush just months ago as evidence of a lack of national resolve to win.

On Sunday, Mr. Hadley's repetition of the wording "way forward" was no accident. Both the title of the Iraq Study Group's report and the proposed name of the yet-undecided White House strategy are expected to make use of the same language, officials say.

Mr. Hadley portrayed Mr. Bush as "interested in getting a range of new ideas" for many months now — a period that covers the run-up to the midterm elections, when he and Vice President Dick Cheney charged that "phased withdrawal" and timelines were just euphemisms for retreat.

Perhaps so. But Mr. Bush himself told Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki on Friday that "this business about graceful exit just simply has no realism to it," a statement that made some commission members wonder if the president was signaling that some of their ideas would be dead on arrival.

Mr. Hadley offered a different explanation on Sunday, saying on NBC's "Meet the Press" that after the first leaks of the Iraq Study Group's conclusions, the president simply felt "he needed to stop" any talk that the commission, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, was going to provide "cover for an American withdrawal."

"That's cut and run and, of course, as the president has said, cut and run is not his cup of tea," Mr. Hadley said.

But commission members say it is not tea they will be serving on Wednesday, but rather a more powerful brew, infused with the realities of a war on the brink of spinning beyond Washington's control. They insist that their phased approach of incentives and disincentives to Mr. Maliki's government amounts to a last-ditch effort to come up with a strategy with a prayer of working, and that if it was compressed onto a bumper sticker, it would boil down to "train and walk backward."

Administration officials say Mr. Bush is likely to embrace that part of the report, which will call for vastly increasing the number of American trainers embedded in Iraqi units, along with other provisions that he can argue are already being implemented.

And while the White House will call for time to examine the rest of the report, officials say that Mr. Baker, who was secretary of state under Mr. Bush's father and is close to the current president, has kept Mr. Hadley and others apprised of the broad directions of the report.

"There's been more than a little common shaping of concepts here, and I suspect you'll hear that in some of the language used by all sides," said one commission official working on the report.

DOJ_NMG_0101661

The risk, commission members say, is that by the time the White House carries out its “new way forward,” it may be too late. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of American forces in Iraq, drafted plans early this year to reduce the number of American combat brigades by a third by the end of this year. That has not happened; instead, the brigades are facing more danger than ever as they try to regain control of Baghdad.

Even Mr. Hadley seemed barely able to suppress his skepticism at Mr. Maliki’s vow, renewed last week, that Iraq’s military would be able to defend the government itself by the middle of 2007. “Our commanders have looked at that plan; they think it is ambitious,” he said.

Bush Is Weighing Options For New Strategy In Iraq, Aide Says (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Nearly four years after invading Iraq, President Bush is sorting through an array of options -- none of them easy -- for a way out, including a partial withdrawal of U.S. troops from violence-plagued cities and a redeployment near Iraq's borders with Iran and Syria, his top security aide said yesterday.

Bush is open to several previously rejected possibilities because he realizes "things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley told ABC News's "This Week." "We have to make some changes."

Hadley said the president is considering a "laundry list of ideas" from a Nov. 6 memo by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who announced his resignation two days later -- just after Republicans lost control of the House and Senate in the midterm elections. The options include the redeployment of substantial U.S. forces to areas near the Iranian and Syrian borders, withdrawing U.S. troops from especially vulnerable positions and starting modest drawdowns of American forces to encourage Iraqis, as Rumsfeld wrote, "to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

"Of course they're being considered," Hadley said of the suggestions. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, he said, "made very clear to the president that he and his unity government want to take more responsibility. That's what we've been seeking for three years."

"They're not there yet," he added. "They don't have all the tools that they need."

The Rumsfeld memo suggests that in the days leading up to the Nov. 7 elections, the administration was torn between staying on course in Iraq and considering options it repeatedly had rejected. Three days before Rumsfeld wrote the memo, Vice President Cheney said in an interview that the administration would continue "full speed ahead" with its policy in Iraq, regardless of the elections' outcome. Even if the policy proved unpopular, Cheney said, "it doesn't matter, in the sense that we have to continue what we think is right."

Rumsfeld's resignation on Nov. 8 was widely seen as a nod to voter anger over the war and discontent within GOP ranks.

Hadley said Bush will weigh recommendations from Rumsfeld, congressional Democrats and Republicans, military leaders, Iraqi officials, and a soon-to-be-published report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. "He is going to then take all of those things and come together with a way forward," Hadley said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "His hope is that it is a way forward that the American people can support."

Some senior Democratic senators, who will be in the majority when Congress convenes next month, said yesterday that the administration continues to move too slowly in pressing Iraqis to assume control of their security and future.

"I'd do the opposite of what the president did a month ago, when he picked up the phone and called Prime Minister Maliki and said, 'Don't worry, we're staying,' " Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), who is considering a presidential bid, told ABC. "I'd pick up the phone and say, 'You know what, we're not staying forever. You need to start getting your act together.' "

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), another possible presidential candidate and the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told "Fox News Sunday" that the Rumsfeld memo shows "there was a clear disconnect between what the administration has been saying the last year and what's been going on on the ground." He said no one, including Rumsfeld, "thought the policy the president continues to pursue makes any sense."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), who will chair the Senate Armed Services Committee, told NBC that Bush is "not capable of admitting mistakes." Levin said the United States should begin withdrawing its troops in four to six months. "I know the president has rejected that," he said. "He's rejected everything that reflects on his policy or that suggests that his policy is wrong or that we've got to change course."

Republican Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) took a different tack, saying the United States should send more troops to Iraq to quell the sectarian violence and stabilize the nation. He said Bush "needs to tell the American public a failed state in Iraq is a dramatic loss in the war on terror. . . . We must stay, fight and win in Iraq. I reject timetables" for troop withdrawals.

"And any strategy that unites the country and we lose, I'm against," Graham told "Fox News Sunday." "I'd rather be divided as a nation and win than united and lose."

Hadley Calls Leaked Memo "Constructive" (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

President Bush's national security adviser said a leaked memo from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, which lists redeployment of U.S. forces in Iraq as a potential alternative to current administration strategy, was "constructive" but not a formal proposal by the outgoing Pentagon chief.

"It was a useful and constructive memo, but it was not a proposal for a new course of action," Stephen J. Hadley said during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation." "It was much more a list of things that needed to be considered."

Meanwhile yesterday, incoming Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said that the president should accept the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, whose findings will be released this week and are expected to include a similar call for troop redeployment.

"I think it's the right timeline," Mr. Biden said during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "Because it recognizes the reality: that, by the end of 2008, one of two things is going to have happened. We will either help broker a political settlement where the violence is abated in that country and/or things will be totally out of control."

Although Mr. Hadley twice described the Rumsfeld memo, written the day before last month's elections, as a "laundry list," he said Mr. Bush agrees that a change of course in Iraq is necessary.

"He's said that. He has said publicly what Secretary Rumsfeld said, that things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," Mr. Hadley told George Stephanopoulos, host of ABC's "This Week." "We have to make some changes. We need a new way forward in Iraq, and that's what this policy review is all about."

However, some Senate Democrats remain skeptical that Mr. Bush will embrace either the Iraq Study Group findings or the Rumsfeld memo.

"His stubbornness has continued," said Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat.

Mr. Levin, slated to lead the Senate Armed Services Committee when the Democrats assume Congress' reins next month, told NBC's "Meet the Press" that he doesn't expect Mr. Bush to make significant changes without pressure from Democratic lawmakers.

"He's not going to make admissions; he's not capable of admitting mistakes," he said. "The Democratic proposal is a modest one. It is not precipitous. It's been characterized as cut and run. It is not."

Added Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat: "Nothing has changed. [Mr. Bush] said he'll continue to be flexible. But he hasn't been flexible. He doesn't listen. And that's just a fact."

"I don't think he listens to Republicans and he doesn't listen to Democrats. He listens only to the selected few around him who essentially cater to this 'stay the course' theory," she said during an appearance on CNN's "Late Edition."

Yesterday's discussion sets the stage for a busy week for the president on Iraq policy. He meets today with the head of Iraq's largest political party; tomorrow, confirmation hearings begin for Robert M. Gates, whom Mr. Bush has picked to succeed Mr. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon; and Wednesday, the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, releases its report.

Still, Mr. Hadley said during his "Face the Nation" appearance that Mr. Bush will take the various recommendations into account and come up with a bipartisan plan for Iraq.

"He's going to listen to the Baker-Hamilton report. He's going to listen to the reviews that are being done by his agencies. He's going to want to hear what Republicans and Democrats and the Congress think about. Then he's going to pull it together in terms of a way forward in Iraq that hopefully will command support from Republicans, Democrats, the executive branch and the Congress."

Mr. Bush did receive support from a pair of Republican senators who have often criticized him on Iraq.

"Our president is listening, learning, and he's open to take a change in course," Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, said during his appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said that he continues to reject calls for a timetable for withdrawal.

"I reject any proposal coming out of the Congress, any commission, the Pentagon or any other source that sets a deadline or a timeline." Mr. Graham told "Fox News Sunday" that a redeployment would embolden terrorists. "If we redeploy to a friendly nation under these circumstances, the terrorists will see that as retreat and defeat, and they will come after us in that friendly nation."

Bush Weighing Rumsfeld Ideas Among Options (USAT)

By Richard Wolf, Haya El Nasser

DOJ_NMG_0101663

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush will consider new options for Iraq within weeks, including those suggested by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld before his resignation and by a bipartisan study group this week, his national security adviser said Sunday.

The president's review will take into consideration "a full range of options for changing what we do and how we do it," Stephen Hadley said on CBS' Face the Nation. That will include Rumsfeld's "laundry list," contained in a memo written the day before Election Day and reported Sunday in The New York Times.

In the memo, Rumsfeld said the president should consider beginning "modest withdrawals" of U.S. and coalition forces, particularly from vulnerable areas.

Rumsfeld also listed increasing the number of U.S. forces embedded with Iraqi forces, beefing up security near the Iranian and Syrian borders, and providing money to key political and religious leaders "as Saddam Hussein did."

The memo also said more Iraqi troops could be placed with U.S. units, which would improve "our units' language capabilities."

"Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough," Rumsfeld wrote.

The Defense secretary listed as "less attractive options" increasing U.S. forces, moving far more forces into Baghdad, continuing on the current path or setting a firm withdrawal date.

Hadley said Bush will take all suggestions into consideration. "The president made clear he wanted to open the aperture, really have a re-look and look at a variety of ideas," Hadley said. Rumsfeld's memo was "useful and constructive," he said, "but it was not a proposal for a new course of action."

Bush said Saturday that "I want to hear all advice before I make any decisions about adjustments to our strategy in Iraq. … The decisions we make in Iraq will be felt across the broader Middle East."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group is expected to emphasize that point Wednesday when it releases its report. The group, chaired by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, will recommend withdrawing some troops from Iraq soon, according to two people who participated in writing the report. The Associated Press, citing a U.S. official, reported that the panel might recommend a tentative completion date as early as 2008. It also will recommend a comprehensive Middle East diplomatic initiative.

U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said on CNN that the administration should "increase incentives" for Iraq to deal with its own problems and "incentivize" Iran and Syria "to change their behavior."

Rumsfeld's leaked memo generated opposing views Sunday from members of Congress:

·"Iraq has to be solved politically," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., on CNN's Late Edition. Adding troops "is to make the mistake of Vietnam all over again."

· "They can't achieve security if we begin to withdraw," said Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an Iraq war supporter who won re-election as an independent last month. "That's the signal to everybody I've talked to that the sectarian violence will get worse and the government will collapse," he said on CBS.

Hadley said Rumsfeld's memo did not appear to be a late effort to save his job.

Rumsfeld announced his resignation Nov. 8, a day after Democrats won control of both houses of Congress. Bush's choice to replace him, former CIA director Robert Gates, has his confirmation hearing Tuesday in the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Iraq Memo Piles The Pressure On Bush (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Edward Luce, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

President George W. Bush's isolation over Iraq deepened on Sunday following the publication of a leaked memo from sacked defence secretary Donald Rumsfeld calling for a "major adjustment" in Iraq policy.

John Warner, the outgoing Republican chairman of the Senate armed services committee, told NBC's Meet the Press programme that the president should respect the will of the people and seek agreement with the Democrat leaders of Congress on a new Iraq policy.

Top Democrats attacked the president for appearing to dig in his heels ahead of the publication on Wednesday of the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton report on Iraq. Carl Levin, incoming chairman of the Senate armed services committee, said "his stubbornness has continued . . . it seems to me to be more of the same".

Meanwhile Kofi Annan, the secretary-general of the United Nations, told the BBC that he agreed with those who say the "average Iraqi's life" is worse now than it was under Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0101664

The pressure on Mr Bush, who last week insisted there would be no "graceful exit" from Iraq, comes ahead of what may prove a defining week in US Iraq policy.

Stephen Hadley, White House national security adviser, on Sunday played down the significance of the Rumsfeld memo, which was leaked to The New York Times. It included an option to "begin modest withdrawals of US and coalition forces [start taking our hands off the bicycle seat]" – a policy shift favoured by the Democrats.

Mr Hadley described the memo – released two days before Mr Rumsfeld was fired – as a "laundry list" rather than "a game plan". The White House desperately wants to keep room for manoeuvre and not be bound by the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton report – which, leaks suggest, will advocate a draw-down of US combat troops and talks with Iran and Syria.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador to Iraq, told CNN it would take Mr Bush "a few weeks" to make up his mind on any changes to Iraq policy.

Mr Hadley said the report was an important input to what he characterised as a broader review of Iraq policy.

While Mr Rumsfeld had floated the idea of redefining US goals and going "minimalist", Mr Hadley insisted Mr Bush's goal re-mained the same: "a democratic Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself and be an ally in the war on terror". He cast the present challenge as one of building Iraqis' ability to take on responsibility for their own security.

A Pentagon official told the FT that when the memo was released, Mr Rumsfeld had known he was to be sacked.

Bush's Shrinking Options (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

George W. Bush passed through seven time zones from Amman, Jordan, on Thursday to land in Washington at 4 p.m., resting briefly before embarking on the annual round of White House Christmas parties. The nightly six-hour chore of handshaking and posing for photos was followed by sitting through the endless annual honors presentation at the Kennedy Center on Sunday night. This regimen, for a president who likes to fine-tune and limit his schedule, fits his loss of control over Iraq.

The notion bruited about Washington that James A. Baker is a deus ex machina imposed by President Bush to resolve the entangled Iraqi plot is nonsense. The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, is out of the White House sphere of influence. The White House certainly did not ask Congress for help by creating this commission. Baker has made sure that the report, though leaked in part to the press, has not gone to the White House.

As a creature of Congress (an institution that Bush dislikes), Baker's group spells trouble for Bush when it releases its report Wednesday. It will propose, however muted its tone, gradual withdrawal of U.S. combat forces from Iraq before the president is ready for it. The hope is that Baker will nuance the report's words sufficiently and hedge calls for withdrawal in such a way that Bush can say that is what he has been doing anyway.

Bush has not stepped back from the decisions he has made on Iraq. At the core of Bush's Iraq dilemma is the fact, still denied at the White House, that the president has lost his political base on the overriding issue of the war. In contact mainly with fawning campaign contributors, Bush may not appreciate the steady decline in support of his war policy that I have seen deepening among Republicans in the past year.

This undercurrent of GOP protest roared to the surface with the party's election debacle Nov. 7. At the Republican grass roots, there is no question that Iraq lost the election. State officials and party leaders who are no specialists on foreign policy tell me the Republican Party simply cannot go into the 2008 campaign with troops still fighting in Iraq.

As a lame-duck president, Bush seems oblivious to the grass-roots sentiment that will be seconded in part by the Baker-Hamilton recommendations. Baker clearly is not doing the president's bidding. On the contrary, Bush aides have suggested that two forthcoming government reports on Iraq (especially one by the Pentagon) are more important than Baker's and should be given more attention.

The president's position is difficult. He does not want to be seen as ignoring a congressional study group. But he has not yet reached the point of accepting unconditional troop withdrawal. If he seems to differ from Baker-Hamilton recommendations, he can expect heavy scolding by the group's members on television.

Increasingly, Republicans on Capitol Hill see no viable alternative to combat troop withdrawal. While Bush's plight is compared to Abraham Lincoln's after his mid-term elections, there is no capture of Atlanta to guarantee an ultimate military victory. This is not that kind of war.

If not able to secure an Atlanta-style victory, could Bush stabilize the situation in Iraq by sending in more troops? Sen. John McCain, the putative front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination, once again has gone against the body of opinion in the party by calling for more U.S. troops in Iraq. Sen. Chuck Hagel, second-ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a McCain supporter in 2000, wrote in The Post on Nov. 26: "The time for more U.S. troops in Iraq has passed. We do not have more troops to send and, even if we did, they would not bring a resolution to Iraq."

Bush agrees with that, but not with Hagel's call for a phased troop withdrawal likely to be included in a Baker-Hamilton group recommendation. Hagel sees the report as a last chance to avert "impending disaster in Iraq." While its release is anticipated at the White House as no less annoying than sitting through the Kennedy Center honors, the president faces an opportunity as well as a dilemma.

The Iraq Alternative (WSJ)

By Donald L. Horowitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

Just when you thought the midterm election results had weakened President Bush's hand in Iraq, it turns out the opposite is true. The president has been liberated from a stay-the-course policy that the Iraqi government could pocket as an open-ended commitment. The voters have given Mr. Bush a chance, perhaps a last chance, to turn Iraq in a new direction.

The Iraqi government does not want the U.S. to leave now, but the American electorate has said that the choice is to show real progress or draw down the troops. For the first time in many months, the Bush administration has a credible weapon to use on the Iraqi government and its Sunni opponents, who increasingly see the U.S. as their last line of defense against Iran and against Shiite militias. * * *

Many of Iraq's current problems stem from the Kurdish-Shiite attempt to carve the country into a confederation of three regions with a very weak central government. The result would be to leave the Sunnis, who strongly favor an indivisible Iraq, with a rump region in the center, devoid of most oil revenue. The deal would also leave minorities, large and small, stranded in zones dominated by their opponents and their respective militias. Sunnis hate this deal, and so should we. They fear it will make Iraq an Iranian satellite. If regionalization deteriorates into partition, they will likely be right, at least in the south, where pro-Iranianism, although contested among Shiites, shows signs of winning.

Partition would bring horrific bloodshed as minorities are targeted and forced migration purifies territories. The regions could very well go to war with each other over contested boundaries and people left on the wrong side of a border. Smaller groups will organize to resist, and outside forces will surely be drawn in. Turks may aid Turkomen in the north, as they have already threatened to do. Sunni states, especially Saudi Arabia, are deeply fearful of growing Iranian influence on their own Shiite minorities, and they will probably aid the large Sunni minority in the south of Iraq and those stranded in the center. The position of Islamic radicals will be strengthened.

If Iraqi politics does not change, this is the most likely outcome. Since it threatens all the Sunni states in the region, partition also means the danger of a wider war. Even though the violent partition of Iraq is not in America's interest, the U.S. will be blamed for it. Or, in the paranoid version, this is what the "Zionist-imperialist conspiracy" planned: division of an Arab country, accompanied by mass killing.

How does the Bush administration use its new leverage to prevent this? If the Iraq Study Group thinks the road to peace in Iraq runs through Iran and Syria, it has missed the point. Neither country has had any interest in fostering stability at a price we would or should be willing to pay. The only chance for peace in Iraq lies in changing the Kurdish-Shiite deal so that the Sunnis are incorporated into an undivided federal Iraq with a real central government, limited regional autonomy, and a new agreement on the distribution of oil revenue.

The odds may not favor such a new dispensation. The violence and distrust have gone too far, and strong measures against militias will be necessary. Still, the Sunnis know that if American forces leave Iraq, they are vulnerable to brutal repression. They would prefer a unitary state to a federal Iraq, but they have been coming around to accepting a federation that is not loaded against their interests, as the current arrangement is. Shiites also have reasons to reconsider. The Maliki government has not been able to put down either the Baathist or the Islamist insurgency. The former is particularly well organized and hard to defeat. Not all Shiite elements in the Iraqi regime are friendly to Iran, and they must understand that foreign Sunni states might just fill a vacuum left by departing Americans.

There is a process in the Iraqi constitution to produce the amendments demanded by Sunni opinion before the 2005 constitutional referendum, but Kurdish leaders and Shiite advocates of an autonomous south have made clear their opposition to fundamental changes. A parliamentary committee was duly appointed to consider amendments; it has wasted months squabbling over trivia. By contrast, last month the Iraqi parliament narrowly approved, over a strong boycott led by Sunnis, secularists and some Shiites, a law prescribing the procedure for the regionalization of the country. So things are going in the wrong direction. The U.S. needs to turn this around.

The Maliki government should have a choice: progress on real Sunni incorporation in the regime, or progress on phased American withdrawal. Sunni incorporation would need to begin with a revitalized and serious constitutional amendment process to avert the de facto partition of the country. To convince Sunnis that this was genuine, the government would have to discuss a Sunni agenda, make serious constitutional proposals in the amendment committee, work harder to cool down Shiite militias, reverse the most extreme de-Baathification purges in the civil service, and possibly reshuffle the cabinet. If it did all this earnestly so that Sunnis were drawn in -- as they would have every reason to be -- the Baathist part of the insurgency might either decline or be less warmly received in the Sunni heartland. Recall that even the Saddamist insurgent Ibrahim al-Douri recently called for a truce. External supporters of the Sunni insurgency would have good reason to urge Sunnis to participate in the new initiative to empower them, and if Sunni insurgents were less active, Shiite revenge killings would probably decline.

Shiites who are not pro-Iranian could find the proposals congenial. These would include some in Mr. Maliki's own Dawa party; supporters of the Fadhila party, which is strong in some southern provinces and opposed to a single, nine-province region there (in which they would be in the minority); and even followers of Muqtada al-Sadr, whose base is not in the south. All are wary of the largest Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and its leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the main proponent of a strongly autonomous south with close ties to Iran. There is a more complex politics in Iraq than the one that has formed the basis of U.S. policy thus far.

If such an initiative failed, there is another option for the Iraqi regime. The Maliki government has periodically complained that the Americans have tied the regime's hands in dealing with insurgents. If we pulled back or drew down our troops, government forces could be expected to deal brutally with Sunni insurgents and the hospitable civilian population in which they flourish. The results might or might not favor the government, but either way they would not be pretty. If the Islamic radicals were defeated and prevented from making a comeback, that short-term result would be congenial to our interests, but it is hard to believe that the U.S. could stand by and watch the brutality that made it possible.

Furthermore, if the Maliki government did succeed in repression on this scale, a truly authoritarian regime would likely emerge, with a Shiite region in the south, forcible Shiite occupation of the center, and de facto independence in the Kurdish north. This would be a kind of reverse Saddamism, but without its secular features and with strong Iranian influence. Like partition, this would be a decidedly poor outcome for the U.S. * * *

There are three main options facing Iraq. One is gloves-off repression. The second is protracted conflict, gradual partition, large-scale ethnic cleansing, and the prospect of external intervention or even outright warfare among states in the region. The third is a last-ditch political effort to reconstitute an Iraq that keeps it whole and includes Sunni interests. This alternative aligns the U.S. squarely with ethnic inclusion and territorial integrity, both worthwhile causes, and with Iraqi political forces whose agenda happens to coincide with ours.

The third course may not have a high probability of success, but it is low risk and, if it succeeds, offers great benefits to Iraq and the U.S. This approach recognizes the large area of overlap between Sunni interests (and those of our regional allies, Jordan, Turkey and Saudi Arabia) with our own. It also offers the prospect of attracting Baathists and isolating al Qaeda insurgents, and it recognizes important differences among Shiites, aiding those who do not wish to see Shiite Arabs subordinated to Iran.

This third course probably will not produce a full-fledged democracy, but it could produce minority guarantees and impediments to a nasty, ethnically exclusive autocracy. In the short run, it will not produce complete peace either. But it should still reduce the violence, and eventually could produce a stable regime that limits Iranian influence, Kurdish provocations of the Turks, and terrorist domination of the Sunni areas.

Keeping all the contending groups attached to Iraq would be a major achievement. If, however, this plan fails, nothing will be lost over and above what is already lost. For the U.S. administration, the plan is an attractive option, for it offers what the electorate demanded: real progress or a drawdown of troops. President Bush's newfound power, paradoxically produced by an election loss, makes this a serious option and the threat underlying it credible with the Iraqi regime. There is no reason not to go down this road.

Can Bush Find An Exit? (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, December 4, 2006

George Bush has a history of long-overdue u-turns. He waited until he woke up, hungover, one morning at age 40 before giving up booze cold. He fought the idea of a homeland-security agency for eight months after 9/11 and then scampered aboard and called it his idea. He dumped Donald Rumsfeld last month as Defense Secretary, although lawmakers and even some generals had been calling for his head since 2005. Bush's biggest reversals usually come after months--even years--of stubborn resistance, when just about everyone has given up on his having any second thoughts at all. That's always been the point: he's a decider, he says, and deciders aren't supposed to undecide. When he does have to Kojak the car and head down the street in the opposite direction, he takes a little extra time getting it done.

But Bush has never had to pull off a U-turn like the one he is contemplating now: to give up on his dream of turning Babylon into an oasis of freedom and democracy and instead begin a staged withdrawal from Iraq, rewrite the mission of the 150,000 U.S. troops there as they begin to draw down, and launch a diplomatic Olympics across the Middle East and between Israel and the Palestinians. Even calling all that a reversal is a misnomer; it would be more like a personality transplant.

So it may take the 43rd President a little more time than it normally does to execute this particular U-turn. And he will do all he can to make it look more like a lane change. But sometime in the next month or so, Bush will begin the biggest foreign policy course correction of his presidency. No matter what else may get stapled onto it, the maneuver will be based on the agreement reached by the bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Indiana Congressman Lee Hamilton. Bush aides said last week that there is already agreement on the name for the restart: A New Way Forward, which borrows from the commission's own title, The Way Forward--New Approach. Among people who have known Bush for decades, there is almost as much certainty that he needs to disengage from Iraq as there are doubts about whether he has the wiring and instincts--much less the desire--to pull it off. "He is not stupid," says a commission source. "But he is stubborn. And he is very dug in. It takes a big person to find a way to walk back from some of this and embrace reality."

THE PRESIDENT IS ABOUT TO GET A LOT OF reality therapy. The Baker-Hamilton commission's work has been compared to a family intervention for a substance-addicted cousin, but unlike those encounters, this one won't remain behind closed doors. The entire 10-person commission will brief the President this Wednesday and then repeat the lesson for congressional leaders, both incoming and outgoing, later the same day. What happens next is designed to be even more convincing: several days of nonstop interviews on every media outlet, network and cable-TV station--a media blitz that will run well into the Sunday-morning news programs.

Of course some people don't like being rescued, and there is little reason to think that Bush or anyone around him is going to enjoy the visit by the Baker-Hamilton emergency squad. While there will be no lights flashing or sirens wailing, the commission is proposing nothing short of a repudiation of pretty much all U.S. foreign policy for the past three years. The Iraq Study Group will call for a massive diplomatic push in two areas in which the White House has never put its shoulder to the grindstone: rekindling peace talks between Palestinians and Israelis and holding an international conference that would lead to direct talks between Washington and both Tehran and Damascus. The commission agreed that the political turmoil inside Iraq could only be sorted out with the cooperation of neighboring countries, particularly Syria, Turkey, Iran and Saudi Arabia, which have the strongest ties to the Shi'ite and Sunni groups propelling Iraq ever deeper into civil war.

The study group's military proposals are performance based: they would link a staged withdrawal from Iraq by U.S. forces to stronger actions by the struggling Iraqi government. The report does not set a timetable for troop reductions, but it is expected to offer Baghdad a slower withdrawal if the government takes steps to end the violence. If Baghdad cannot make that happen, the troops would depart at an even faster rate. The genius of the approach is that if security returns as a consequence of this squeeze play, the need for U.S. troops will presumably also decrease. Says an expert who briefed the panel on the idea of trading troops for cooperation: "Unless we use our withdrawal as leverage against reduced violence, anything we do will be drained away in the sands of an ineffective central government." That is why, either way, the report envisions, but stops short of stating flatly, that troop withdrawals should begin sometime next year.

These proposals will push Bush's buttons because they come from outsiders. Vice President Dick Cheney in particular has long resisted outside interference in foreign policy. But last week it was internal interference that upended the Administration's best-laid plans. Bush had no sooner arrived in Amman, Jordan, for talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki than the New York Times published the full text of a memo to Bush from his National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley portraying al-Maliki as isolated, powerless and out of touch with the realities of his country and unable to affect them. This is hardly surprising for a man who can barely leave his home without American logistical support, but the leaked memo from somewhere in the Bush Administration sank the President's plans for a take-charge summit. Al-Maliki abruptly canceled his planned meeting with Bush--a snub for which there is no well-known precedent--and waited until the following morning to have breakfast and a shortened, 45-min. session with him. There was little chemistry in that encounter; by all accounts al-Maliki looked sour and lost. During a short photo break, al-Maliki refused to look at Bush, and the President had to initiate a handshake between them. Ignoring the previous day's discourtesy, Bush declared al-Maliki "the right guy for Iraq," a thumbs-up that did nothing for the Prime Minister's credibility at home, where an endorsement from the U.S. President may be the kiss of death. Bush then offered his first official reaction to the Baker-Hamilton proposals. "There's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq. We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the government wants us there. This business about graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

INSIDE THE COMMISSION

REALISM WAS EXACTLY WHAT THE PEOPLE who cooked up the commission had in mind when they set the bipartisan operation in motion more than a year ago. The review began as an earmark--a $1 million insertion into an appropriations bill by Republican Representative Frank Wolf of Virginia, who had gone to Iraq last year and decided U.S. policy wasn't working or, as he put it, needed "fresh eyes." He slotted the money to the U.S. Institute of Peace, whose president, Richard Solomon, joined two CEOs Wolf trusted to organize the study: David Abshire, of the Center for the Study of the Presidency, and John Hamre, who runs the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Those three settled on Baker and Hamilton as chairmen. Hamilton agreed, but Baker wanted Bush's blessing--and he wanted to let Bush know he might not like the outcome.

To bring Bush aboard, Solomon, Hamre and Abshire approached the one person in Bushland who still had a reputation for realism and who could command the President's ear, alone: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Would she propose the commission to the President? After some hesitation, Rice agreed, but she made one request: the commission had to look forward, not backward, in part because she knew the dysfunctional Bush foreign policy operation, tilted as it was so heavily along the Cheney-Rumsfeld axis, would not permit, much less sustain, scrutiny. As the trio departed, a Rice aide asked one of her suitors not to inform anyone at the Pentagon that chairmen had been chosen and the study group was moving forward. If Rumsfeld was alerted to the study group's potential impact, the aide said, he would quickly tell Cheney, who could, with a few words, scuttle the whole thing. Rice got through to Bush the next day, arguing that the thing was going to happen anyway, so he might as well get on board. To his credit, the President agreed.

After rejecting every name that Solomon & Co. proposed, Baker and Hamilton were left to choose their own panelists, and the commission went to work, gathering evidence, making a trip to Baghdad and hearing from more than 100 experts. Retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor developed a reputation for asking the best questions. Democratic power broker Vernon Jordan emerged as the group's political sage. Former Bill Clinton Defense chief William Perry cornered the military options--and would be a holdout on the final deal. In October, as the number of casualties in Iraq exploded, public support for Bush dropped through the floor. When Democrats swept the November elections, aides to several panelists told TIME that the commission would have more room to make sweeping proposals. Rumsfeld's resignation the next day cemented that feeling--which is not to say the commission thought it had any perfect solutions. "We did not think there were any good options on Iraq," one of the experts told TIME. "What we're really looking at are less-bad options."

But instead of making things easier, the elections actually made them harder. After Bush replaced Rumsfeld with Robert Gates, a member of the Baker-Hamilton commission who had served the first President Bush as head of the CIA, the psychoanalysis rampant in the media about Daddy's team coming back to save the prodigal son steamed everyone at the White House, from the President on down, and led the Administration to dig in its heels. Says a Baker confidant: "Everything that happened on Election Day made for extra work." It wasn't long before senior Administration officials were whispering that the diplomatic proposals coming out of Baker's shop would never fly. Realizing that with Gates moving to the Pentagon, the study group's report may have more impact than they had first thought, Democrats from all quarters began bombarding their allies on the panel with advice about how to stage an organized withdrawal and pressing for a precise drawdown timetable. Baker, who was in touch with the White House, resisted.

Meanwhile, Iraq kept deteriorating, and there was a risk that the panel's proposals would be obsolete before consensus was reached. "It overshadowed everything," says an aide to one member. "They were constantly dealing with new developments over there." Baker turned up last Monday with a draft report he wanted panel members to consider or amend and then get into the President's hands. Democrats led by Hamilton, Perry and Leon Panetta, Clinton's ex--chief of staff, were adamant that the report recommend a firm starting point for troop withdrawals. When the Republicans again refused, members agreed on language that would leave the date vague but the vector clear. And then the group adjourned.

THE ENDGAME

THE HOT WORD IN WASHINGTON THESE days is bandwidth, as in, Does this Administration have the bandwidth to solve all these problems? Even those who back the Baker plan worry about whether there is anyone inside the Administration who can carry it out. There is widespread doubt that the Bush team is emotionally or ideologically able to execute a plan that is so at odds with its collective instincts and that many of its supporters might resist. Of particular concern to members of the study group is the state of the U.S. State Department. Although Rice has restored some of the department's lost influence since replacing Colin Powell, she is currently working without a deputy and has had trouble filling that post. Her top lawyer, Philip Zelikow, is leaving soon, and there is a wide variety of people who wonder whether she--or anyone else--could amass the clout to take on both the Middle East and Iraq security talks in the time that is left to this Administration. That's one reason there are growing calls for a special envoy to the region who can hold all the reins in one hand. Some have even suggested that Bush try to persuade Baker to stay on and take up one last mission for his country.

Bush will put a few weeks between the big Baker-Hamilton rollout and his own restart. White House officials worry that anything faster would look too reactive--a curious instinct, given the public's overwhelming desire for change and the positive response Bush received when he tossed Rumsfeld over the side after the elections. Says a former government official who has known Bush for 20 years: "If he is going to take political advantage of things he might have done anyhow, why not do them fast instead of slow?" It may be that the President is not yet ready to answer the obvious question when the strategy changes: What is the new definition of success? Bush himself teed that up when he told reporters in October, "You all got to understand, and the parents of our troops must understand, that if I didn't believe we could succeed and didn't believe it was necessary for the security of this country to succeed, I wouldn't have your loved ones there."

But the White House won't wait for the Baker-Hamilton road show to signal that it is changing course. A White House official told TIME over the weekend that the new path the President will outline in coming weeks is "significantly different than what we've been doing. When the President says we're going to get the job done, that doesn't suggest it is an open-ended commitment forever." The inevitability of serious change, it emerges, had become clear even to one so dug in as Rumsfeld. The New York Times reported last week that two days before he was ousted, the Defense Secretary submitted a memo to the White House saying the Iraq strategy was failing and calling for "major adjustment," including possible troop pullbacks.

To seize the initiative, the White House announced a series of new diplomatic actions of its own, inviting Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of Iraq's leading Shi'ite party, and Tariq al-Hashemi, the Sunni Vice President, to Washington over the next few weeks as part of an effort to deepen connections to a greater variety of Iraqi political figures. And aides say Bush may call for what were already being dubbed "reciprocal obligations" with the Iraqi government: trading troop deployments for progress on sectarian violence, just as Baker and Hamilton are expected to propose. But there will be no ultimatums. A senior Administration official says, "Bush's plan is eventually going to call for reductions in troops. They're going to do whatever they can to get the security to a level at which it's sustainable so that at some point they can start to draw down the troop levels."

And that points to the biggest weaknesses in any rescue plan. Whether it is the Baker approach or whatever the White House decides to call its own, events in Iraq could easily make any plan for diplomacy and withdrawal irrelevant in the face of a weak central government, a deepening civil war and widespread violence. A commission official put it this way: "What we have produced is a plan for December. We have no idea what things are going to look like in February."

So Now What, Mr. President? (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - George W. Bush was doing everything he doesn't usually like to do. He was traveling in foreign lands (when Bush campaigns, he likes to fly home every night to sleep in his own bed). The carefully choreographed president was hit with a sudden change in schedule. Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, America's thin hope to create a stable government in Iraq, had seemingly snubbed Bush and was now standing frostily a few feet away at a press conference after a mini-summit meeting, held at a fancy hotel in Jordan because, nearly four years after the fall of Saddam Hussein, it is still too dangerous to meet in Iraq. Maliki was reportedly sore because someone high in the Bush administration had leaked a secret memo from national-security adviser Steve Hadley to the president saying, in essence, that Maliki was well intentioned but either out of touch, weak or deceitful.

Bush hates leaks almost as much as he dislikes meeting with the journalists who now surrounded him, clamoring to know about reports that a long-awaited independent panel was about to call for a substantial troop pullout from Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, also known as the Baker Commission after its co-chairman, former secretary of State James A. Baker, has been widely seen as a gambit by Republican moderates close to Bush's father, the 41st president, to rescue the 43rd president from his disastrous plunge into Iraq. Of all the things Bush dislikes, the idea of needing to be rescued by Daddy may well top the list.

So no wonder the president was a little out of sorts. "I know," Bush began, trying, unsuccessfully, to stifle a tone of deep exasperation, "there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq. This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

A few days later, many thousands of miles away at his ranch in Texas, Jim Baker was resting up, lying low, waiting for his moment. The leak, reported in The New York Times, that the Iraq Study Group was about to call for substantial troop pullback was wrong, Baker knew. In fact, the Iraq Study Group report, scheduled to be released this week, will set no timetables or call for any troop reductions, according to a source familiar with the report, who, like everyone involved, requested anonymity owing to the sensitivity of the subject. It will speak more generally of shifting U.S. troops from an active combat role to advising Iraqi forces, and suggest that the president could, not should, begin to withdraw forces in the vaguely defined future. The report will also urge more diplomatic initiatives to secure Iraq and the region.

Persuading Bush to listen—and to change course, even at the margins—will be very difficult. One of the myths that the Bush camp has tried to perpetuate over the years is that the president follows the model, learned as a student at Harvard Business School, of a chief executive who delegates, listens to advice and only then decides. Bush is the "decider," as he calls himself, but there is little evidence that he listens to advice that he doesn't want to hear. It may be that the last really serious call for a midcourse correction heeded by George W. Bush was the hangover he experienced at Colorado's Broadmoor Hotel one morning in the summer of 1986, when he decided to quit drinking—a decision that put him on the path to the presidency. That was indeed a momentous example of evaluating options and choosing to change, but it happened two decades ago.

People who know Bush well say, as one presidential friend put it to NEWSWEEK, that he "realizes that the disappointments on the ground in Iraq—not just the election—require new thinking." (The source spoke anonymously for fear of alienating Bush.) "He is looking for a militarily effective and politically sustainable approach that gives Iraq the chance to succeed in the long term," says the friend, "and I think he is very open to change, very open to the Baker Commission and the internal review," referring to the administration's forthcoming in-house study of Iraq policy. Yet even Bush's most loyal lieutenants can only point to relatively minor examples such as the creation of the Department of Homeland Security (which Bush initially opposed) and the doomed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers as instances of a president's being, as the Bush friend said, "willing to change his mind." (Other Bush confidants point to his decision to fire longtime chief of staff Andy Card and Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld as evidence of his willingness to change, but both were drawn-out decisions that many friends believed came too late.)

The tone of Bush's senior aides, who were interviewed this week by news-week, was dismissive, even condescending, toward Baker and the Iraq Study Group. The word from the White House was not entirely Stay the Course, but pretty close. The Iraq Study Group is just one of three ongoing reviews of Iraq policy, say the Bush aides, and not the most important one at that. Bush is also hearing from his Joint Chiefs of Staff as well as a team under Hadley. Bush may trim and fiddle here and there, say his advisers, but he is determined to send a signal of unwavering determination—that he is in charge, and he will not abandon Iraq.

Bush's reluctance to change course—Bill Kristol, The Weekly Standard editor, calls Bush "the last neocon in power"—may come as a disappointment to voters who thought they were sending the president a message last Election Day. Bush seems determined to play the role of a 21st-century Winston Churchill, steadfast in the West's darkest hour, when many Americans see Bush as the captain on the bridge of the Titanic. But in fact the dire situation in Iraq—and the reality that there are no magical fixes—may push the president into listening to Baker and other advisers, if only for a moment, and then maybe with only half an ear. At least that is what Baker, according to those who know him, is hoping and maneuvering for—a chance to get his foot in the door of the Oval Office, to make one last pass at getting Bush to make an attempt at true diplomacy in the Middle East.

Bush may have dismissed talk of a "graceful exit," but Baker, who knows something about getting out of tight spots, is looking for just that. Baker realizes, however, that getting any kind of successful outcome will take a great deal of diplomacy on many fronts, starting with his long but somewhat cool relationship with the president of the United States. According to friends familiar with his thinking, Baker realizes that his panel's report could wind up just sitting on a shelf somewhere. But he wants a shot at sitting down with the president—at getting Bush to ponder new approaches to keeping Iraq, and possibly the entire Middle East, from disintegrating even further.

Baker likes to be the man behind the scenes. He is very deferential to his Iraq Study Group co-chairman, Lee Hamilton, a respected former Democratic chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. (Baker refused to be photographed by NEWSWEEK unless Hamilton was also pictured.) Baker is mindful of Ronald Reagan's old dictum that you can accomplish a lot if you don't care who gets the credit. But Baker's critics, on both the left and the right, think he is engaging mostly in a classic Washington cover-your-rear operation. He wants, the skeptics say, to get credit for making a noble effort to bring light and reason to the dunderheads in power—even if the effort is doomed. That may be an unduly cynical view of Baker's motivations, though it may describe the ultimate outcome.

The odds for "victory" in Iraq, whatever that means, are long. The star-crossed country first conceived on the back of a British imperialist's envelope 80 years ago seems fated to consume itself in sectarian blood-letting. But the debate roiling in Washington is not just for show. It represents a basic clash of approaches to getting out of the worst American mess since Vietnam. No one wants to say it, but the real question is whether the United States can manage to be defeated in Iraq in a way that does not lead to worse disasters in the region—or another terrorist attack at home.

Baker is a charter member of what is known in foreign-policy circles as the Realist School. The chief apostle of the Realists is Brent Scowcroft, Bush 41's national-security adviser. In public and private statements, Scowcroft has been deeply skeptical of the dream of the neoconservatives to bring democracy to the Middle East. Scowcroft consistently and openly warned that invading Iraq would not herald a new age of freedom in the region but rather inflame old sectarian passions. Better, Scowcroft urged, to aim for policies that would promote stability in the region. Those policies might keep despots in power, but they would at least keep the region from exploding into violence that could cut off America's vital pipeline to Middle East oil and create generations of resentments that could breed more terrorists. Scowcroft's sober-minded op-ed pieces and candid remarks to reporters before, during and after the invasion of Iraq succeeded in making him persona non grata in the White House of George W. Bush.

Baker, Scowcroft's old friend and colleague as Bush 41's secretary of State, has been more circumspect in public, trying not to unnecessarily antagonize the younger Bush and his True Believer followers. Baker and Scowcroft talk often, and they both stay in touch with Bush 41, who is also a charter member of the Realist School, even if he religiously avoids being seen second-guessing his son.

To the neocon faithful who shaped Bush 43's world view after 9/11, Baker is often depicted as a creature of Washington who favors compromise over conviction. For the record, Baker mostly makes jokes about his cautious approach when it comes to the use of force. "I used to get asked why I didn't want to push on to Baghdad [in the 1991 gulf war]," Baker likes to say. "I don't get asked that question much anymore."

It is well known that Baker is a firm believer in talk over force, not just because, as Churchill once said, "jaw-jaw is better than war-war," but because Baker has great faith in his own powers as a negotiator. Time after time through a long career as Reagan's chief of staff and Treasury secretary and as a top adviser to Bush 41, Baker was able to deliver deals against great odds. Baker is crafty and endlessly patient. He can sit for hours listening to statesmen bloviate, waiting for them to run out of gas and start to bargain.

The Iraq Study Group report has been written with the sort of high-minded generalities needed to achieve consensus among strong-minded Republicans and Democrats. It will not demand an international peace conference on the future of the Middle East or insist that the Unites States pressure Israel to restart the vexed peace process with the Palestinians.

Baker starts from the premise that none of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, want Iraq to dissolve into the kind of bloody chaos that can spread through the region, pitting Sunnis against Shiites and faction against faction. He has also been a longtime believer that the best way for the United States to establish credibility in the Arab world—and in Europe, for that matter—is to get serious about the creation of a viable Palestinian state. As Bush 41's secretary of State, Baker was willing to lean on the Israelis to try to make peace with the Palestinians by forgoing the establishment of settlements on the West Bank. Under pressure from Israel's friends in Congress, Bush 41's team backed off. But Baker's own desire to use the Israeli-Palestinian peace process as a key to defusing the wider animosities in the region is well known.

Baker also believes a successful negotiator never goes into talks by publicly laying down conditions for the other side to meet. By that measure, President Bush is making a mistake by insisting that Iran agree to give up enriching uranium that can be used to build a nuclear weapon before the United States will even sit down at the table. Of course, slowing or stopping the Iranian nuclear program should be a prime goal for American diplomacy. But, in Baker's view, according to those familiar with his thinking, it won't happen just by refusing to talk to the Iranians. The question of engaging Iran could be the stickiest of all between Baker and Bush, for people who know Bush well say that the president regards a nuclear Iran as an issue on par with Iraq—the two nations that, with North Korea, formed the "Axis of Evil" of Bush's post-9/11 presidency.

Of course, Baker's emphasis on diplomacy may be naive. As conservative columnist Charles Krauthammer has argued, the Iranians are content to foment chaos in Iraq that could eventually produce a Shiite state that would lean, if not bend, toward Tehran. The best check on Iranian ambitions in the region would be a stable Iraq that represents Sunnis and Kurds as well as Shiites, and that is what the current administration is working to achieve, if sometimes clumsily and with uncertain success. Why do anything to legitimize the Islamic radicals who run Iran? By the same token, why should the Bush administration want to talk to Syria? The Syrian regime has been trying to impose its will on Lebanon's fragile democracy. This may not be the time to be making nice with Syrian strongman Bashar Assad. Bush has said that Iraq is a sovereign state and should conduct its own diplomacy with its neighbors. He may be right that America's attempts to dicker between Iraq and Iran or Syria are futile and possibly even counterproductive.

On the other hand, Baker may be right that jump-starting the Israeli-Palestinian talks is necessary to achieving some wider Middle East peace process. The Bush administration has already been making some moves to gently push the Israelis toward talking to the Palestinians. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been traveling back and forth to the region, and Vice President Dick Cheney journeyed to Saudi Arabia to visit his old friends in the royal family—to speak privately of many things, no doubt, but also to sound out the Saudis on the seemingly eternal Palestinian crisis.

These diplomatic gestures may be a way of saying that the Baker Commission isn't recommending anything new or different, that the Bush team is already on the case and even a step ahead. Indeed, earlier this fall a top adviser to Bush privately told a NEWSWEEK reporter that Bush's greatest ambition was to leave behind a Palestinian peace pact and a viable Palestinian state. But at the moment, prospects for a deal between Israel and the Palestinians are just about as bad as ever. The Palestinians are feuding among themselves; the lead faction in control of Parliament, the sometimes-terrorist group Hamas, refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist.

The prospects for improving matters on the ground in Iraq seem just as vexed. Last week, Anthony Cordesman, a widely respected analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, gave a highly discouraging briefing to reporters. The administration's devout wish and goal is to stand down its forces as Iraq stands up its own. Indeed, last week, Prime Minister Maliki asserted that Iraq would be able to take over its own security in six months. Cordesman's statistics make a mockery of that promise. By his count, maybe one in four of Iraq's Army battalions are able to "perform a useful function." Cordesman pointed out that the latest Defense Department report says there is no way to count the number of men in the Iraqi police force, and there is no system for rating the effectiveness of police units. But the daily carnage suggests that the police are overwhelmed—if they're not actually in on the killing of civilians.

Washington's tendency to blame the Iraqi government for the current disaster is misplaced, Cordesman says. "The idea that when you send the bull in to liberate a china shop, you blame the china shop for breaking the china is, shall we say, somewhat ingenuous and probably misleading."

Bush has not given up on Maliki. The president continues to believe in the 56-year-old prime minister as the best hope of creating some kind stability in Iraq, say Bush's advisers. The Americans have been spying on Maliki, according to administration officials who declined to be identified for obvious reasons, and they have not caught him double-dealing or trying to sell out the United States. (A reference in the leaked Hadley memo to "sensitive reporting" may have alluded to eavesdropping on Maliki.) Indeed, his snub of President Bush apparently had more to do with local politics. Maliki did not want to appear to get too close to Jordan's King Abdullah II, who was also meeting with Bush. Abdullah, who keeps warning of Iraq's falling into a "Shiite crescent" stretching across the Middle East, is not popular with the Shiite majority in Iraq.

But if Maliki is, in the old cold-war saying, "our son of a bitch," he's not a very formidable one. At times he seems to be a second-tier bureaucrat caught between Sunnis who want to kill him and his Shiite allies—particular the sinister Moqtada al-Sadr.

Maliki's aides were encouraged by the Bush summit. They asked for and got assurances that Maliki could communicate directly through the White House and not have to work through the balky State Department. The Iraqis don't really expect to have control of their own security by next summer. But they want more freedom to try. "It's like the father with a baby and a bicycle," one Maliki aide told Bush. "You have to let him fall and if he scrapes himself you can run and pick him up. But if you hold on too long, trying to mentor everything, he will never be able to ride on his own."

The American military is fed up with Maliki. The ground commanders in Iraq felt betrayed by him this summer when he undermined a push to get control of the streets of Baghdad. The Iraqis failed to deliver on a promise to put enough troops on the ground. A four-star general who declined to be identified discussing a confidential conversation told of this encounter with Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who was in charge of day-to-day ground operations. "Do you have enough forces? Enough to clear an area and stay there to secure it 24/7?" Chiarelli replied, "Of course not." The four-star recalls replying, "It's going to fail, it's absolutely going to fail." The Americans never had enough forces to sweep even half the city, much less secure it. Maliki made their job tougher by in effect forbidding the U.S. military from taking on Shiite fighters; ordering them to lift roadblocks around Sadr City, the Shiite slum, and ordering them to release prisoners suspected of running death squads.

It's not clear whether the military made its frustrations known to the White House. Generals tend to salute and say can-do; if anything, the military has not been accurately portraying the dismal events on the ground, at least in the eyes of some White House aides. But with Donald Rumsfeld's departure, the Pentagon is entering a new era of leadership, in hopes it will be one in which the uniformed brass and their civilian bosses will communicate better. Gen. John Abizaid, the overall theater commander, and Gen. George Casey, the ground commander, are exhausted and overdue for replacement. ("There might be a sense that a fresh perspective is needed," said a senior White House aide.) Rumsfeld's former right-hand man, Stephen Cambone, has announced that he is stepping down. Others are expected to follow, stripping the Pentagon leadership of the group around Rumsfeld whose neocon certainties led to such catastrophic miscalculations in Iraq.

The job of rebuilding a demoralized and war-weary Pentagon will fall to the new Defense secretary, Robert Gates. Popular among the ranks as CIA director under Bush 41, Gates is low-key and rarely acts before he examines all the evidence. He has a dry, sardonic sense of humor; though he can affect Texan bonhomie, he's not really the towel-snapping type. He is said to have some spine. He was a big supporter of Bush 41's desire to dramatically (and unilaterally) scrap the U.S. stockpile of tactical nuclear weapons even though the military warned against such a bold move.

He'll have his work cut out for him winning over President Bush, who is not patient with advisers who take time getting to the point. White House aides speaking anonymously to NEWSWEEK seemed to suggest that Gates would not have a lot of impact on crafting a new Iraq policy; any tweaks in the policy, they say, will be made before Gates is sworn in sometime in January. This portrayal of Gates's role may be a further attempt to play down the picture of Bush 41's old cronies riding to the rescue. Gates is close to Bush 41.

It is not out of the question that Bush 43 will be brought around by the so-called Realists. Fantasies of a liberal democracy in Iraq are long gone. The most Bush can reasonably hope for in Iraq is some measure of stability, which is what the Realists want, too. Bush's situation—and petulant tone—are not unlike Lyndon Johnson's in 1968, when the Vietnam War was getting no better, despite troop levels' reaching a half-million men and a heavy bombing campaign. Johnson's new secretary of Defense, Clark Clifford, was a clever fixer/statesman, just like Baker. Johnson ranted to his advisers, "Let's get one thing clear! I'm telling you now that I'm not going to stop the bombing!" (Bush last week: "There's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete.") But Clifford and the other Wise Men he brought into the White House did persuade LBJ to halt the bombing and open peace talks with the North Vietnamese. Baker & Co. might still nudge Bush onto a track that involves more diplomacy and less force.

There is, however, a cautionary coda to the Vietnam comparison. The revolt of the Wise Men in 1968 did change administration policy—but it did not end the war. The peace talks dragged on until Richard Nixon became president in 1969; he then re-escalated the war, which didn't end until another five years had passed and 25,000 more American soldiers had been lost. Iraq has not cost nearly as many American lives. But Vietnam fundamentally shaped America in ways that reverberate even today, and no matter what happens between George Bush and Jim Baker in the coming days and weeks, it is likely that Iraq will be with us for as long as Vietnam has been—or longer.

Sticking To His Guns (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

While George W. Bush's many critics and detractors portray him as facing the same dilemma as Lyndon Johnson in Vietnam, Bush himself seems determined to proceed the way Harry Truman did in Korea–or, as some might put it, as Winston Churchill did after Dunkirk. Leading Democrats like Sen. Carl Levin have been calling for troop pullouts from Iraq starting in four to six months. The Iraq Study Group cochaired by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, the New York Times tells us, will recommend a "gradual pullback" of troops, direct negotiations with Iran and Syria, and pressure on Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians.

But Bush seems unpersuaded. "There's one thing I'm not going to do," he said at last week's NATO summit in Riga, Latvia. "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete." In this, Bush has the support of others. Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates opposes a quick pullout. So do all the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Central Command's Gen. John Abizaid. Retired generals who have criticized Bush testified that we should send more troops into Iraq. Democrats seem disinclined to use their congressional majorities to cut short our mission in Iraq lest they be blamed for the unpleasant consequences many predict.

So maybe the Vietnam analogy will not apply. And it shouldn't, because it's misleading. The Communists' Tet offensive was a smashing defeat for them, not us, as outlined in Peter Braestrup's 1977 book Big Story. Military historian Lewis Sorley has shown how after Tet, Gen. Creighton Abrams produced a strategy that was proving successful-until Congress prevented the United States from fulfilling its promises of aid against the North Vietnamese offensive in 1975. In Iraq, our enemies may not be making all the progress they seek, and changes in our military tactics are likely. Many argue for embedding more U.S. troops in Iraqi Army units. Other recommendations may come from the review commissioned–evidently out of dissatisfaction with current operations–by Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace.

Bush, like Truman and Churchill, seems determined not to concede defeat. And remember that for Truman on Korea and for Churchill after Dunkirk, no promising military courses were immediately apparent. Truman, after firing Gen. Douglas MacArthur, had forsaken the threat–a nuclear attack–that his successor Dwight Eisenhower deployed to get the Communists to agree to a truce. But Truman's perseverance despite his 22 percent job approval–much lower than Bush's–was essential in preserving the independence of South Korea, which now has the world's 14th-largest economy. Churchill, facing Hitler alone, could promise only "blood, toil, tears, and sweat" until his enemies' mistakes–Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union, the Japanese strike on Pearl Harbor–gave him the allies that made victory possible. Churchill's stubbornness prevented a Nazi victory in midsummer 1940.

No Iranian nukes. We should keep in mind, as well, Bush's repeated vow not to allow Iran to get nuclear weapons. That's in tension with the Iraq Study Group's expected recommendation of direct negotiations with Iran: The obvious quid pro quo for Iranian help in stabilizing Iraq would be dropping our opposition to Iran's nuclear program. In fact, the opposite approach may be what's needed. Historian Arthur Herman in this month's Commentary calls for airstrikes not only on Iran's nuclear facilities but also on its ports and refineries; Iran depends on imports for its gasoline, and without ports and refineries, its economy and military would grind to a halt. That's a move that might be condemned by the "international community," and it risks antagonizing the people of Iran, many of whom tend to hate the mullahs and admire America. But it also might destabilize the regime and dislodge a president who has threatened the destruction of Israel and America. Who today regrets Israel's strike against Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981?

NBC News has declared that Iraq is in the midst of a "civil war," just as CBS's Walter Cronkite declared Vietnam was lost after Tet. Many in the mainstream media today, as in 1968, see nothing but the prospect of American defeat. George W. Bush seems to have other ideas.

What We Would Leave Behind (TIME)

By Aparisim Ghosh

Time, December 4, 2006

What would happen to Iraq if Washington follows the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group? The group's underlying assumption is that Iraqi forces will be ready to take over from the U.S. military by early 2008. To test that thesis, it is instructive to look at parts of southern Iraq from which coalition forces have already been withdrawn. There Shi'ite militias backed by Iran have taken control, intimidating government forces into submission and terrorizing Sunnis. On several occasions Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, has had to plead with radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr to restrain his fighters from killing soldiers... The Iraqi Exodus (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

The gunman stood at the foot of his bed. "Are you al-Jaboury?" he yelled. It was 2 o'clock on a stifling July morning, and al-Jaboury had been sound asleep next to his wife. After hearing his name, the young Iraqi police officer didn't hesitate. Grabbing the gun he had been stashing under his pillow every night since he'd joined the police 18 months earlier, he shot the intruder in the throat. The gunman's accomplices all fled.

But the danger wasn't over. "I knew the insurgents would come back, and maybe they would blow up the whole house," al-Jaboury says. "My wife blamed me for joining the police. She said that I am a Sunni and that I know that the insurgents don't like this, and that I would get killed sooner or later." The next day, al-Jaboury left his wife, his daughter, and his home in the troubled Diyala province and took off in a neighbor's pickup truck, loaded with fruit, and headed for Syria. He had $300 in his pocket.

For the past few months, al-Jaboury has just been scraping by in a Damascus suburb packed with poor Iraqis. Back in Iraq, insurgents continue to threaten his wife, telling her that the only part of al-Jaboury they want back is his head. Today, al-Jaboury works in a small Syrian hotel, making $10 a day, plus room and board. "I am living a disgusting life now," he says, "and I can't take the idea of cleaning toilets after being a policeman cleaning society." His chief goal now: making enough money to rent an apartment to be able to send for his wife and child to join him in Syria. "I think," he says, "that will take a long time."

Like al-Jaboury, an average of 2,000 Iraqis a day are fleeing to Syria–and the numbers appear to be growing. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that at least 700,000 Iraqis have taken refuge in Syria, while an additional 700,000 or so are in Jordan. (Iraq's estimated population is 27 million.) Few of the refugees have any legal protections, leaving them hostage to the whims of local government officials and reluctant even to divulge their full names.

While some had fled during Saddam Hussein's reign, most have arrived since the U.S. invasion, desperate to escape the spiraling violence. The numbers jumped sharply after the bombing of the Shiite shrine in Samarra last February that intensified Iraq's sectarian strife. With Iraq slipping toward an all-out civil war amid record numbers of civilians being killed each month, a UNHCR official warns that hundreds of thousands more Iraqis appear to be "teetering" on the brink of departure. Even U.S. officials, many of whom have previously downplayed refugee flows, now acknowledge they are increasingly concerned. "We do know the trend is growing," says a State Department official.

"Brain drain." The tide of refugees is just one of the more visible symptoms of the regional spillover from the chaos in Iraq. Amid concerns that the violence could eventually spread across the border, calls for a more regional approach to Iraq have been intensifying. The Iraq Study Group, created by the U.S. Congress to search for new policy options in Iraq and led by former Secretary of State James Baker, is set to release its keenly awaited report this week. One anticipated recommendation will call for the Bush administration to open a dialogue with Iran and Syria. President Bush was in Jordan last week to meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, while Iraqi President Jalal Talabani made a high-profile visit to Iran.

'Civil War' Or Not? (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD–With its crisp air and blue skies, the late fall offers some of the best weather in an often unpleasant climate. But as daily violence continues to convulse Baghdad, people tend to go outside only when necessary. The city's many playgrounds are overgrown from disuse, with grass that rises as high as the seats of rusted swing sets. The ambulance siren, residents now say, is the country's national anthem.

As the capital last week eased out of the round-the-clock curfew imposed after the bombing of the Shiite enclave of Sadr City that killed over 200 people, traffic was light–except on the airport road, where families packed into cars and braved roadside bombs for the chance to fly to another place. Exhausted and heartbroken, many Iraqis who remain are nonetheless reluctant to call the violent turmoil here a civil war. "We've been living all together, Sunni, Shia, Christian," says Baghdad policeman Ali Khalaf Jasim, his tone tinged with disbelief. "This can't be civil war."

Such sentiments are a nod to tribal ties and intermarriage that bind millions together across sects. But with each passing day those relationships seem more strained–along with hopes that the government can do anything about it. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is increasingly viewed as weak and beholden to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who temporarily suspended–but did not withdraw, Iraqi government spokesmen were quick to point out–his bloc's membership in the national parliament to protest the prime minister's meeting with President Bush.

Skeptics. Maliki got no boost with the pre-meeting disclosure of an assessment by White House National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley–a memo that allowed that "his intentions seem good." But, it added, "the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action." Such assessments mirror the views of many in Iraq–minus the part, particularly among Sunnis, about good intentions.

The memo prompted heavy questioning from Iraqi journalists about what, precisely, the prime minister's plans were. Maliki announced one of them–to have his country assume control of its own security forces by June 2007, a development that would, he said, allow U.S. troops to begin withdrawing. In the meantime, a government spokesman added, what Maliki needs are "tools to rise up and to find a solution for the crisis."

Militia power. One of the tools America offered up last week, an infusion of some 3,500 new U.S. troops to Baghdad, was greeted with little more than a shrug among some Iraqis who wondered whether more soldiers will make much of a difference as political parties build militias to consolidate their power. These militias now control access to vital resources like healthcare and increasingly subscribe to the view that, in the words of one Iraqi journalist, "the best way to defend their turf is to attack."

American soldiers, too, had questions about what, exactly, more troops will do. "'Go secure Baghdad' is a pretty big hand-wave in a general direction," says Maj. Mark Brady, a U.S. military adviser to an Iraqi Army battalion based in Baghdad. "What does that involve? What are they going to do that others aren't doing right now?" And how, others wonder, will they help to convince tired and shut-in Iraqi citizens that their government can deliver on promises they feel it has broken time and again.

For his part, Lt. Col. Steven Duke, a brigade military transition teams commander, feels his U.S. troops here could use some explanations, as well. "I wish there was a better barometer for our soldiers over here to be able to gauge: 'Are we winning? Are we making progress?'" The other day, he says, a suicide bomb at a police recruiting station sent human body parts over the wall near his headquarters. "Are we in a civil war?" he asks. "I don't know. I know there's a lot of people being killed because of their religious sect, and I know the Iraqi Army here is doing their best to get a grip on it-and they need their government to back them up."

The Civil War Behind "Civil War" (TIME)

By James Poniewozik

Time, December 4, 2006

When Katie Couric took over the CBS Evening News, some viewers wondered whether a Today show anchor could claim Walter Cronkite's mantle. Turns out we were wondering about the wrong Today anchor. When Matt Lauer announced that NBC would start referring to the conflict in Iraq as a "civil war," media observers hailed it as a "Cronkite moment," referring to the CBS anchor's 1968 declaration that the Vietnam War was unwinnable, upon which L.B.J. realized he had lost Middle America.

The backlash to Lauer's Cronkitization was quick, for several reasons. First: dude, we're talking Matt Lauer here. Second: Cronkite's language--"We are mired in stalemate"--was far stronger. Third: some newspapers, including the Los Angeles Times and the Christian Science Monitor, quietly started using "civil war" earlier (as did TIME). Last: polls and common sense indicated that most Americans already believed Iraq's sectarian fighting was a civil war.

So, O.K., NBC's declaration may have no effect on the war in Iraq. But it was a signal moment in the war between the Bush White House and the media. If the issue seems like pointless semantics, it is hardly so to the Administration, which has been fixated on framing issues and politicizing language. It (and Fox News) renamed suicide bombers "homicide bombers." It cast the fight against al-Qaeda as a "war on terror," even though the struggle was unlike old-fashioned wars between armies. Now it wants Iraq not to be a "civil war"--ironically, on the ground that it is unlike old-fashioned civil wars between armies--and has suggested that anyone who calls it one is taking political sides.

The White House got its way for a long time, and that's not surprising. The period from 9/11 through much of the Iraq war was often shameful for the media, especially TV news. There was plenty of excellent, tough, heroic reporting. But from the production offices, where the tone and packaging of the news are set, came hints that, in wartime, the Fourth Estate was on the side of the good guys. Newscasts were adorned with American flags, and press outlets (including, initially, TIME) prematurely made aÂ John Wayne figure ofÂ Private First Class Jessica Lynch.

This was not because the media were jingoistic but because the media business was, and is, existentially scared. TV audiences and print readerships are shrinking, along with media payrolls; nightly newscasts and newspapers wonder how much longer they will exist, much less thrive. The Administration has played on that fear of irrelevance, freezing out big institutions in favor of friendly local outlets and allies. A Bush aide told reporter Ron Suskind that journalists were an ineffectual "reality-based community." Were the mainstream media dying? The ebullient Bushies seemed to answer, They're already dead!

Layered on this was the sense of a conservative swarm sweeping the country. War supporters and "values voters" were coming out of the woodwork in elections, lining up for The Passion of the Christ and making Fox the sole TV-news success story of the era. They were collecting scalps--Bill Maher, Peter Arnett, Dan Rather--and taking names. They had blogs and remotes and money, and they hated the press. Journalists might not slant stories to show their loyalty, but what was the harm in hanging a little bunting on the screen?

The ideology of scared media is me-too-ism: straining to show the audience you like what it likes, be it Harry Potter or Donald Rumsfeld. (He's tough! He's funny! He's a sex symbol! The Philadelphia Inquirer dubbed him a "stud muffin.") With the worsening of Iraq, however, coverage became more assertive, and after Hurricane Katrina, reporters found they could question the Administration without being struck dead. With the "civil war" fight--as with erstwhile stud muffin Rumsfeld--the momentum has reversed. It's less important what the press is calling the war than that the White House is no longer calling the terms.

Of course, all this proves is that me-too-ism knows no party. NBC took its public step only after Bush's midterm thumpin'. Middle America may have been led by Cronkite, but now the reins are firmly in the other hand. In a perfect world, the media would be led by the facts, and the audience by its own mind. But if the public is giving the news permission to be more, well, reality-based, then lead on, folks, lead on.

What I Did On My Travels (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, December 4, 2006

There were plenty of reminders of why President Bush doesn't relish traveling abroad. In Moscow, the VIP terminal's red carpet turned out to be just a wide stripe of red paint on the Tarmac. In Jordan, all the King's men formed a wild motorcade, their vehicles nearly crashing into one another as they jostled for position trying to snap photos of the presidential limousine. In between were five other countries for a total of some 37,000 miles and 56 events.

But if there was ever a good time for George W. Bush to leave home for a spell, it was right after the mid-term elections, when Capitol Hill was aswarm with triumphant Democrats. He spent two weeks abroad, separated by a brief Thanksgiving interlude at Camp David. Air Force One, the Boeing 747 that has its own medical facility, among other amenities, circled the globe twice, serving Swiss burgers and taco salad, with snicker-doodles for dessert. On the ground in Amman, the White House staff did grapple with local dishes like chicken frekah and homemade knafeh. The President and First Lady Laura Bush watched a replay of the Michigan--Ohio State game onboard during a 36-hour day that saw the couple in Ho Chi Minh City, Jakarta and across the international date line on their way to Hickam Air Force Base adjoining Pearl Harbor.

European leaders expecting a humbled Bush at the NATO summit in Latvia instead got a stout speech in which he rearticulated his foreign policy. "We must advance freedom," he said, "as the great alternative to tyranny and terror." When kids in Indonesia asked his hobby, he replied, "Baseball--sports" and told them to go easy on TV. He got his most enthusiastic reception in Vietnam, as curious onlookers lined the roads and waved at his passing motorcade. There was much the country and the visiting dignitary had in common. Neither has much appetite for looking back at the difficulties of the past. Far better to stay on the move.

Why Military Calls To Raise Iraq Effort Grow (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe, Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As demands mount to pull U.S. troops out of Iraq, a growing number of senior military officials are arguing that the only way to salvage the situation is to add more U.S. forces and more U.S. money.

DOJ_NMG_0101677

Outside the military, most of the debate is focused on a U.S. troop withdrawal. But inside the Pentagon, the recent dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has given some new life to arguments by military officers who say the U.S. must pour more troops and money into the country to expand the Iraqi army -- the one institution in Iraq that has shown some promise -- and stabilize the capital.

Right now there are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Though there are no firm plans for an increase, some military officials said that as many as 30,000 more troops could be needed. Most of the U.S. troops would be focused on patrolling Baghdad and training the Iraqi Army.

During his tenure Mr. Rumsfeld largely rejected calls for sending in more Americans, countering that Iraqis should take on more security responsibility faster. He was backed in his approach by Gen. John Abizaid, the senior military commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq. The two generals have argued publicly that the U.S. goal must be to bolster Iraqi Army forces as quickly as feasible.

It isn't clear how much longer the two commanders -- both of whom have served long, grueling tours -- will stay in their jobs. Even before Mr. Rumsfeld's dismissal, the Bush administration was laying plans to replace them as early as this summer. The job of selecting their successors will now fall to Robert Gates, Mr. Bush's nominee to run the Pentagon, who could choose his own team or extend current tours. How hard new commanders might be willing to press to redouble the U.S. commitment in Iraq could have a major effect on U.S. policy going forward.

Even with new leadership in the Pentagon and Iraq, big barriers remain to boosting the size of the U.S. force. Any move to do so will draw the ire of the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill. Multiple reviews of U.S. policy in Iraq also seem poised to recommend that the U.S. start to disengage from Iraq.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, is likely to recommend in a report later this week a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops. President Bush has asked for his own internal review, led by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, who has suggested that a focus of the administration going forward will be building up Iraqi troops.

Senior military officials seeking to make one last push to stabilize Baghdad might find a receptive ear with President Bush.

The President used a joint appearance last week with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to signal that his administration wasn't planning troop reductions any time soon. Senior White House officials say Mr. Bush is open to the idea of a drive to stabilize the country by temporarily increasing the number of U.S. forces there. These officials say Mr. Bush has paid a political price for the war and now has a brief window of time before the 2008 election cycle intensifies to change conditions on the ground there. The officials say Mr. Rumsfeld's ouster was misinterpreted as a sign that a significant shift is coming.

"We have not failed in Iraq," said Stephen Hadley, Mr. Bush's National Security Adviser, on NBC's "Meet the Press" yesterday. "We will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed."

The push among the uniformed military to do more in Iraq is being driven, in part, by a small study group working for Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The group's work, which is classified, lays out several options for Iraq. But it seems to favor a temporary increase in U.S. forces as part of a broader effort to build the Iraqi Army, says an officer familiar with its work.

The officers' recommendations largely run counter to Mr. Rumsfeld's own ideas, which were revealed in a leaked memorandum written by Mr. Rumsfeld in early November and published yesterday by the New York Times. In the memo Mr. Rumsfeld suggests a pulling back of U.S. forces to bigger bases and possible withdrawals of U.S. troops "so the Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Most military officers, however, seem to believe that a pullback of U.S. forces would only trigger more violence and make political compromise in the country impossible. These officers argue that 20,000 U.S. troops are needed to bring order to Baghdad. Another 10,000 U.S. soldiers would also be needed to work as advisers with the Iraqi Army, which currently numbers about 134,000 troops and might need to double in size.

Military officials who advocate such an approach warn that it could take years and hundreds of billions of dollars. But many of these officers bristle at the idea that it is too hard or impossible.

"The notion that we can't provide protection for people in one of the capital cities of this world [Baghdad] is just rubbish," says retired Gen. Jack Keane, who has made trips to Iraq to meet with commanders and provide recommendations to senior military officials. Gen. Keane, who advocates sending more U.S. forces into Baghdad neighborhoods and bolstering the Iraq Army, says he is speaking for himself.

Active duty Army officers have also stepped forward publicly in recent days to call for a redoubling of the U.S. commitment in Iraq. Col. Bill Hix, who spent 13 months in Iraq as the chief strategist for Gen. George Casey, wrote last week in Stanford University's Hoover Digest that more money is needed in the country for reconstruction. At the same time he suggested that it would be a mistake to pull out U.S. troops. "Iraq is simply in no position to progress politically or economically without assistance," wrote Col. Hix, who is now a strategist in the Pentagon. He suggests finding $20 billion to revive the anemic and largely ineffective U.S.-led reconstruction effort.

Even backers of an increase in troops acknowledge the plan carries risks that President Bush and Mr. Gates will have to weigh. One worry is that the increase will break an already strained Army and Marine Corps at a time when they might be needed to address other problems in the world. To find the additional troops, the Pentagon likely would have to extend some units' tours in Iraq beyond a year. The Army, which is also short equipment for units, would have to pool equipment from many units back in the U.S. to prepare a few to deploy.

America's Moral Duty In Iraq (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

James Baker almost smiled.

When the poker-faced co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group heard a commentator who had been invited to advise the group say that America's aim must be "victory," Baker's stony visage betrayed the bitter amusement that the word "victory" now occasions. Not even the word "success" seems elastic enough to cover any attainable outcome. Remember the "demonstration effect" that Iraq's self-governance was to have in transforming the region? Although America's vice president calls Iraq "a fellow democracy," it lacks a government whose writ runs beyond Baghdad's Green Zone.

John McCain seethed.

Weeks ago, he had been with a proud father of a Marine who was then in Iraq. Recently McCain had heard that the son's legs had been blown off. "At the hips," McCain said, intensely, several times, with a clenched-jaw fury born of frustration. Fifteen minutes later, on ABC's "This Week," McCain brought a steely clarity to the Iraq debate.

For three years he has been saying, correctly, that there are far too few U.S. troops in Iraq. For months he has said we cannot win without many more troops. That, too, is correct -- if it does not imply that some surge of troops can now guarantee winning. He has also said: Absent a commitment to send significantly more troops to Iraq, it would be "immoral" to keep asking the same number of troops "to risk life and limb so that we might delay our defeat for a few months or a year."

George Stephanopoulos: "President Bush has said he doesn't want to send more troops now. So by your own standards isn't it currently immoral to keep Marines and soldiers, other service people in Iraq?"

McCain: "Yes it is."

Moments later, Stephanopoulos asked: "At what point do you say, I am not going to be complicit with an immoral policy?"

McCain: "When I think we've exhausted every possibility to do what is necessary to succeed and not until then, because the consequences of failure are catastrophic. . . . We left Vietnam, it was over, we just had to heal the wounds of war. We leave this place, chaos in the region and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict in my view. A lot more."

Stephanopoulos: If the Iraq Study Group does not call for an increase in troops as you've advocated, "will you call for American troops to come home?"

McCain: "I will if at the point I think that we have exhausted every option and that we are doomed to failure."

At long last, rigor. McCain applies two principles of moral reasoning. There can be no moral duty to attempt what cannot be done. And: If you will an end, you must will the means to that end.

Sen. John Warner put down a marker.

Four months ago the Virginia Republican said that Congress must "examine very carefully" what it authorized the president to do in 2002 when it authorized military action against Iraq. Warner wondered whether, if there is an "all-out civil war," the president must "come back to the Congress to get further indication of support."

If only Iraq had -- were capable of -- a normal civil war. Its civil war -- fueled by religion and tribal rivalries and leavened by rampant criminality and depravity for its own sake -- does not offer a clear binary choice between regionally based sides that would allow U.S. forces to pick one and help it win.

Today there are many fewer Iraqis than there were three years ago. This is not just, or even primarily, because so many Iraqis, especially from the mobile middle class, have fled the country, taking with them the human capital -- skills, attitudes, mores -- requisite for a successful society. Rather, many -- and more every day -- of those who remain in Iraq no longer think of themselves as Iraqis. It is too dangerous to identify with the nation.

The national government is gossamer, but subgroups are solid. They are in an intensifying melee that has, according to Stephen Biddle of the Council on Foreign Relations, "genocidal stakes." Writing in the National Interest, Biddle says that "the downside risks" for any group that is party to a power-sharing deal include extermination by mass violence from rival groups. America cannot now credibly promise protection commensurate with that risk.

And absent adoption of the McCain policy -- a substantial increase in forces -- America's waning influence on events may derive from the increasing likelihood that the scant protection that American forces now provide will be withdrawn.

Bush To Meet With Top Iraqi Shiite Leader (MCT)

By Greg Gordon, John Walcott

McClatchy Newspapers, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush will hold an Oval Office meeting with a key Iraqi Shiite leader Monday amid a scramble to bolster the strife-torn nation's unity government before it collapses in civil war.

The meeting with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution, is considered an effort to boost support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, with whom Bush met in Jordan last Thursday. Al-Hakim is a leading opponent of anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls the most powerful bloc in Iraq's ruling coalition.

The administration hopes that by urging Hakim and other al-Sadr rivals to support Maliki more forcefully, they can reign in the growing radical influence of al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia, two senior administration officials said Sunday.

Bush's meeting with Hakim, two days before a bipartisan Iraq Study Group issues its recommendations for a new U.S. approach to Iraq, comes in the wake of news leaks reflecting a far more pessimistic outlook about the war among Bush's top advisers than the administration has expressed publicly. In the latest leaked memo, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld wrote two days before his Nov. 8 resignation that the U.S. strategy was "not working well enough or fast enough" and that "a major adjustment" was needed, the New York Times and Washington Post reported.

On NBC's "Meet the Press" Sunday, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley dismissed Rumsfeld's memo as "a laundry list of ideas" that was submitted in response to Bush's request to a number of agencies for new approaches.

Hadley said the president is reviewing his Iraq policy and that the study group's report will be "an important input," but that Bush also wants to hear from Congress, his military commanders and Iraqi leaders before making any policy decisions.

While conceding administration mistakes in Iraq, Hadley insisted that the United States has "not failed" in the war. He warned that a pullout of U.S. troops would create "a safe haven" for al-Qaida.

The two senior officials, who insisted upon anonymity because their remarks were not cleared by the White House, said the administration has seized on the central proposal in a leaked, Nov. 8 Hadley memo to Bush that urged an end to Maliki's reliance on al-Sadr.

"The idea is to use the rivalry between Hakim and al-Sadr to encourage Hakim and Badr (the Badr Organization militia of Hakim's Supreme Council) to support the government more energetically and to stand up to Sadr's push for control of Baghdad," one of the officials said.

While both the Supreme Council and Sadr's organization are strongly backed by Iran's Shiite regime, al-Sadr is considered to be more anti-American, reluctant to compromise and more unpredictable.

"They both have issues, but Hakim is more of a grown-up," said the second official.

The officials said that the administration's effort to strengthen Maliki and prod him to resist the Sadrists also would include contacts with other Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish leaders whom it considers moderates. They will be offered unspecified "consideration" for their support, the officials said.

Some within the administration regard the Iraqi prime minister as a lost cause, one official said, because as Hadley's memo suggested, Maliki appears either unwilling or unable to combat the rising power of the Shiite militias, especially al-Sadr's. Some officials at the CIA, State Department and Defense Department worry that it already may be too late to head off Sadr's offensive in Baghdad and against Maliki, the officials said.

But both of the senior officials said the administration has concluded that it has no choice but to try to strengthen Maliki, whose election it hailed as a victory for Iraqi democracy. On NBC, Hadley said that representatives of the Sunnis, who are fighting the Shias, "absolutely" would remain a full partner in the unity government.

Sheikh Jalal al-Sagheer, an Iraqi legislator, senior cleric at the Bratha Mosque and close ally of Hakim's, said that his U.S. visit has been in the making for a year and contended it "has no relation with the latest events in Iraq."

Bush also is expected to meet with vice president Tariq al-Hashimi, who is a Sunni, in the coming month, he said.

A "Civil War" Puts Words On Trial (NYT)

By David Carr

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

Decades ago, I wrote an article about a police officer who was notorious for roughing up suspects before he took them in for booking. The term-of-art within the Minneapolis police department for that kind of officer was “thumper,” and there was plenty in the public record to suggest that the noun fit him nicely.

DOJ_NMG_0101680

He called me after the story ran, livid about being labeled a "thumper." He was a scary guy and I equivocated for a bit before I was finally able to stammer out, "is it worse that I said it, or worse that it's true?"

That did not calm him down much. But in the current debate over the use of "civil war" — which began in earnest a week ago when Matt Lauer of NBC said the network would begin using the term to describe the conflict in Iraq — that story serves as a reminder that to name something is not to invent it.

The war over words and definitions is not a new one. The current administration has fought to maintain custody of the Iraqi conflict by defining insurgents as "terrorists" and prisoners of war as "unlawful combatants." During Vietnam, the administration defined civilian casualties as "collateral damage."

And even the term civil war remains freighted with meaning in American culture. When I was traveling in the South and used the term to describe the war between the North and South, an elderly woman corrected me, saying, "Do you mean the war of Yankee aggression?" And that was only a few years ago.

There are those who suggest that there is something vaguely seditious in describing the situation in Iraq as a civil war. (The Los Angeles Times preceded NBC across the threshold by a few days but did not blow the trumpets when it did so.) Bill O'Reilly of Fox News has been critical of the actual conduct of the war, but saves much of his powder for those who would doubt — or he would argue, erode — American resolve by defining the conflict as one that is occurring between native combatants.

"First of all, it doesn't matter whether there is a civil war there," he said Thursday on his show. "That's a media-driven situation." He then suggested that defining the conflict as a civil war was a way of turning words into weapons. "We have a press that is invested in seeing that President Bush is humiliated in Iraq," he said. "They may not be rooting for an American defeat, but most are certainly antiwar and anti-Bush."

Others have compared NBC's choice of words to Walter Cronkite's deadpan declaration that the Vietnam war could not be won after the Tet offensive in 1968. But of course, Mr. Lauer made no such bald assertion and much has changed in public discourse since Vietnam. For one thing, the evening news is no longer the force it was, and the term "civil war" has been in rotation on the Web since the beginning of an organized insurgency.

On closer inspection, what seems like a bold, transgressive step by the media is considerably less. It is not a coincidence that some members of the mainstream media were only willing to attempt to redefine the terms of the current debate after a massive electoral setback to the current administration.

All the way back in March — the point when many commentators say an actual civil war began — a Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 80 percent of respondents believed that sectarian violence would lead to a civil war. The willingness to use "civil war" now is less a brave declaration than a wet, sensitive finger in the wind because mainstream media is much more likely to follow, than lead, political debate.

The people who have covered the war and decide how it gets covered at The New York Times have no problem with the phrase, as far as it goes.

"When you stand in Baghdad with the sand under your feet, you are in the middle of a civil war," said Ashley Gilbertson, a veteran freelance photographer who spent three years in Iraq taking pictures for The New York Times, among other publications, and who is currently writing a book about the American experience there. "In January, I met with insurgents and they only talked about Shiite militias and Sunni violence. They did not even mention the American presence.

"In my years there, it tilted closer and closer to civil war until it became one. There is nothing else to call it," he said, calling from a train in Italy where he is working on his book. "If this were Paris and you had dozens of bodies turning up on the street with well-financed militias composed of French nationals and French Arabs, you would call it a civil war."

Bill Keller, the executive editor of The New York Times, has said in public statements that he had no interest in having the paper handcuffed by "reductionist shorthand" for a war that he called "colossally complicated." For months, The Times has been using modifying phrases like "on the brink of" and "on the verge of" before civil war. But in an e-mail last Friday, Mr. Keller said the endless discussion about removing the modifiers was beside the point.

"I bristle at the way a low-grade semantic argument has become — at least among the partisan cud-chewers — a substitute for serious discussion of what's happening in Iraq and what to do about it," he wrote. He added, perhaps for the benefit of a columnist busy putting rubber on a bald tire, "maybe this argument is a symptom of intellectual fatigue in the punditocracy. Don't get me wrong, obviously I believe words matter. We try to choose them carefully. Sometimes our choices cause offense."

One of his war reporters, Dexter Filkins, is now back home on a journalism fellowship after three years on the ground in Iraq. Mr. Filkins said he rode into Iraq in March of 2003 (in a car he rented in Kuwait, by the way) to cover an American invasion, but left behind a civil war.

"For much of the time, you had a Sunni insurgency, with Sunnis killing Americans and Sunni's killing Shiites, until the big bombing at the Shiite shrine last February," he said. "At that point, the restraint was gone, the Shiites took the gloves off and you had a full-on civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0101681

"We were using phrases like 'on the verge of' and 'on the brink of' so it wasn't like we were not deciding. We were deciding," he said. "I think 'civil war,' used judiciously and sparingly, is a much more accurate description of events. We're in the business of calling things by their real names."

Annan Adds His Voice To A Growing Chorus That Is Calling The Situation In Iraq A "Civil War" (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 3 — Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, said Sunday that Iraq had descended into a civil war that was even deadlier and more anarchic than the 15-year sectarian bloodshed that tore Lebanon apart.

"When we had the strife in Lebanon and other places, we called that a civil war; this is much worse," Mr. Annan said in an interview with the BBC.

Meanwhile, the American military announced on Sunday the deaths of 10 service members, an unusually high toll.

In making his remarks, Mr. Annan joined a growing number of foreign and Iraqi leaders, policy makers and news organizations who say that Iraq is in the grip of civil war. Former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said last Wednesday at a conference in the United Arab Emirates that Iraq was in a civil war. A former Iraqi prime minister, Ayad Allawi, said the same in March.

The Bush administration has not characterized the conflict as a civil war.

The debate over the term raged last week in the United States, after NBC and other major news organizations said they were ready to apply it to Iraq. The discussion is highly political because backers of the war fear that calling Iraq a civil war would erode support among ordinary Americans. Scholars say that the widening sectarian conflict meets the common definition of a civil war and that when measured by deaths per year, Iraq is among the top civil wars of the past half-century. The civilian death toll is believed to be at least 50,000.

Last week, Mr. Annan suggested holding an international conference on Iraq that would include all of the country's major political groups and representatives from around the region.

In Baghdad on Sunday, President Jalal Talabani rejected the call by Mr. Annan, saying the Iraqis were working to stanch the bloodshed through their own political process.

"We have an ongoing political process and a council of representatives that is the best in the region," Mr. Talabani said in a written statement, using the formal name of the Iraqi Parliament. "We became an independent sovereign state, and we decide the issues of the country."

In addition to Mr. Annan, a number of American advisers have suggested that the United States and Iraq should hold a conference that would bring together all the countries in the region to try to re-establish stability in Iraq. Such a meeting might include Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia, all accused by various American and Iraqi leaders of fomenting violence here.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton is expected to recommend in a report this week that the United States open up diplomatic channels with Iran and Syria to discuss the subject. That suggestion has already been coolly received by the White House, where some senior officials say opening talks with those two countries would in itself be a major concession to their authoritarian, anti-American governments.

On Saturday, a powerful Shiite leader, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, also rejected Mr. Annan's call for a conference. In the past, Mr. Hakim has chafed at the idea that countries in the region dominated by Sunni Arabs could get more involved in Iraq. Mr. Hakim comes from a prominent religious family and has close ties to Iran, which is largely Shiite.

Mr. Hakim is scheduled to meet with President Bush in Washington this week to discuss the rapid deterioration of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's government.

Like virtually all Kurds, Mr. Talabani is wary of interference here by Turkey, which has warned that it will invade the autonomous region of Iraqi Kurdistan if the Kurds make any move toward independence or try to take control of the oil city of Kirkuk. In his statement, Mr. Talabani also said that it was not the government's top priority to disband militias, and that it was more important to tamp down on the Sunni-led insurgency. The United States has pressed the government to disband militias.

The United States military said Sunday that American forces killed two women, one child and six insurgents on Saturday in assaults on two buildings in the town of Garma, in the hostile Anbar Province. The women and child were killed, along with five insurgents, in an airstrike on one house, the military said.

Two soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in Anbar on Saturday, and three marines died the same day in Anbar from combat wounds. Another soldier was killed Saturday by a roadside bomb near Taji. A soldier died in combat in Baghdad on Sunday, and two others were killed by a roadside bomb in northern Iraq. The Air Force said Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, a pilot listed as missing after his F-16 crashed last Monday in Anbar, had been killed.

In Baghdad, the police found at least 50 bodies across the city. The body of Hideab Majhool Hasnawi, the leader of a famous soccer club, was identified in the morgue. A leader of the Mandean sect, Talib Salman Areebie, was kidnapped from his home in the Ur neighborhood and killed soon afterward, said a spokesman for the Mandeans.

A car bomb killed three civilians and wounded 10 in northern Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. In the city of Mosul, a suicide car bomber rammed into a police station, killing two policemen and wounding four others, he said.

West of Basra, British soldiers fought Shiite militiamen as the British searched buildings in the town of Hayaniya, a stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia, a police official said. At least one Shiite fighter was killed.

What The US Has Learned (so Far) In Iraq (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

Listing things done wrong in Iraq, one veteran US policymaker put it bluntly: Pentagon leaders ignored analyses that indicated they needed more troops to keep order. The military was slow to develop a clear plan to counter the insurgency. For too long, US generals kept assuming that the day when Iraqi troops would be able to stand on their own was just around the corner.

Furthermore, neither the Americans nor the Iraqis moved fast enough to counter the rising influence of the radical Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia.

Is this critic a Democratic lawmaker, perhaps? A senior fellow from a liberal think-tank? No, he's Paul Bremer, President Bush's choice to head the Coalition Provisional Authority, who makes these points and more in an updated version of his book about his year in Iraq.

"The biggest obstacle [to progress] has been the failure to provide adequate security for the Iraqi people," writes Mr. Bremer in a new afterword.

Bremer isn't despairing - he insists Iraq is (slowly) moving toward real democracy. But neither is he alone in assessing the recent past. Even as Washington looks forward to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, expected this week, many experts and policy organizations are looking back to try and glean crucial lessons from the three-plus years of the US experience in Iraq.

It's an unorganized process that involves everything from Army field manuals to the Council on Foreign Relations, and it may never reach consensus, given the range of opinions involved. But even exchanging ideas could be important, since - as hard as it is to believe now - the interests and power of the US mean that at some point it could find itself weighing new sorts of military interventions.

"If we learn from our mistakes, our next engagement to help rebuild a collapsed state might have a more successful outcome," writes Larry Diamond, a democracy expert and former senior adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority, in his book on his Iraq experience. Military lessons

The US military, for its part, has been examining lessons learned in Iraq about tactics and operations for some time. This fall, the Army published a new field manu-al for counterinsurgency operations that draws extensively on research conducted from returning Iraq veterans.

Among its conclusions: The best counterinsurgency weapons do not shoot. Tactics that work this week might not work next week. The more force protection you use, the less effective you are. Sometimes doing nothing is the best reaction. The most important decisions are not made by generals.

"Clearly, there has to be much more specific preparation for these very challenging counterinsurgency operations," said Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, commander of the Army Combined Arms Center and Fort Leavenworth in Kansas, at a recent Brookings Institution seminar on military training.

The US reconstruction effort has undergone similar scrutiny. The special inspector general for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, has issued a series of stinging reports that both track individual projects and make recommendations for how the reconstruction process might be improved.

The scale of reconstruction needs simply overwhelmed the scanty preparations made prior to combat operations, according to Mr. Bowen. Among his suggestions: Create a cadre of reserve contracting officials, similar to the military reserve, who could be plucked from civilian life and deployed overseas in a crisis.

The White House has said less publicly what conclusions top administration officials have drawn from Iraq. However, during his stop in Vietnam last month, President Bush did say that the US involvement in the Vietnam War demonstrated something relevant to the nation's current situa-tion.

"One lesson is that we tend to want there to be instant success in the world, and the task in Iraq is going to take a while," Mr. Bush said.

Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona has also compared Vietnam to Iraq and said that the current generation of US leaders has ignored or forgotten two things learned the hard way in southeast Asia: The White House needs the public's support to wage war, and the military needs to use overwhelming force when fighting it.

But if there is one principle that virtually every expert who reflects upon Iraq might agree on, it might be the obvious point that the US experience there has turned out to be very difficult.

To supporters of the war, it is a hard task at which the US must prevail. To opponents, it has spiraled into something beyond the American ability to influence.

"Regime change, as we've seen in Iraq, is an incredibly risky bet," said Toby Dodge, a Middle East expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, at a recent Council on Foreign Relations event on the impact of Iraq on future US policies. Personal experience

Beyond that, the lessons one draws from Iraq depend crucially on political belief and personal experience.

Thus Bremer, the civilian administrator who oversaw the development of Iraq's constitution and the beginning of its current political process, staunchly defends the overall US effort - but does criticize the military for its failure to counter the Iraqi insurgency.

"For too long the military assumed that Iraqi forces would be able to carry on the fight themselves in short order," writes Bremer in the new edition of his book "My Year in Iraq."

Mr. Diamond, the expert in democratic process who tried to jump-start Iraqi democracy in the spring of 2004, judges that Iraq may yet emerge from its current chaos, but that the costs of the US invasion and occupation will be higher than necessary and greater than US leaders had imagined.

Among the lessons learned in Iraq, writes Diamond, is that you can't construct a democratic state unless a state already exists and can control its internal security.

"We cannot get to Jefferson and Madison without going through Thomas Hobbes," writes Diamond in his book "Squandered Victory."

A second lesson is that success in circumstances such as Iraq requires a commitment of substantial human and financial resources for five to 10 years, according to Diamond. A third lesson is that the US needs to organize itself more effectively for postconflict reconstruction.

"The final, overriding lesson of Ameri-ca's misadventure in postwar Iraq is not 'don't do it' but 'don't do it alone,' and 'don't do it with an imperial approach,' " concludes Diamond. Power no substitute for friends

The need for a more coalition-based foreign policy is something that many experts might agree with, as the US proceeds with the difficult tasks of countering Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs.

As great as US power is, it cannot substitute for coalitions and the effective use of international organizations, said Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in his 2004 testimony to Congress on the lessons of Iraq and Afghanistan.

The US now faces a generation-long period of tension and crisis in the Middle East and much of the developing world, said Mr. Cordesman - a different kind of sustained "cold war."

Given that context, one of the broader strategic lessons of Iraq and Afghanistan may be a deceptively simple-sounding one: the US needs to take the world as it is.

"Policy, analysis, and intelligence must accept the true complexity of the world, deal with it honestly and objectively, and seek 'evolution' while opposing 'revolution,' " said Cordesman in 2004.

'Fear Took Over' In Baghdad Raid (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

U.S. advisors lament Iraqi troops' conduct. America's exit strategy hangs in the balance.

BURSTS of AK-47 fire hissed past them from several directions at once, showering the U.S. and Iraqi soldiers with pulverized cement and slapping spider-web fractures into their Humvees' bullet-resistant glass turret-guards.

The joint security forces, undertaking what officials described as a major counterinsurgency operation, were in pursuit of 70 "high-value targets" in Baghdad's crowded Fadhil quarter, a Sunni Arab neighborhood of multistory tenements along the east bank of the Tigris River.

DOJ_NMG_0101684

Instead, the soldiers of the Iraqi army's 9th Mechanized Division and their American trainers had walked into a deadly ambush Friday. From upper-story apartments, insurgents stopped the soldiers' advance with grenades and shoulder-fired rockets. Others launched coordinated mortar strikes, hitting one of two nearby Iraqi field posts.

By the time the 11-hour battle was over, one Iraqi soldier had been killed and six others wounded, including one who shot himself in the foot. A U.S. soldier was also wounded and, according to American troops interviewed, additional casualties were averted only because U.S. Apache attack helicopters were called in and American trainers shot their way out of the ambush.

"Fear took over" among the Iraqis, Staff Sgt. Michael Baxter said.

"They refused to move. We were yelling at them to move," he said. "I grabbed one guy and shoved him into a building. I was saying, 'God get me out of this, because these guys are going to get me killed.' "

The offensive was initially billed by U.S. officials in Baghdad as an Iraqi-led success and a case study in support of the Pentagon's increasing reliance on using American troops as military advisors as a way to shift security responsibilities to Iraqi soldiers.

Expansion of teams

U.S. officials say an imminent expansion of the Military Transition Teams — squads of American military advisors traveling with Iraqi army units — will meet demands Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki made of President Bush at their meeting in Amman, the Jordanian capital, last week for more authority over his own security forces.

But interviews at their joint Rustamiya base with U.S. advisors and Iraqi soldiers involved in Friday's battle revealed a different story. The operation was hastily prepared and badly executed, they said, and plans to let the Iraqis take the lead in the battle were quickly scrapped.

"It started out that way," Baxter said. "But five minutes into it, we had to take over."

Staffed with veterans of the Iraq-Iran war of the 1980s and equipped with a complement of refurbished Soviet tanks and American Humvees, the 4,000-soldier 9th division is considered Iraq's best hope for an eventual U.S. troop withdrawal.

But confusion swiftly reigned as insurgents in Fadhil pummeled dismounted Iraqi troops and their American advisors. U.S. radio jammers seeking to hinder communications between insurgents ended up blocking the Iraqi soldiers' walkie-talkies, forcing them to use unreliable cellphone signals to stay in contact. Voice commands were lost amid the explosions and gunfire echoing off the walls.

At one point, U.S. and Iraqi troops piled into a Humvee to escape the hail of insurgent bullets pinging off the armor cladding.

"I was pulling people in," said Army Sgt. 1st Class Kent McQueen. "We were all bunched in there together with the gunner. It was like a game of Twister."

An insurgent tried to throw a grenade into a Humvee's top hatch, but it bounced off and exploded on the ground.

At times, the overwhelmed Iraqi soldiers fired wildly, sweeping their machine-gun barrels across friendly and insurgent targets alike, witnesses said.

"I had to throw bullet casings at them to get their attention," said Sgt. 1st Class Agustin Mendoza, another U.S. trainer who manned a Humvee gun turret during the battle. "They had no weapons discipline."

"A round hit the glass shield of my turret behind me," Mendoza said. "I hit a guy down the alley and a propane tank. It exploded in a big fireball."

The number of insurgents in the area was estimated at more than 100. Soldiers said they killed 20 and detained 43 others, including three foreign fighters.

No count was made of the number of civilians killed in the densely populated neighborhood, but U.S. and Iraqi soldiers acknowledged a significant amount of "collateral damage."

Apache helicopters beat down on the dilapidated tenements, drilling hundreds of .50-caliber rounds into concrete walls and rooftops. At least twice they unleashed Hellfire missiles, shattering walls and rooftops with flashing thunderclaps. On the ground, Iraqi T-55 tank commanders fired their main guns down the narrow alleyways, smashing structures into an avalanche of bricks.

McQueen felt something jerk his head back violently and then pressed his finger into a bullet-sized dent in his Kevlar helmet.

At one point he noticed Iraqi soldiers in their armored Humvees pulling away in panic.

"I tried to halt the Iraqi army trucks to stop the trucks to give us cover," he said. "The driver gives me this dumb look."

The U.S. military is ramping up its training program to add 30,000 Iraqi troops by mid-2007 to make up for soldiers who have abandoned their posts or died. The new recruits are also intended to supplement the small number of Iraqi troops willing to travel away from their home bases despite dangerous conditions or the possibility of being ordered to fight against members of their own sect.

DOJ_NMG_0101685

Most soldiers in the 9th division, for example, are Shiites, and U.S. and Iraqi officers said they doubted the troops would obey if ordered to fight in Shiite neighborhoods of Baghdad such as Sadr City.

"In August, when we started Operation Together Forward to secure Baghdad, we called on a bunch of units to assist," said U.S. Army Col. Douglass S. Heckman, the commander for the 9th Division Military Transition Team. "This division was the only one that moved into the operation. The others balked."

But Friday's battle suggested that even Iraq's best trained and equipped division is far from having the ability to operate independently. Heckman said attrition and liberal leave policies meant that only 68% of the 9th division is even on duty at any given time.

Another American advisor complained that the division had only 65% of the weapons and other equipment that it had been allocated by the U.S.

"And it's not just my guys," said the advisor, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "As I look across the division MiTT teams, they all tell me the same thing. Some of them have 50% of their equipment, some have 75%, but it's the same thing all over Iraq."

Despite efforts to get more financial support from the Iraqi Defense Ministry, the division stays operational only with help from the U.S. military, which provides everything from food to batteries.

Iraqi unit well regarded

Still, the division had conducted a number of successful joint U.S. and Iraqi operations north of Baghdad, officials say, and is well regarded by American commanders. The U.S. military believed the unit was ready to conduct the latest operation with minimal American ground support.

The operation was proposed by the Iraqi Defense Ministry and approved by U.S. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, only hours before it was carried out.

"We could have used two more days to plan," said U.S. Army Maj. Thomas J. Boczar, who organized the strike with Iraqi division commanders.

Iraqi army Col. Bassim Mohammed, assigned to the division's reconnaissance company, said he learned about the mission only three hours before it began at 4 a.m. Friday.

"We didn't do any reconnaissance. Nobody was briefed on the area. We didn't know the area 100%," Mohammed said. Units that went into Fadhil hadn't plotted egress routes, he said.

U.S. advisors said impending operations were often kept secret because of infiltrators within Iraqi ranks.

But Boczar suggested that insurgents knew the attack was coming. Aerial drone footage captured before the assault appeared to show them positioning themselves in preparation for the raid, he said.

"This was a coordinated, complex attack," Boczar said of the insurgent ambush. "And the way they maneuvered shows us that they were ready for us."

Having learned from previous encounters that rooftop snipers would be exposed to U.S. helicopters, insurgents fired out of second- and third-story apartments. And like the U.S. troops who called in helicopters for air support, the insurgents staging the ambush called on others to strike Iraqi army positions with mortar rounds.

U.S. Army Lt. Col. Mathew Stanton acknowledged that it was a tough fight, but said he was all right with that.

"It was hard. I understand that," Stanton said shrugging his shoulders. But he was satisfied. "You know what? We're not going to be here forever."

Toddler Killed In Airstrike Targeting Militants In Iraq (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD — A U.S. airstrike flattened a building in a volatile province west of Baghdad, killing two women and a toddler, as well as six militants, the military said Sunday.

The U.S. military also said nine U.S. troops were killed in weekend fighting around Iraq.

The military said it was targeting buildings believed to be harboring foreign fighters Saturday night and intelligence reports had verified that several men were inside during the time of the raid in Anbar province. U.S. forces have accused the militants of taking over buildings for use as safe houses and of using civilians as human shields.

Coalition ground and air forces killed six insurgents while destroying two buildings that militants were using in the town of Karmah, west of Baghdad, the military said.

While searching through one of the destroyed buildings, coalition forces also found a weapons cache and the bodies of two women and a boy, who was believed to be under the age of 2, the military said. Three suspected insurgents also were detained.

In other Iraq news:

·Iraq's president on Sunday rejected suggestions that an international conference be held to address the violence racking his country. “We are an independent and a sovereign nation, and it is we who decide the fate of the nation,” President Jalal Talabani said.

The international conference was suggested last week by United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

·The U.S. combat deaths announced Sunday included one in Baghdad on Sunday, one near Taji, north of the capital Saturday, and five in Anbar province on Saturday. Two soldiers were killed by an explosion near their vehicle in northern Iraq on Sunday.

·The pilot of an F-16 fighter jet that went down in Anbar last Monday was declared killed in action by the U.S. Air Force on Sunday. It said DNA analysis had confirmed remains found at the crash site 20 miles northwest of Baghdad were those of Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, 34.

·Saddam Hussein's lawyers formally appealed the death sentence against their client for the killing of 148 Shiites.

Five Iraqi judges sentenced Saddam and two other top members of his regime to death by hanging on Nov. 5 for the killings in the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad.

Under Iraqi law, death sentences are automatically appealed before a higher court within 10 days of their pronouncement. However, defense lawyers must file a formal appeal within 30 days, detailing the legal grounds for their action and presenting new evidence that could support their clients' claims of innocence. The lawyers could also make a plea for leniency.

6 Militants, 3 Others Die In Iraq Raids (AP)

Associated Press, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- U.S. soldiers destroyed two buildings being used by insurgents in a town in Anbar province, killing six militants, two women and a child, the military said Sunday.

It was the latest of several recent raids during which women or children have been killed or wounded by U.S. forces as they attacked insurgents in residential areas. In some of the attacks, the U.S. command accused the militants of using civilians as "human shields" or buildings as "safe houses."

On Saturday night in the town of Karmah, coalition ground and air forces killed six insurgents while destroying two buildings that militants were using, the military said. Searching through one of the destroyed buildings, coalition forces also found a weapons cache and the bodies of two women and a child, the military said, without providing the age of the women or the age and sex of the child. Three suspected insurgents also were detained.

Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad, is in Anbar province, the large area of western Iraq where many of the country's Sunni Arab insurgent groups operate.

"Coalition forces take precautions to mitigate risks to civilians while in pursuit of terrorists. However, terrorists continue to put innocent civilians in danger by operating among them," the U.S. military statement said.

On Friday, near Taji, just north of Baghdad, American soldiers killed one insurgent and wounded a woman in her 50s "who was being used as human shield by the terrorist," the U.S. command said. "Terrorists continue to deliberately place innocent Iraqi women and children in danger by their actions and presence," it said.

On Wednesday, two Iraqi women died when U.S. forces backed by aircraft killed eight al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents during a raid near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, the military said.

The day before, American soldiers fought with suspected insurgents in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province, killing six Iraqis: one man and five girls, ages 7 months, 12, 14, 15 and 17, the U.S. command said. Another Iraqi woman was wounded. The military quoted residents as saying the building attacked "was a known anti-Iraqi force safe house."

Iraq War Has Cost US 350 Billion Dollars (AFP)

AFP, December 4, 2006

The war in Iraq has cost the United States more than 350 billion dollars since the March 2003 invasion, according to an AFP review of Congress figures.

About 290 billion dollars, including 254 billion for military operations, were allocated for the war in fiscal year 2006, which closed on September 30, according to a September 22 report by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO).

The Congressional Research Service estimated the cost at 319 billion dollars, representing 73 percent of US spending for the "war on terror" launched after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States.

Congress has approved 70 billion dollars for the "war on terror" in the 2007 defense budget that includes about 50 billion dollars for the Iraq conflict, bringing the three-and-a-half-year spending over 350 billion dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0101687

A Democratic senator said last month that the Defense Department will request an additional 127 billion dollars for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, an amount that would bring the cost of the "war on terror" over 500 billion dollars.

The new funding request would make the "war on terror" more expensive for the United States than Washington's spending during the Vietnam War that ended in 1975.

The Congressional Research Service said in a September report that the cost of the war in Iraq rose this year to eight billion dollars a month, compared to 6.4 billion a month last year.

F-16 Pilot Downed In Iraq Listed As KIA (AP)

AP, December 4, 2006

An American pilot whose F-16 fighter jet went down in Iraq was listed as killed in action following DNA analysis of remains recovered at the crash site, the U.S. Air Force said Sunday.

Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, 34, was supporting troops fighting in Anbar province, where many of the country's Sunni-Arab insurgent groups operate. Videotape footage obtained by Associated Press Television News after the crash appeared to show the wreckage of the F-16CG in a field and a tangled parachute nearby.

Remains recovered at the crash site 20 miles north of Baghdad were identified as Gilbert's, the Air Force said.

U.S. forces investigating the crash have said insurgents reached the site before American forces could. The cause of the crash is under investigation, but officials said they did not believe Gilbert was shot down.

Hussein Death Penalty Is Formally Appealed (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 3 -- Attorneys for former president Saddam Hussein on Sunday formally appealed his death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s, a spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal said.

The case will now go to a higher court, which can rule on it at any time. If the court upholds Hussein's conviction, his execution, by hanging, must occur within 30 days, according to Iraqi law.

Raid Juhi, spokesman for the tribunal, said Sunday that two of Hussein's attorneys had submitted the appeal papers.

Hussein was convicted on Nov. 5 of crimes against humanity for the Dujail killings, which took place after an attempt on his life in 1982. Hussein and two of his seven co-defendants, including his half brother, were sentenced to death. Four defendants received prison terms ranging from 15 years to life, and an eighth was acquitted.

Under Iraqi law, death sentences are automatically appealed within 10 days. But defense lawyers must still file a formal appeal within 30 days of the verdict.

A recent report by New York-based Human Rights Watch concluded that Hussein's trial was so seriously flawed that the verdict could be called into question.

Hussein is currently on trial in another case, involving the killing of tens of thousands of Kurds in the late 1980s.

Deadly violence continued Sunday in many parts of Iraq.

In the northern city of Mosul, a car bomb exploded at a police station, killing two people, a police official said. Four officers were wounded in the attack.

In Baqubah, 35 miles northeast of the capital, the bodies of 16 people were found handcuffed and blindfolded, said Ali al-Khayam, a spokesman for Diyala province.

In Gharma, near the violence-ridden city of Fallujah, U.S. forces raided a safe house used by foreign fighters, the U.S. military said in a statement. The troops fired on the building, killing five suspected insurgents, two women and a child. Two other buildings used by insurgents were destroyed in the raid on Saturday night, the statement said. Another suspected insurgent was also killed in the operation.

The U.S. military announced that a soldier was killed Sunday in Baghdad. Two soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in Anbar on Saturday, and two soldiers and a Marine were killed in a separate incident in the volatile western province. One soldier died Saturday when his convoy struck a roadside bomb near Taji, about 12 miles north of Baghdad.

The U.S. military also announced that Air Force Maj. Troy L. Gilbert was killed last week when his F-16 fighter jet crashed in Anbar province. A DNA analysis positively identified his remains Friday.

Gilbert, 34, had been flying in support of ground troops fighting insurgents when his jet crashed Monday. Officials said the incident was under investigation, but Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said last week there was no indication that the jet had been shot down.

Gilbert, of Litchfield Park, Ariz., was assigned to the 309th Fighter Squadron at Luke Air Force Base in Arizona and deployed to the 332nd Air Expeditionary Wing at Balad Air Base. He was married and had children.

DOJ_NMG_0101688

"He served with courage and commitment and believed in duty, honor and country," Brig. Gen. Tom Jones, commander of Luke's 56th Fighter Wing, said in Arizona.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki condemned a triple car bombing that killed 51 people in Baghdad on Saturday and said families of the victims would receive compensation.

Report Faults Training Of Afghan Police (NYT)

By James Glanz, David Rohde

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work, and that managers of the $1.1 billion training program cannot say how many officers are actually on duty or where thousands of trucks and other equipment issued to police units have gone.

In fact, most police units had less than 50 percent of their authorized equipment on hand as of June, says the report, which was issued two weeks ago but is only now circulating among members of relevant Congressional committees.

In its most significant finding, the report said that no effective field training program had been established in Afghanistan, at least in part because of a slow, ineffectual start and understaffing.

Police training experts who have studied or had first-hand experience with the American effort in Afghanistan said they agreed with the report's findings, and some said they had warned for years that field training was the backbone of a strong program. But they said additional problems needed to be investigated, including the quality of private contractors and the cost and effectiveness of relying on them to train the police officers. In particular, the experts questioned why the report focused on United States government managers and only glancingly analyzed the performance of the principal contractor in Afghanistan, DynCorp International of Virginia.

Considering the state of the police force, an estimated $600 million per year will be needed indefinitely to sustain it, says the report, undertaken by the offices of the inspectors general at the Pentagon and the State Department. Howard J. Krongard is the inspector general at State, which led the work on the 97-page report, and Thomas F. Gimble holds the office at the Pentagon.

American advisers will also have to combat endemic corruption in the force, the report says.

Efforts to respond to some of the issues that the report identifies are already under way. Afghan and American officials recently announced that they had instituted an "auxiliary police" program at the end of the summer, which aims to hire 11,200 officers in parts of the country beset by Taliban attacks, primarily in the south.

But those officers receive only two of the standard eight weeks of training, and the police training experts say the program could worsen the situation. They say the new hastily created program could place ill-trained and poorly vetted officers in the field and allow militias and criminals to infiltrate the force.

An American official involved in the new effort said the program became necessary after southern governors besieged by Taliban attacks began hiring police officers on their own. American officials feared they were seeing the beginnings of de facto private militias.

"This was designed to avoid the creation of the militias," said the official, who was not authorized to comment publicly.

The training experts say the United States made some of the same mistakes in training police forces in Afghanistan that it made in Iraq, including offering far too little field training, tracking equipment poorly and relying on private contractors for the actual training. At the same time, those experts say, the failure to create viable police forces to keep order and enforce the law on a local level has played a pivotal role in undermining the American efforts to stabilize both countries.

In Afghanistan, the failure has contributed to the explosion in opium production, government corruption and the resurgence of the Taliban.

In Iraq, the challenge is even larger: Sectarian death squads have infiltrated the police force and helped push the country to what many are now calling a civil war.

"In both places we were extraordinarily late getting started," said Robert M. Perito, a policing expert at the United States Institute of Peace and a former National Security Council, State Department and Justice Department official. "In both places you have a dysfunctional Interior Ministry in control, and in both places the United States has tried to stand up a ministry advisory group to bring order out of chaos."

In an interview this fall, the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, said the violence in the country's south was partly a result of the lack of a viable force. He called for "much more support" from the United States and for an expansion of the country's force of roughly 70,000 officers.

"It is not that they are strong," he said, referring to the Taliban. "It is that we are not strong enough to defend ourselves."

DOJ_NMG_0101689

Most of the $1.1 billion the United States has spent on the training program in Afghanistan has gone to DynCorp, a technical services company based in Falls Church, Va., with 14,000 employees in about 33 countries. DynCorp also won the largest part of the training work in Iraq; it received a total of $1.6 billion for its training and security work in Iraq and Afghanistan in the 2004, 2005 and 2006 fiscal years, according to Gregory Lagana, a company spokesman. The work accounted for roughly 30 percent of the company's revenue during those years. In May, the company raised $375 million in an initial public offering of its stock.

Under orders from the Defense Department, the company has deployed 377 police advisers to Afghanistan, roughly half the number the United States has deployed in Iraq. Police training experts say far more police advisers are needed in Afghanistan, which is roughly the same size as Iraq. The report says that management of the DynCorp contract by United States government officials in Afghanistan has fallen into a state of disarray; conflicting military and civilian bureaucracies could not even find a copy of the contract to clarify for auditors exactly what it called for.

The report does not suggest that DynCorp held any responsibility for the program's failures, but former Afghan officials and several American policing experts who have examined DynCorp's training on the ground say that the company is partly to blame for long delays and that the use of private contractors for training should be reviewed. Afghan officials have complained about the high cost of the advisers and have said that some have too little experience.

Ali Jalali, an Afghan-American military historian who served as interior minister from 2002 to 2005, said the expertise level of some DynCorp advisers sent to his ministry was mixed. He said he rejected the first group he was offered because their résumés were unimpressive. When a second group arrived, some were retired officers not up to the demands of working in Afghanistan, he said. Others knew virtually nothing about the country.

"They were good on patrols in Oklahoma City, Houston or Miami," said Mr. Jalali, now a professor at the National Defense University in Washington. "But not in a country where you faced rebuilding the police force."

Mr. Lagana defended the company's work and said State Department officials closely monitored their activities. He said the Interior Ministry advisers who drew complaints regarding their experience level were removed.

"We filled positions based on the requirements and salary levels authorized by the State Department," Mr. Lagana said. "As we went along, everyone realized we needed people with experience at higher levels in law enforcement."

Seth Jones, an Afghanistan expert at the RAND Corporation who has made eight trips to Afghanistan since 2003 to study army and police training, called for a review of the company's performance. He said he had repeatedly heard complaints from both Western and Afghan officials in Afghanistan about the quality and experience of DynCorp's advisers.

"I was surprised, based on what I have seen on the ground, that DynCorp was let off the hook so easily," he said of the report. "I think a very frank assessment of DynCorp needs to be done."

Mr. Krongard, the State Department inspector general, acknowledged the seriousness of the report's criticisms. But he said in a statement in answer to questions about the report that in the face of obstacles like largely illiterate recruits, low pay and corruption, the program was "generally well conceived and well executed," but that for the police force to be self-sustaining, "long-term U.S. and international assistance and funding will be required at least beyond 2010."

The report concluded that the official figure of 70,000 trained police officers was inflated and that only where American advisers were present was the counting reliable to some degree.

As a best estimate, the report said that 30,395 Afghan officers — fewer than half the official total — were "trained and equipped to carry out their police functions."

The report also says that the vetting process for recruits, intended to keep the Taliban and people with powerful sectarian or tribal loyalties out of police ranks, has not been effective. After recruits are trained, they are often assigned by local police commanders to menial tasks like guard duty.

The international effort lost critical time when it initially mounted a token effort to train officers in Afghanistan, according to Afghan officials and policing experts. For the first two and a half years after the fall of the Taliban, no systematic police training program existed outside of Afghanistan's capital, according to American and Afghan officials. The United States focused on training a new multiethnic army and paid little attention to the need for policemen. Germany pledged to train a new force but sent only 40 police advisers to Kabul.

Then, in 2004, the State Department issued a contract to DynCorp to deploy 30 police advisers across Afghanistan and construct seven regional training centers.

The United States spent $164 million building and running the training centers; recruits received two to four weeks of training. The effort was poorly monitored and achieved mixed results, according to a June 2005 report by the Government Accountability Office.

DOJ_NMG_0101690

In April 2005, the Defense Department took over police training in Afghanistan and drastically expanded the number of American police advisers; the number is 377 today. Still, police training experts said the Afghanistan effort remained far too small, with small teams of advisers each expected to field train thousands of Afghan policemen.

The small corps of advisers also makes it more difficult to track equipment, and the report said that just 3,000 of 5,000 vehicles issued to the police nationwide could be accounted for. Although the report does not explicitly connect its warnings on corruption to the loss of equipment, the two appear to be closely related.

The weakness of the police has contributed to Afghanistan becoming the world's largest producer of opium, accounting for 92 percent of the world's supply, experts said. A report issued by the United Nations Office of Drug Control and the World Bank on Tuesday found that corruption had stymied efforts to counter opium production and that a handful of politically connected traffickers increasingly dominated the drug trade.

"The drug industry in Afghanistan is becoming increasingly consolidated," the report says. "At the top level, around 25-30 key traffickers, the majority of them in southern Afghanistan, control major transactions and transfers, working closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

The report on police training strongly recommends expanding the advising program to take care of some of those problems but points out that an expansion would cost the United States much more money "as well as increasing the risk to U.S. personnel."

At Least 3 Die In Afghanistan As Bombing Incites Shooting (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 3 — British troops opened fire on civilians in the southern city of Kandahar on Sunday, after a suicide bomber rammed a minibus into their military convoy, wounding three soldiers and setting a vehicle on fire, officials and witnesses said.

At least three people were killed and 15 wounded in the bombing and the shooting afterward, hospital officials said. By late evening [a news service] was reporting that as many as eight people had been killed.

The bomber struck around 11 a.m. on the main road through the city. One military vehicle was ablaze as a helicopter lifted out the wounded soldiers. As crowds and cars started pushing to get past the blocked road, the troops, fearing a second suicide attack, opened fire on at least one civilian vehicle that did not obey hand signals to keep back, said a NATO spokesman in Kabul, Maj. Luke Knittig. At least one person was killed and one was wounded, he said.

Witnesses said that up to 10 people had been wounded by NATO gunfire. Six or seven people were killed or wounded by the bomb blast, relatives said.

"My cousin and I were on the way from Nelgham village to the city in a taxi when British troops came along," said Dost Muhammad, 35, who was at the Kandahar city hospital looking after his cousin, Abdul Khaliq, 30, whom he said had been wounded by British soldiers. "Our driver reduced his speed and tried to stop on the side of the road, and the British came very near and started firing. My cousin and the driver were shot by them. I saw six other men shot by them."

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the suicide attack, a spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmedi, told The Associated Press by telephone. The bomber was driving in the same direction as the convoy when he exploded his vehicle, said Ahmadullah Faizi, a spokesman for the NATO security force in Kandahar. Three British soldiers were wounded in the attack, he said.

"I saw a Town Ace minibus was moving very slowly just as a British convoy came near to it and it exploded," said Qassim Alokozai, 25, a shopkeeper. "After that I was trying to get myself away from the area because the British started firing on local people. The British took out the injured men from the damaged vehicle, and after that they left their vehicle and escaped."

A civilian supply helicopter working for NATO went down in bad weather in the mountains of southern Afghanistan on Saturday, according to a NATO statement. A search and rescue team found the helicopter at noon Sunday but was not able to reach the crash site or establish the status of the eight-member crew.

NATO forces on a routine patrol in the Musa Qala district of Helmand Province fought with insurgents for four hours on Saturday night, a NATO statement said Sunday. British troops had negotiated a cease-fire with the Taliban and local tribal elders there in recent weeks, but called in airstrikes on the insurgents on Saturday.

A Troubled 'Afghan Model' (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - As Iraq has descended into chaos over the last three years, Washington policymakers have often pointed to Afghanistan as the success story in the war on terror. Even those who worry about the situation on the ground agree that the United States and its NATO allies have the right strategy in place; they just think we've devoted too few resources to the problem. In fact, Afghanistan is in danger of becoming a version of Iraq, where the central government has collapsed, disorder is rife and a Qaeda-backed insurgency controls large swathes of the country. In addition, the policies that the United States has in place are at best inadequate. We have tried to handle Afghanistan with an Afghan strategy. But it is now clear that the only way to stabilize the country is to have a Pakistan strategy.

In a forthcoming article in Foreign Affairs, Barnett Rubin, a leading Afghanistan expert, reports after four visits this year that the country is "approaching a tipping point." The Taliban-led insurgency is gaining ground. In some areas, parallel Taliban-run governments have their own courts and administrations. The insurgents now conduct suicide bombings—unprecedented in Afghanistan—and use improvised explosive devices like those in Iraq. In their southern strongholds, 35 percent of schools are closed. "As a result of the government's shaky legitimacy and weak powers," Rubin writes, "the international troop presence is coming to resemble a foreign occupation—and an occupation that Afghans will ultimately reject."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai and his counterpart in Pakistan, Pervez Musharraf, have openly quarreled about the cause of the Taliban's re-emergence. Musharraf blames Karzai's incompetence and weakness. Karzai argues that Pakistan has been tacitly—and often actively—supporting the Taliban along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, and in Pakistan itself. Having spoken to a number of senior Western officials and independent observers in both countries, I think it's clear that, in the words of a senior U.S. administration official who wished to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of the subject, "the weight of the evidence supports President Karzai."

Americans want to believe that all good things go together. But here is a telling example of why that's not always true. President Musharraf is a genuine modernizer who has saved his country from becoming a failed state. Despite the compromises he has had to make, he has been more forward-looking on economics, law, religion and even women's rights issues than any government in Pakistan since the early 1970s. But having confronted Islamic extremists on such matters, Musharraf seems to believe that one area where he need not actively thwart them is in their goal of jihad against Karzai's government and its Western backers.

This attitude is part of a traditional Pakistani world view. The Islamabad strategic elite, which essentially means its top military officers, believes that establishing "strategic depth"—having some sway over events in Afghanistan—is crucial for Pakistan. This mechanistic view comes out of the cold war, when India and Afghanistan tilted toward the Soviet Union, and has gained ground as India and Afghanistan have both become pro-American. There are even those in Islamabad who believe that to counter these trends, Pakistan should help drive Western forces out of Afghanistan— even establish a pro-Pakistan, Taliban government in Kabul. That would explain Islamabad's constant refrain that the Taliban must be rehabilitated within the Afghan political system.

At the dinner that Bush threw for both presidents in September, Karzai was extremely blunt, according to those familiar with the discussions (who wish to remain anonymous because of the private nature of the event). Karzai warned that if the United States was forced to leave Afghanistan, Kabul would ally far more closely with India and Russia, which would not be in Pakistan's interests. He also urged Musharraf to recognize that in supporting the Taliban and its doctrine of ethnic Pashtun nationalism, Musharraf was creating a problem for himself since there are millions of dissatisfied Pashtuns within Pakistan.

The United States and its NATO allies should push Musharraf to recognize that what Pakistan needs right now is not strategic depth but stability. Its economy is on a roll thanks to a strong reform program established and overseen by its savvy prime minister, Shaukat Aziz. With India and Pakistan growing at 8 percent a year, the Subcontinent could move into a win-win world in which peace and prosperity reinforce each other in an upward spiral of success. South Asia could then look a whole lot more like Southeast Asia, a region where economic growth has alleviated historical tensions and border disputes.

For the United States, too, there is an upside to success but, more important, a real downside to failure. If Washington is not able to persuade President Musharraf to crack down on the Taliban, it will inevitably mean the renewal of Al Qaeda, the only organization that has launched terror attacks across the globe directed at America and Americans. That's not just a problem for the United States' credibility. It is a problem for the safety and security of its citizens.

By The Book: Taliban Fighters Play By Their Own Rules (NSWK)

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

In case a Taliban fighter wonders what is expected of him, he can now refer to a nine-page, blue and white, pocket-size pamphlet called the Layeha, which Mullah Mohammed Omar began distributing last month. The book (NEWSWEEK obtained a copy, and has seen Taliban fighters carrying it in several parts of Afghanistan) lays down 29 strictures for conduct on the battlefield and in villages, as well as sanctions faced by those who break the rules: strict Islamic justice.

CLASS DISMISSED Government teachers—seen as tools of the "puppet regime"—should be warned to stop teaching and beaten if they refuse. If "found to be teaching against Islam" they should be killed by the unit's commander.

DOJ_NMG_0101692

VILLAGE CONDUCT Jihadis are forbidden to "disturb innocents," "raid houses," "take weapons from civilians" or "take people's money or personal property" (rules which seem to be frequently broken).

DELETEAFTERMEVICE Under anti-vice guidelines, smoking is banned, as is the practice of bringing "young boys without beards" to the combat zone or to a fighter's home.

RANSOMS Fighters cannot ransom prisoners without the agreement of a senior commander.

SPY JUSTICE Spies cannot be punished until judged by an Islamic court.

Slain Nevada Soldier At Last Gets Wiccan Plaque (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, December 4, 2006

RENO, Nev. -- The widow of a soldier killed in Afghanistan saw a Wiccan symbol placed on a memorial plaque for her husband Saturday, after fighting the federal government for more than a year over the emblem.

Roberta Stewart, widow of Sgt. Patrick Stewart, and Wiccan leaders said it was the first government-issued memorial plaque with a Wiccan pentacle, a five-pointed star enclosed in a circle.

More than 50 friends and family dedicated the plaque at Northern Nevada Veterans Memorial Cemetery in Fernley, Nev., about 45 miles east of Reno.

They praised Gov. Kenny Guinn (R) for his role in getting the Nevada Office of Veterans Services to issue the plaque in September. The agency cited its jurisdiction over the state veterans' cemetery.

The U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs has approved the symbols of 38 other faiths for use in national veterans' cemeteries; about half are versions of the Christian cross.

The Jewish Star of David, the Muslim crescent, the Buddhist wheel, the Mormon angel, the nine-pointed star of Bahai and an atomic whirl for atheists are also permitted, but not the pentacle.

VA officials have said they are rewriting rules for approving emblems, but the process requires a public comment period.

About 1,800 active-duty service members identify themselves as Wiccans, according to 2005 Defense Department statistics, and Wicca is one of the fastest-growing faiths in the country. Its adherents worship the Earth and believe they must give to the community. Some consider themselves "white" or good witches, pagans or neo-pagans.

Patrick Stewart and four other soldiers died Sept. 25, 2005, when their Chinook helicopter was shot down in Afghanistan. He was posthumously awarded a Bronze Star and a Purple Heart.

Iraq: The War Without Honors (TIME)

By Sally B. Donnelly

Time, December 4, 2006

Are there fewer heroes in the Iraq war than in previous wars? That's the message the Pentagon is sending, say critics, by not awarding today's soldiers nearly as many of the nation's highest military honors. Three and a half years of combat in Iraq, for example, have produced only two winners of the Medal of Honor, the country's highest military award for bravery in combat. There were, by contrast, 464 Medals of Honor handed out during America's involvement in World War II, which lasted the same amount of time. If the government had been as stingy then as it is now, adjusting for the number of Americans who served, there would have been only 30 Medals of Honor won in the fight against fascism. The same applies to the second highest honor, the service crosses: there were 8,716 of those given out during World War II and just 26 so far in Iraq.

So what's different in this war? For one thing, the process for getting medals has become more cumbersome. Some commanders are reacting against what they see as medal inflation in recent wars, especially Gulf War I. And there may be fewer opportunities for Audie Murphy--style heroics when your enemy is planting improvised explosive devices (IEDs) or driving a car bomb. But the nearly 3,000 war dead testify to the peril of those fighting in Iraq, and a growing chorus has been speaking out against the Pentagon's parsimony. They're asking why there have not been more Ã©lite medals and why there have been huge disparities in the number of awards given by different branches of the military. "We need to look into the criteria used and the timing. There are obvious inequities," says Congressman John McHugh, a Republican from New York.

The House Armed Services Subcommittee on Military Personnel that McHugh chairs is launching an inquiry this week into the way medals have been awarded in Iraq. The Department of Defense may be required to issue new standards or even reopen cases in which medals have been turned down or downgraded. The Pentagon, meanwhile, says it needed its own review to consider how combat--and how the military quantifies heroism--has changed since 9/11. It is considering whether there should be new guidelines set for consistency across the services. The Army, for example, has displayed a stunning generosity in handing out the mid-level Bronze Star medals: it has given out an astonishing 52,000 since 9/11, compared with fewer than 1,500 for the Marines.

Some critics think a kind of political correctness may be at play in the military. Says retired Lieut. Colonel Steve Russell, an infantry officer who served in Iraq: "Many senior officers who decide these awards have succumbed to the notion that every soldier is doing a great job and no one should be held out as better than another."

At the same time, some commanders have raised the bar for the highest awards because they say they have seen medals handed out too easily in the past. Army Lieut. General Tom Metz says he remembers clearly how a few soldiers in Vietnam took advantage of the system and won "air ribbons" often simply for taking flights in country. "[In Iraq] I was an award approver for all but the top two awards, and I was tough," says Metz, who authorized a handful of Silver Stars during his two years in Iraq. "I am confident those who got an award with my signature on it earned it."

Perhaps the biggest reason for the scarcity of top medals is the nature of combat in this war, which is so different from that of previous conflicts. The old saying about waiting to see the whites of the enemy's eyes before shooting doesn't apply when that enemy is a quarter of a mile away, looking at you through binoculars to see when to detonate the IED. Yet there are soldiers in Iraq--and Afghanistan--whose valor at least equals that of past generations of Americans. On April 14, 2004, several Marines were manning a checkpoint in western Iraq when an insurgent jumped out of a car and grabbed Jason Dunham, 22, by the throat. When the Iraqi dropped a live grenade during their struggle, the young Marine jumped on it so that his body would absorb the blast, saving the lives of his comrades. He died eight days later. Dunham was awarded the Iraq war's second Medal of Honor last month. It will be presented to his family at the White House by President George W. Bush on Jan. 11.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gov't Study: School Killings Up Slightly (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — At least 21 people were killed at school during the 2004-05 academic year, a slight increase from the year before, the government reported Sunday.

The study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics does not include data from fatal shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania this fall. In Pennsylvania, five Amish girls were killed in a one-room schoolhouse by a milk truck driver who then turned the gun on himself.

Overall, fewer students reported being the victims of violent crime at school or school-sponsored events in 2004-2005, the study by the Justice Department agency show. Additionally, school-age children remain far more likely to be assaulted, raped and robbed off school grounds.

The study looked at violent crime against students over several periods of time.

The 21 killings at school-related events, between July 2004 and June 2005, targeted victims between age 5 and 18, said Katrina Baum, co-author of the 2006 Indicators of School Crime and Safety. Over the previous year, 19 people were killed.

It was not immediately clear whether all the victims were students. Still, the preliminary data indicates that students were about 50 times more likely in the 2003-04 school year to be killed away from school than at school, the report shows.

The number of deadly shootings has risen and fallen over the past 15 years. Overall school violence has shown a declining trend, although it has increased lately.

The study notes that four of every 1,000 students in 2004 reported being the victim of violent crimes — compared with six of every 1,000 in 2003. Researchers polled students between 12 and 18 for that part of the survey, co-written by the Education Department's National Center for Education Statistics.

Younger students were found to be more likely crime victims — including those injured by bullies, the report showed. Last year, 28 percent of students polled said they had been bullied.

Also in 2005, 24 percent of students questioned said that gangs were at their schools — up 3 percent from 2003. The rates of fights, drinking alcoholic beverages, and weapons found at schools remained at 2003 levels, the report noted.

The Next Crime Wave (TIME)

By Kathleen Kingsbury

Time, December 3, 2006

It's as if Milwaukee, Wis., had reverted to a state of lethal chaos. A Special Olympian is killed for his wallet as he waits for a bus. An 11-year-old girl is gang-raped by as many as 19 men. A woman is strangled, her body found burning in a city-owned garbage cart. Twenty-eight people are shot, four fatally, over a holiday weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0101694

These are the kinds of crimes American cities expected never to see in high numbers again. In the 1990s police departments nationwide began applying the so-called broken-windows theory: arrest the bad guys for minor offenses, and they wouldn't be around to commit more serious ones. This zero-tolerance approach--combined with more cops on the street to enforce it, a strong economy and a fortuitous demographic change that reduced the population of young men who typically cause the most trouble--lowered the rates of murder, robbery and rape for 10 consecutive years. Until last year. Not only did crime suddenly begin to rise in 2005, but the most violent crimes led the trend. Homicides shot up 3.4%. Robberies, 3.9%. Aggravated assaults, 1.8%. Hardest hit were not metropolises like New York City and Los Angeles but cities with populations between 400,000 and 1 million--such as Baltimore, Md.; Charlotte, N.C.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Oakland, Calif.--and this year looks to see similar rates of increase, if not worse.

Few places have suffered more than Milwaukee. The homicide count for the city of 590,000 fell from 130 in 1996 to just 88 in 2004. But last year, according to FBI figures, Milwaukee saw the country's largest jump in homicides--up 40%, to 121. This year's total will probably be lower, but as the killings over that bloody holiday weekend and other crimes show, violence has returned to the city. "You'll be able to read about something even more heinous tomorrow," laments Milwaukee Archbishop Timothy Dolan. "People are scared."

Like the residents of dozens of other recently crime-afflicted midsize cities across the country, people in Milwaukee are trying to figure out why their town has suddenly become so dangerous. While the cohort of young adults is ground zero for violent crime, the reason isn't as simple as a rapidly growing population. Since the late 1990s, the number of Americans under 30 has increased at a rate consistent with that of the general U.S. population, about 6%. Some other likely explanations have emerged.

FEWER COPS ON THE BEAT

Most municipalities count on grants from the Justice Department's State and Local Law Enforcement Assistance and Office of Community-Oriented Policing Services, or COPS, program to help pay for officers on their force. But $1.9 billion, or 45%, of that funding has disappeared since the Sept. 11 terrorism attacks, as federal resources are increasingly directed toward homeland security and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Midsize cities, which depend more heavily on federal funds than larger ones do, have nearly 25% fewer officers than they did in 2001, and the White House's budget proposal for next year would sweep away an additional $1.5 billion. In Milwaukee, COPS universal hiring funds dropped from more than $1 million in 2002 to zero last year. That has left more than 200 police vacancies out of a force less than 2,000 strong. The city is hard pressed to fill the gap, since the police budget eats up nearly the entire Milwaukee tax levy of $213 million. Mayor Tom Barrett is hoping that the feds will start pitching in again. "We've spent five years on homeland security," Barrett says. "Now we need to focus on a little hometown security."

Further exacerbating the city's police shortage is the redeployment of cops from the streets of Milwaukee to those of Baghdad, Mosul and Kabul. As many as 135 officers at one time have gone on leave to serve in Wisconsin's National Guard or military reserve units in Iraq and Afghanistan. "It's difficult to manage a force that's always coming and going," says police chief Nanette Hegerty. Those left to hold down the fort at home feel overstretched and underappreciated. "Morale is low," says Officer John Balcerzak, head of the police union. "We're racing to a new crime before we've investigated the last. That leaves criminals out there on the streets."

Residents feel equally frustrated. "The police simply showing up can be half the battle in many people's minds," says Steve O'Connell, who lives in the working-class Sherman Park neighborhood. This summer, Milwaukee's 911 dispatchers received, on average, 1,700 calls a day. As police captain Donald Gaglione told a community meeting, "If your 911 call is not a high priority, it may take several hours before we respond, if at all." But people who live in volatile neighborhoods say they need police to intercede before minor disturbances become serious matters.

If police are struggling to answer 911 calls, they have even less time to patrol neighborhoods, so they can't build the trust essential to preventing crime. Tensions between the city's African-American community and police are particularly high--40% of the population is black and 47% is white, but there are three times as many white cops on the force. As Alderman Ashanti Hamilton explains, "If the only time people in black neighborhoods see a police officer there it is to arrest somebody, then, of course, they're going to be nervous." Chief Hegerty says repairing this relationship is critical. "We have to count on law-abiding residents to tell us what's going on in their neighborhoods," she says.

Ester Hodges learned that the hard way. A former construction worker who moved into a west-side Milwaukee home three years ago, she says a neighbor's young daughters terrorized her street and, more personally, bullied her children. Hodges, 48, became a one-woman block watch, calling the police regularly, buying surveillance cameras with her own money and speaking out at community meetings. "I let the police know time after time that trouble was coming," she says. Briefly last spring the police monitored her area more closely. Three weeks after the patrols stopped, however, Hodges says, a threatening group showed up at her house. Police still haven't sorted out exactly what happened next, but by the end, Hodges had been shot in the stomach.

No charges have been brought in her shooting. She survived, and her neighbors eventually moved, but police are investigating whether Hodges may have taken justice into her own hands by firing at her antagonizers. No one else was hit.

Barrett's administration has tried to address unemployment through a huge investment in real estate development and tax incentives to attract business. The mayor says those efforts have created more than 10,000 local jobs. Most of them, however, are either high-tech positions beyond the skills of many Milwaukee residents or low-wage service slots in retail shops and chain restaurants that pay less than needed to support a family.

"People who have put in a full day's work are generally too tired to go out and terrorize the neighborhood by night," alderman Willie Wade says. Employment can assuage other social ills. It leads to more homeownership--meaning fewer absentee landlords and the drug houses that can go with them. And a job can anchor an entire family. Says Wade: "A little money in his pocket can convince a man to be a father to his children instead of stealing his neighbor's Cadillac."

2 Charged In Fine-payment Scheme (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

The D.C. Office of Inspector General is investigating a reported scheme in which stolen credit cards were used to pay fines for parking and moving violations in the District, court records show.

Federal authorities last week filed arrest warrants that state two persons engaged in the scheme to pay off tickets for people at half the face value of the tickets, according to court records.

An affidavit from a D.C. Inspector General investigator states the scheme involved a man identified as Lonnell Damon Duckett offering to pay off people's unpaid parking and moving-violation tickets. In return, he sought cash for up to half the value of the unpaid D.C. Department of Motor Vehicle tickets, court records show.

In other words, Mr. Duckett, a Transportation Department employee, would offer to wipe out $1,000 in tickets if he received $500 in cash, authorities said.

The second person in the reported scheme has been identified as Ladonna Gray and described as Mr. Duckett's "DMV connection," according to court records.

Investigators say once Mr. Duckett received the cash, he used stolen credit-card information -- reportedly obtained from Miss Gray -- to pay the tickets.

The payments were made over the Internet, a common practice by most municipalities.

The investigation began after four persons who had accounts at the same storage business in the District told authorities their credit cards were being used to pay strangers' fines, records show.

Investigators say Miss Gray worked at the storage business.

Neither Mr. Duckett, 36, nor Miss Gray, 27, could be reached for comment.

The pair was charged under a criminal statute titled fraud and related activity in connection with access devices last week in federal court. The inspector general's office has declined to comment on the case, including whether others were involved.

Co-workers at the Transportation Department said Mr. Duckett described Miss Gray as his inside contact, charging documents show.

In one case, Mr. Duckett's co-worker gave him $500 in cash, then Mr. Duckett gave the co-worker a phone number to a woman he identified as "Donna," his "DMV connection," according to the affidavit.

"Donna" then asked for the person's vehicle tag number before providing the person with a receipt showing that $1,500 in fines had been paid, court records show.

The U.S. attorney's office filed complaints Nov. 27 against Miss Gray and Mr. Duckett.

Janis Hazel, a motor vehicles department spokeswoman, said motorists with tickets should be suspicious of such offers.

"If it sounds too good to be true, it probably is," she said.

Miss Hazel said agency staffers are trained to detect fraud and that the security code on the back of a credit card helps prevent such problems.

She could not say whether the people who had their fines paid through the credit cards would face penalties.

"That's up to the authorities," she said. "It's a criminal investigation at this point. Maybe there's something they can do."

LA Man Sentenced To 7 Years In Prison In Movie Piracy Case (AP)

By Gary Gentile

AP, December 4, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A man convicted of sneaking camcorders into movie screenings and selling the pirated tapes in video stores was sentenced to seven years in federal prison Friday.

"It is hoped the sentence will deter further unlawful conduct and protect the public," said U.S. District Judge Dean D. Pregerson.

Johnny Ray Gasca was convicted in June 2005 of three counts of copyright infringement as well as using a fake Social Security number and of an escape charge for fleeing his attorney's custody while awaiting trial.

Gasca gained notoriety as the first person to be charged in a federal crackdown on video piracy. He represented himself during a weeklong trial, saying he didn't intend to profit from his actions. He said evidence was embellished to make him appear to be a "prince of piracy."

Federal prosecutors showed the jury Gasca's diary in which he wrote that he earned up to $4,000 a week by attending the screenings. Prosecutors alleged he sold the films through small video stores or on the street.

During the sentencing hearing, Gasca accused prosecutors of lying during his trial. Gesturing with his hands and often pointing to prosecutors and the judge, Gasca called the courtroom a "den of snakes" and asked for a new trial, a motion the judge denied.

At one point, Gasca pointed to an FBI agent in the courtroom and said, "I'm going to prove to you he's a liar, your honor."

Before being sentenced, Gasca's voice broke as he thanked courtroom employees for being helpful during his trial.

Gasca was arrested by Burbank police and first charged with misdemeanor burglary after sneaking a camcorder into a screening of "The Core" in September 2002.

The next month, security officers at a Los Angeles theater found him with a camcorder at an MTV screening of the Eminem movie "8 Mile."

And in January 2003, a theater camera meant to record audience reaction at an "Anger Management" screening caught Gasca in the front row with his camcorder trained on the screen.

"Camcorded films are a major source for pirated films that are distributed on the streets and on the Internet costing the film industry billions each year," Dan Glickman, chairman and CEO of the Motion Picture Association of America, said in a statement. "We are pleased that the court recognized Gasca's crimes today with a fitting punishment."

The judge also ordered three years of supervision after Gasca is released and ordered him to attend anger management classes as a condition of release.

Movie Piracy Puts Man Behind Bars For 7 Years (SDUT)

He's unapologetic for videotaping films in theaters

LOS ANGELES – The first person charged by the federal government for making camcorder copies of films as they were shown in theaters was sentenced yesterday to seven years in prison.

“It is hoped the sentence will deter further unlawful conduct and protect the public,” said U.S. District Judge Dean Pregerson.

Johnny Ray Gasca, 36, the so-called prince of movie piracy, was convicted in June 2005 on three misdemeanor counts of copyright infringement, and felony counts of making threats, witness retaliation, escape and using a fake Social Security number.

His reputation as a less-than-legitimate videographer started in 2002 when he got the attention of employees of a company that conducts movie screenings. Not long after, law enforcement began its investigations.

That year Gasca was arrested after sneaking a camcorder into a screening of the science-fiction movie “The Core.” Security officers at another theater found him weeks later with a camcorder at a pre-release screening of Eminem's “8 Mile.” In 2003, a theater camera that was supposed to capture audience reaction to the Jack Nicholson film “Anger Management” also caught Gasca with a camcorder pointed at the screen.

At the sentencing hearing, Gasca was unapologetic and maintained his innocence. He thanked lawyers who have aided him and court staff, but also took time to note “lies” he alleged prosecutors made during his trial.

The movie industry says piracy costs filmmakers billions of dollars annually. Last year, Congress approved legislation that made camcording a movie a felony with a possible three-year sentence.

In an FBI search of Gasca's Hollywood apartment, agents found video duplication equipment and diaries in which he reported making as much as $4,500 a week selling pirated, prereleased movies.

He was arrested in April 2003 but was released temporarily to the custody of one of his lawyers before his trial.

Gasca escaped and was a fugitive for 16 months before being captured in Florida – reportedly in a hotel room containing stacks of DVDs and recording equipment.

Jurors were told he threatened a witness in the case and Motion Picture Association of America investigators. He allegedly said he could flood the market with not-yet-released movies if they did not help get back the equipment seized by the FBI.

During his trial, the tough-talking native New Yorker told jurors that prosecutors were embellishing evidence and witnesses were lying. He portrayed himself as a "kung fu" movie enthusiast who distributed foreign-made films but broke no laws.

He said he came to Los Angeles to follow his "true passion" – he wanted to get into the movie business and be a director.

Ag Crime Wave Grows In California (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, December 4, 2006

LOS ANGELES — In a rising wave of rural larceny, thieves are tracking commodity prices to steal everything that grows, plows or sprinkles on the USA's farms.

California, the No. 1 state in agricultural production, reports the biggest problems. Theft rings that kept police busy last year chasing stolen artichokes, pomegranates and diesel fuel switched this year to nuts, avocados, citrus, tractors, irrigation pipe and copper wiring, says Bill Yoshimoto, the supervising prosecutor for a 13-county Central California task force on farm crime.

The task force arrested two men in a Sacramento warehouse Nov. 26 on suspicion of possessing 136,000 pounds of stolen almonds and walnuts valued at $403,000. The bust supplied leads in thefts this year of 14 truckloads of processed nuts worth $2 million, says Detective Vince Gallagher of the Merced County sheriff's department.

The nuts were in 40-foot shipping containers ready for export. Only two containers were stolen in the area in 2005, Yoshimoto says.

Rural thievery "is increasing year by year," Yoshimoto says.

In areas far from cities, farms are often wide-open targets after dark, "with nothing more than a fence on an isolated road barring criminals from bins full of harvested crops," says Danielle Rau, director of rural crime prevention for the California Farm Bureau Federation.

In Alabama and other southeastern states with vast pine forests, the leading theft problem is illegal timber-cutting, according to police reports.

In Minnesota, Ohio and elsewhere, thieves siphon anhydrous ammonia, a fertilizer that can be used to make methamphetamine, from farmers' tanks.

Other targets include ginseng in Michigan, Japanese radishes in Hawaii and irrigation valves in Washington state.

The thefts are "putting our food supply under attack," says California state Sen. Jeff Denham, a Republican from the Central Valley.

No national statistics are kept on rural thefts, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the American Farm Bureau Federation. Yoshimoto estimates that crops and equipment worth $1 billion will be stolen nationwide this year.

Research shows that farmers report only one in 10 thefts, he says. Reported thefts in the Central Valley totaled nearly $9 million last year and will top $10 million in 2006, indicating $100 million in actual thefts there, he says.

Thieves check commodity prices when deciding what to go after, Yoshimoto says.

Herndon Warned Of Accused Pedophile (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

An afternoon of football watching and holiday decorating took a strange detour yesterday for some Herndon residents when they opened their doors to find strangers confronting them with troubling information: One of their neighbors is an accused pedophile.

Members of two groups representing victims of abusive Catholic priests went door-to-door in the neighborhood, distributing packets of information accusing a former Catholic priest who has lived there for 10 years.

"Community notification: Protect your children from a credibly accused serial sex offender," the packet's cover reads.

The 38-page sheaf of material contained information about Edward F. Dudzinski, 56, who last month was among 20 former priests accused by the Catholic Diocese of Wilmington, Del., of sexually abusing children. He served in the priesthood in the 1970s and 1980s.

The diocese disclosed the names in its weekly newspaper, saying that it had found "credible or substantiated complaints of sexual abuse of minors" against the priests. It said eight, including Dudzinski, are living. Dudzinski has not been convicted of -- or charged in -- any sex-abuse crime.

In a letter accompanying the list, Bishop Michael Saltarelli of the Diocese of Wilmington said he released the names at the recommendation of a diocesan review board. A spokesman for the diocese did not return phone calls and e-mails seeking comment.

Yesterday, Dudzinski did not return calls to numbers listed for his address. Two of his roommates, who said the former priest was not at home, defended him and denounced the groups' tactics.

"He's in recovery from his issue. He's not a danger to the community," said one roommate, who would identify himself only as Peter. "All they've done is create a hysteria in the neighborhood for no reason."

As the man spoke to journalists on the front lawn of the two-story, mint-green house where he said Dudzinski lives with several roommates, organizers of the leafleting campaign -- who said they were victims of other abusive priests -- interrupted.

"We are not talking about shoplifting here," called out Paul Steidler, a Reston consultant and a member of Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests. "We are talking about the sexual abuse of children."

As Steidler spoke, a woman emerged from the house, carrying blue gift bags and frosted cupcakes to a worn station wagon at the curb.

"Do you see what they're doing?" she said to the roommate, brushing aside SNAP members and journalists. "They're putting these things in people's mailboxes in our neighborhood."

The woman, who would not identify herself in an interview later, said that she and her 10-year-old son have rented a room in the house for the past eight years and that she trusts Dudzinski. She said the groups' tactics are a violation of Dudzinski's privacy.

"It's very upsetting for him because other than 30 years ago, he's never done anything inappropriate," she said. "That's what I've been told, that's what I've observed, and that's what I believe."

For some in the close-knit community, where block parties and gatherings are common, it was a disturbing afternoon.

Members of SNAP and Voice of the Faithful, another support group for those abused by priests, walked from home to home for close to an hour in the December chill, talking to residents who answered their knocks.

Stella Matthes, who has two teenagers, thanked SNAP board member Mark Serrano and Voice of the Faithful member Evelyn Mercantini as they handed her a packet of information and gave her a synopsis of Dudzinski's alleged past.

Along with the Diocese of Wilmington's accusations, the packet contained copies of records showing that Dudzinski, who moved to Fairfax County in the 1990s to work as a substance-abuse counselor, gave up his license as part of a settlement with the Virginia Board of Counseling in 2003. Those records, available online, show that the board said that Dudzinski had become "personally involved" with teenagers he was counseling.

After Serrano and Mercantini had moved on to the next house, Matthes said the encounter had made her uncomfortable.

"I'm a little surprised that people are going door-to-door," she said. "I think it would be more appropriate if they were to mail something out."

A few doors away, John and Kathy Wilson, who have a 3-year-old daughter, said they were grateful for the information.

"It's always important to know who's living around you," Kathy Wilson said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Back To The Supreme Court: Racial Balance In Schools (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON

America is one of the most racially and ethnically diverse countries in the world. Yet 52 years after Brown v. Board of Education - the landmark Supreme Court decision that struck down segregation - US classrooms are growing increasingly segregated.

In part, the racial divide reflects the persistence of segregated housing patterns and the stifling grip of poverty. But it also reflects national disagreement and confusion over how best to address the issue of race.

Monday, the US Supreme Court takes up two cases that confront the heated debate over race. On one side are those who believe affirmative action and other race-conscious programs are necessary to fight the effects of discrimination and inequality. On the other side are those who believe the Constitution mandates a colorblind approach to race relations - that government programs granting benefits based on a person's race are just as illegal as withholding benefits because of a person's skin color.

At issue in the two cases are race-based student enrollment plans at public school districts in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky. Both plans were designed by the local school boards to voluntarily achieve racial integration to provide a diverse learning environment for the benefit of all students. Both plans are under attack by local parents who say the use of race to maintain a racial balance amounts to an unconstitutional form of government discrimination.

The cases confront fundamental issues that stretch back to 1954, when the high court ruled in the Brown case that racial segregation violates the constitutional principle of equal protection.

"This is about what is left, if anything, of Brown v. Board of Education," Theodore Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said in a recent debate hosted by the Century Foundation. If the high court strikes down the Seattle and Louisville programs, "it will be a reversal of historic proportions," he said.

The Brown decision is also the starting point for those challenging the plans, including the Bush administration. But they draw a different lesson from the landmark case.

"In Brown v. Board of Education the court held that intentionally classifying students on the basis of race violates the equal protection clause, and declared the ultimate objective ... to be achieving a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis," writes Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief to the court.

The Supreme Court last considered a similar issue in a 2003 case over race-based admissions procedures at the University of Michigan Law School. The court split 5 to 4, with then-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor casting the deciding vote upholding the affirmative-action plan as a means to bring racial diversity to the elite law school.

Justice O'Connor's retirement earlier this year opens the door for a possible shift at the high court, with Justice Anthony Kennedy now potentially in position to cast the deciding vote in the Seattle and Louisville cases, legal analysts say. Justice Kennedy dissented in the Michigan Law School case and was sharply critical of what he said was an overly permissive standard of review used by O'Connor.

"Were the courts to apply a searching standard to race-based admissions schemes, that would force educational institutions to seriously explore race- neutral alternatives," Kennedy wrote.

The enrollment plans under challenge in Louisville and Seattle are similar in that they are both attempts to address de facto segregation tied in part to housing patterns. The voluntary desegregation programs are aimed at preventing the school districts from sliding into a starkly segregated environment with minority students isolated in inner-city schools and white students isolated in suburban schools.

To achieve a meaningful mix, both school boards decided they would have to use race as a factor in deciding which students should attend particular schools.

In Seattle, the school board set student enrollment at the district's most popular high schools within 15 percentage points of the overall racial balance of the district's students. The balance was 40 percent white and 60 percent nonwhite.

Students were permitted to apply to attend any of the district's 10 high schools. But because some schools were more popular than others, the board created a racial tiebreaker to determine eligibility at the most popular schools.

If a new student would cause that particular school's white or nonwhite student population to increase above the 55 percent cutoff, the student was barred from attending that school. In the plan's first year, more than 300 white students were denied admission to their preferred school because of their skin color. Thirty students left the public school system rather than attend their assigned school.

Parents who oppose the plan say Seattle schools are already diverse and that the race tiebreaker is an attempt to achieve unconstitutional racial balancing.

Lawyers for the school board counter that the desire to integrate public schools is not the constitutional equivalent of seeking to maintain a segregated system.

Supporters say the Seattle plan is consistent with the promise made by the high court in Brown v. Board of Education. There is a fundamental difference between using race to segregate students and using it to integrate them, they say.

The same debate is under way in Louisville. There, the Jefferson County School Board established a broad goal that each of the district's schools should have black student enrollment set between 15 percent and 50 percent of the school's total enrollment. African-American enrollment districtwide is about 35 percent. It is up to school administrators to determine the exact racial mix at each school.

The program is aimed at encouraging students to attend schools outside their own neighborhood, but flexibility is the key to the Jefferson County plan. It seeks to offer options for those parents who want their children to attend school close to home, yet it also seeks to achieve meaningful diversity in every school throughout the district.

The impact of being denied admission to a particular school for racial reasons is cushioned by an approach that urges parents - both black and white - to work with district officials to identify acceptable alternative schools. "You just keep working the process through with parents," says Pat Todd, director of the Jefferson County Schools student assignment plan.

"I don't mean to tell you it works perfectly. I have [some] dissatisfied parents. It is controversial. It is imperfect," Ms. Todd says. But in a broad way, the program is a microcosm of how democracy works, she says. "It is not about perfection. It is about managing the imperfections to people's greatest level of satisfaction. That is what this process is all about."

DOJ_NMG_0101700

Not all schools in the Jefferson County system use race as a deciding factor. A federal judge has ordered that four schools offering unique educational programs cannot use race in selecting students - including Louisville's historically black Central High School. Since the judge's ruling six years ago in a case brought by African-American students, black enrollment at Central has risen steadily and now stands at 83 percent.

In addition, districtwide "traditional" schools use a random computer-drawn list to decide who attends those schools.

Todd says she and her staff work to ensure that the proportion of black applicants to white applicants at traditional schools reflects the districtwide goal for black enrollment. That is done in the hope that the random draw will subsequently reflect the desired black-white mix, Todd says.

A similar random draw would not work at the elementary school level, Todd says. It would eliminate the flexibility to allow dissatisfied parents to choose a second, or third, or fourth school option. It is that follow-up effort that helps blunt the impact of being denied admission to a first-choice school because of a student's race.

Todd says although the district uses some race-neutral alternatives, meaningful integration requires using race. "I don't think we can keep our school desegregated over time without the yardstick and vision of some racial guidelines," she says.

Others disagree. The school district's approach "denigrates a 5-year-old's self-worth and self-esteem by comporting him to be color coded throughout his educational career," says Teddy Gordon, who represents Crystal Meredith, a mother who is challenging the Louisville plan.

Mr. Gordon says in his brief that the school district may only use a race-conscious plan to remedy intentional discrimination. Anything else is unconstitutional racial balancing, he says.

The school district's lawyer, Francis Mellen, says that since all schools in Louisville receive similar funding and offer similar programs, students are not deprived of a benefit when they are denied enrollment in their chosen school.

"The student has not been denied an education, only a choice," Mr. Mellen says.

Decisions in the two cases - Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Crystal Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education - are expected by the end of the court's term next summer.

Cases Retread Brown Vs. Board Of Education Steps (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — For the first time in a decade, the Supreme Court will revisit the legacy of a landmark: the Brown vs. Board of Education decision of 1954 that declared unconstitutional the racial segregation of public schools.

Separate schools for black and white children are "inherently unequal," Chief Justice Earl Warren said in an opinion that helped launch the civil rights movement.

State-enforced segregation laws are long gone, but for school officials today, a key question remains: Did the historic decision commit them to a policy of seeking integrated schools, or did it tell them not to assign students to a school based on their race?

Today, lawyers in a pair of integration cases will debate whether school boards may use racial guidelines to assign students. And both sides will rely on the Brown decision to make their case.

The outcome could affect hundreds of school systems across the nation, including the Los Angeles Unified School District.

With the arrival of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., civil rights lawyers believe there may be a five-member majority determined to strike down race-based integration programs.

In Seattle, the school board adopted a policy — now suspended — that gave "nonwhite" students an edge if they sought to enroll in a popular, mostly white high school. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district said the black student body at each elementary school should range from 15% to 50%.

In both cities, several white parents sued to have the plans declared unconstitutional after their children were barred from enrolling in the school of their choice because of their race. Though they lost in the lower courts, the Supreme Court voted in June to hear their appeals, leading many to predict the justices are poised to outlaw "racial balancing" in the public schools.

"At its core, the issue here is the promise made 52 years ago in Brown vs. Board of Education," said Theodore Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, which won the ruling that struck down racial segregation in the South. "Mandatory desegregation is now a thing of the past. All that's left is voluntary desegregation, and now that is being challenged."

Shaw said school officials should be lauded for their efforts to achieve integration. He said he was particularly troubled by "the ideology that equates any race consciousness with racial discrimination."

Domino effect

DOJ_NMG_0101701

Bush administration lawyers, who joined the case on the side of the parents, say the Brown decision sought to move the nation toward a color-blind policy. They say school officials may not open or close the door to particular students solely because of their race. In short, race-based decisions are racial discrimination, even if the officials are pursing a laudable goal, they say.

"The promise of this court's landmark decision in Brown … was to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis," U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement wrote in his brief to the court. "Race-based school assignment does not advance that objective."

A ruling in favor of the parents could have broad effect. Hundreds of school districts across the nation are said to use racial guidelines in at least some of their schools.

About 54,000 students in Los Angeles Unified are enrolled in magnet schools, where spaces are allocated based on racial guidelines. An additional 3,500 students choose to be bused to another school under a second program that encourages integration. Both programs were adopted in 1981 after court-ordered busing came to an end.

Last year, these programs came under challenge in a lawsuit filed in the state courts. Pacific Legal Foundation sued, alleging the programs violated Proposition 209, the 1996 voter initiative that forbids state and local governments from giving "preferential treatment" to any person because of race.

A U.S. Supreme Court ruling striking down the integration policies in Seattle and Louisville could knock down those in Los Angeles as well.

"Our program is at risk. It is expressly race-based," said Kevin S. Reed, general counsel for Los Angeles Unified. "The program is working very well."

The district filed its own brief with the Supreme Court, urging the justices to uphold voluntary integration programs. Loss of the magnet program would be "devastating," its lawyers said. "Nearly 54,000 magnet students would be returned to their home schools. For the majority of those students, that would mean leaving a desegregated school and returning to a school segregated by the residential patterns" within the city of Los Angeles, they said.

But such a dire outcome is not certain, even if the court does rule for the parents in Seattle and Louisville. They are objecting because their children were turned away from a nearby school because of their race. A voluntary busing program that moved children from the city to a suburb, or from a low-income neighborhood to a more affluent one, would not be affected by a ruling striking "race-based assignment" policies.

Nonetheless, the lawyers who are challenging the school integration policies are confident the Supreme Court will agree with them.

Since 1990, the justices have insisted the government may not use "racial classifications" when awarding jobs, contracts or college scholarships. They also have voided congressional districts that shifted black voters with the aim of electing a black candidate. Last year, the court overturned a California prison policy that separated new inmates based on their race.

O'Connor out, Alito in

There was one exception to this trend. In 2003, the court upheld an admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School that gave an edge to black applicants. Speaking for a 5-4 majority, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said race-based, affirmative-action rules for colleges could be justified as the only way to obtain diversity in higher education.

But O'Connor has since retired from the court.

And last month, Michigan voters essentially overturned the university's policy and outlawed "preferential treatment" based on race.

Now that Alito has taken O'Connor's seat, most conservatives are predicting a majority will vote to strike down school assignment policies based on race.

"I think the court will reject these programs and say this kind of racial counting and sorting doesn't make sense in 2006," said lawyer Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a Virginia group that promotes "colorblind public policies."

Harry Korrell, the lawyer for the Seattle parents, also argues that the traditional black-and-white view of race is outdated in a racially diverse West Coast city. The race-based integration policy for Seattle's high schools resulted at most in "trivial changes in pigmentation diversity at a few already diverse schools," he said.

But the minimal impact of these policies could cut the other way.

In a widely quoted concurring opinion, Judge Alex Kozinski of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals said Seattle's voluntary integration policy could be upheld because it did not involve a "racial stigma" or a preference for one race over the over. It "gives the American melting pot a stir without benefiting or burdening any particular group," Kozinski wrote.

Kozinski, an appointee of President Reagan, is also a former clerk to Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the centrist who may well hold the deciding vote.

A decision is unlikely before the spring.

Extra Credit Affluent Families Have Ways To Sway School Assignments (WSJ)

By Daniel Golden

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

SEATTLE -- The Supreme Court is set to hear a case today filed by a predominantly white parents' group from an affluent Seattle neighborhood. Their children were denied admission to a majority-white school, and instead assigned to mostly minority schools.

The case, dating to 2000, has become a lightning rod for critics who say school boards go too far to try to achieve an elusive goal of racial integration. The court's rulings on Seattle and a similar case involving Louisville, Ky., schools are likely to affect hundreds of districts nationwide that use race as a factor in school assignments.

But a close look at Seattle shows that officials have frequently yielded to school-assignment pressure from white parents in pursuing another elusive goal -- middle-class participation in public schools.

In 2004, after the district scrapped race as a factor in assignments because of the legal threat, another group of white parents from the same neighborhood got upset when their children were passed over at the same majority-white school, Ballard High. They were left out not because of race, but because they didn't live near enough.

This time, the school district quietly backed down when the parents started sending their children to private or suburban schools instead of the struggling, majority-black school to which they'd been assigned. Ballard and other supposedly full schools together took about 100 extra students, most of them white.

Even as parents challenge a government action making room for minorities in highly-regarded schools, the later events in Seattle show another side of the picture: the ways that school-assignment practices can work to the benefit of whites. In Seattle as in other parts of the country, schools sometimes accommodate middle-class parents who push to get their children into coveted schools. When these middle-class parents are predominantly white, as in Seattle, the lobbying can tend to sort more white children into the most desirable schools.

Seattle officials say it's vital that district schools seek to retain middle-class parents who provide time, energy, political support, and money -- via taxes and via private giving to public schools. But they are concerned that some of these parents gain an edge in admissions.

"The district would like to have all of our families have equal access to our high schools," says school-district assistant general counsel Shannon McMinimee. "It is disappointing that some families choose to expend their efforts in finding ways around the assignment system based on perception, instead of working with the district to improve all schools."

A high-court decision siding with the parents suing Seattle and Louisville would culminate a judicial withdrawal from the integration efforts of the late 1960s and 1970s. In that era, many urban districts, some under court order, began using mandatory student assignments to desegregate schools.

But starting in the early 1990s, the court sharply limited mandatory plans, prompting many districts to declare their problems solved and drop desegregation efforts. Today, most large urban school districts are no longer under court orders, but many smaller districts still have integration plans.

Since Seattle stopped seeking racial balance in school admissions in 2002, the schools under scrutiny in the parents' lawsuit have become less diverse. At Franklin High, a school in predominantly minority south Seattle to which many of their children were assigned, the proportion of nonwhite students has risen to 91% from 79%, compared with a district-wide nonwhite composition of 60%. (Nonwhite in district statistics includes Hispanics, Asians and American Indians in addition to blacks.)

At Ballard High in majority-white north Seattle, the proportion of white students has risen to 63% from 57% in the same period, while blacks have dipped to 7% from 10%. Ballard offers about 25 advanced-placement courses, as well as programs from filmmaking to a maritime academy. Art donated by an alumni foundation adorns its walls.

Harry Korrell, an attorney for the parent group suing Seattle, maintains that the city high schools remain integrated. "The whitest school in the district is over 30% nonwhite," he says. "I just don't see that as segregation."

The question of how much to bend for middle-class parents in school assignments concerns administrators nationwide. In New York City, Schools Chancellor Joel Klein has centralized high-school admissions to crack down on what a spokesman calls "a long history of parents gaming the system" by shopping among schools and lobbying principals for slots. The city also standardized criteria for schools for gifted students. One such school interviewed parents about their potential to help the school. Mr. Klein stopped the practice this year amid concerns it put low-income and minority parents at a disadvantage.

According to Gary Orfield, a Harvard professor of education, programs such as Seattle's that let students choose schools are usually set up in ways that give an advantage to middle-class and white students. In Seattle, those who miss application deadlines tend to come from a "more transient population" of renters who are disproportionately low-income and minority, says

John Vacchiery, the district's former director of enrollment. This year 8,828 Seattle students applied for school assignments on time and 7,039 applied late or not at all, relegating them to the back of the line.

Seattle has long wrestled with how to integrate schools in its heavily white north side and predominantly minority south. Although it wasn't under court order, Seattle adopted a mandatory assignment system in 1977, spurring white flight from the public schools. In 1988, Seattle turned to a "controlled choice" system that sought integration by grouping predominantly white and minority schools in clusters and allowing families some freedom to choose within the cluster to which they were assigned.

A decade later, Seattle implemented an "open choice" plan permitting ninth-graders to request any high school in the district. One aim was to push schools to improve by competing for students. Since the state's achievement test was implemented in 2001, Seattle 10th-graders have boosted scores overall each year.

Race wasn't a factor in the open-choice plan unless schools received more applicants than slots. In that case, students with siblings already enrolled at the school got in first. Then the district considered both how far applicants lived from the schools -- and race. An oversubscribed school's ratio of whites to minorities had to stay within 15 percentage points of the district's average.

In 2000, about 300 ninth-graders, 200 of them white, were denied their chosen schools because of their race. "People just screamed, 'This isn't fair,' " says Kathleen Brose, a parent whose daughter wanted to go to Ballard but was wait-listed there and assigned to Franklin.

The district sought to placate the parents, increasing the capacity of coveted schools by a total of 100 students. That meant they dipped into their waiting lists, known as "moving" the waiting list. Still, the Ballard waiting list didn't move far enough to reach Ms. Brose's daughter. Ms. Brose became president of the parent group that sued the district.

Four years later, many parents in the same affected neighborhoods -- Queen Anne and Magnolia, just north of downtown -- were upset again. Although by then the district had suspended race as a factor, many students from those neighborhoods still didn't get their first-choice schools, which had filled quickly.

One was Lydia Minehan-Tubic. She and most of her friends were assigned to Cleveland High, a school whose student body is 6.7% white and one that she says she had never even heard of.

Her father, Marko Tubic, an investment representative for brokerage firm Edward Jones, was initially willing to give Cleveland a chance. But the school doesn't offer advanced-placement courses and its graduation rate was 44% in 2005, vs. a district average of 60%. Mr. Tubic decided that "it was important for Lydia to have a good stepping-stone to college."

The families began meeting with school-board members and district administrators. Dick Lilly, then on the board representing Queen Anne and Magnolia, proposed giving those areas' children preference at Ballard. The board said no. "A couple of members viewed it as a matter of white privilege," he says.

Behind the scenes, though, board members and district officials were more receptive -- particularly after the Minehan-Tubics and other families enrolled their children in a suburban district, a move that is permitted under state law. In a July 16 email, Steve Wilson, then the district's chief academic officer, instructed principals at seven high schools to enroll up to 30 students apiece from their waiting lists immediately. Three took 30 each and others took fewer.

"We have found out that many of those students have left the district and have registered in neighboring districts or to private/parochial schools," he wrote. "The short range and long range effects of this could be very detrimental to the district's budget as well as our overall relations with our community." To mitigate the impact on predominantly minority south Seattle schools that would lose students, Mr. Wilson added that no teachers would be laid off.

Mr. Wilson, now a dean at Ingraham High here, says he assured parents their children would thrive at schools such as Cleveland and told them "you've got a real bad, stereotyped image of those schools." When he couldn't persuade the parents, he accommodated them.

Seattle schools superintendent Raj Manhas thinks the parents had a legitimate complaint. He says "there is a definite need for more seats in the north."

Ballard absorbed 30 more students, but didn't get as far down the waiting list as Lydia Minehan-Tubic, who was 58th. Her mother pleaded with Mr. Wilson, to no avail, and filed an appeal citing Cleveland's "abysmal academic record." The district said academic quality wasn't an appeal basis.

In September 2004, Lydia began attending a public high school in an adjacent suburb. Fearing she might be erased from Ballard's waiting list if this became known, her father called Cleveland High every morning for several weeks to say she would be absent that day. Lydia's mother, Florence Minehan, says it was "heartbreaking" to drive her to school past friends awaiting the Ballard bus.

Then late in September, Ballard principal Phil Brockman called and invited Lydia to enroll. "I was crying I was so excited," she says. She's now a junior, taking two advanced-placement courses, and her mother is active in the parent association. Mr. Brockman says he didn't make an exception for Lydia but had an opening and was working his way down the waiting list.

Lydia's mother makes no apologies. "I don't want the low level of academic rigor at some schools to affect her opportunity to have a good high-school education. I don't want to feel guilty about having expectations for her," Ms. Minehan says. Besides, she says, "it's in the district's best interest to capture these families that support education" rather than lose them to private or suburban schools.

Ms. McMinimee, the district assistant general counsel, disagrees. "It's unfortunate these families chose to threaten to leave the district instead of to go to Cleveland. Cleveland has so few white students that if these students had gone there, they would have had a significant impact on its ethnic makeup. It would have been a tremendously eye-opening experience for both groups."

Seattle's system also lets unhappy parents appeal for reassignment based on "extreme extenuating circumstances." Parents of one freshman who didn't get into elite Garfield High, where several of his middle-school classmates enrolled, appealed this year on the ground that he had a disability hindering him from adapting to school without his peer group. The appeal, with testimony from a psychologist, got him into the school, where the study body is about 44% white. The district's Ms. McMinimee says federal law obligates the district to accommodate students with disabilities.

When a wait list "moves," money and parental involvement move along with it. At majority-white Montlake Elementary, parents contributed about $225,000 in 2004 -- $900 per student -- for teaching, staff support, field trips and the like.

John Eickelberg, former president of Montlake's parent group, says his son was slated to attend his neighborhood school, mostly black Leschi Elementary, until Montlake admitted him off its waiting list. He says he didn't use influence to get his son in. But the result, says Mr. Eickelberg, a white engineering manager at Boeing Co., is that "people like myself aren't rolling up their sleeves at the PTA at Leschi because we're sending our children somewhere else."

The district funding formula allocates an extra $756.51 for each low-income student qualifying for a free or reduced school lunch. Still, Cleveland principal Donna Marshall says she has learned to budget conservatively to be ready for a loss of students, and thus of budget money, when more-sought-after schools dip into their waiting lists. She says district officials assure her each year that they won't do that, but then do.

Schools Superintendent Manhas says that with the city no longer including race as a factor in assignments, he "will continue to monitor" diversity at Ballard and other schools. He and board members say the district won't necessarily restore race as an admissions factor even if the district wins the suit filed by the parents, but is defending the case because it wants the option.

A few white students did accept assignments to predominantly minority Cleveland in 2004, including Thea Leidel, whose first choice was Garfield High. Her father, Stephen Leidel, a senior computer specialist at University of Washington Medical Center, says he and his wife considered seeking a transfer for Thea or moving to another neighborhood, but are glad they gave Cleveland a try. "When we go there, we're impressed," he said.

Thea says she was disappointed when most of the ninth-graders assigned to Cleveland from the Queen Anne and Magnolia neighborhoods didn't show up. "They were cheating, getting out of something they weren't comfortable with," says the 16-year-old junior, who plays three varsity sports and hopes to attend Seattle University. "If everyone obeyed the system and went where they're assigned, every school would be better."

Breyer: Court Should Aid Minority Rights (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, December 4, 2006

Justice Stephen G. Breyer says the Supreme Court must promote the political rights of minorities and look beyond the Constitution's text when necessary to ensure that "no one gets too powerful."

Breyer, a Clinton appointee who has brokered many of the high court's 5-4 rulings, spoke in a televised interview that aired one day before justices hear a key case on race in schools. He said judges must consider the practical impact of a decision to ensure democratic participation.

"We're the boundary patrol," Breyer said, reiterating themes in his 2005 book that argue in favor of race preferences in university admissions because they would lead to diverse workplaces and leadership.

"It's a Constitution that protects a democratic system, basic liberties, a rule of law, a degree of equality, a division of powers, state, federal, so that no one gets too powerful," said Breyer, who often votes with a four-member liberal bloc of justices.

On Monday, the court will hear arguments in a pair of cases involving integration plans in K-12 schools. The legal challenge, which is backed by the Bush administration, could be among the most significant school cases since the landmark Brown v. Board of Education ruling in 1954 banned racial segregation.

In 2003, the court upheld race-conscious admissions in higher education in a 5-4 opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, however, has since retired and been replaced by conservative Justice Samuel Alito. Justice Antonin Scalia, meanwhile, has denounced the use of race in school admissions as lacking any support in the Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0101705

In his interview, Breyer argued that in some cases it wouldn't make sense to strictly follow the Constitution because phrases such as "freedom of speech" are vague. Judges must look at the real-world context — not focus solely on framers' intent, as Scalia has argued — because society is constantly evolving, he said.

"Those words, 'the freedom of speech,' 'Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech' — neither they, the founders, nor those words tell you how to apply it to the Internet," Breyer said.

Pointing to the example of campaign finance, Breyer also said the court was right in 2003 to uphold on a 5-4 vote the McCain-Feingold law that banned unlimited donations to political parties.

Acknowledging that critics had a point in saying the law violates free speech, Breyer said the limits were constitutional because it would make the electoral process more fair and democratic to the little guy who isn't tied to special interests.

"You don't want one person's speech, that $20 million giver, to drown out everybody else's. So if we want to give a chance to the people who have only $1 and not $20 million, maybe we have to do something to make that playing field a little more level in terms of money," he said.

Breyer, who has voted to uphold abortion rights, declined to comment on the court's role in deciding abortion. Justices this term are considering the constitutionality of so-called "partial-birth" abortion in a case some conservatives hope will be used to overturn the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling.

"The more the precedent has been around, the more people rely on it, the more secure it has to be," he said.

Breyer commented on "Fox News Sunday," in an interview taped last week.

An Assault On Local School Control (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

More than 50 years after the Supreme Court decided Brown v. Board of Education, the nation still has not abolished de facto segregation in public schools. But thanks to good will and enormous effort, some communities have made progress. Today the Supreme Court hears arguments in a pair of cases that could undo much of that work.

Conservative activists are seeking to halt the completely voluntary, and laudable, efforts by Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to promote racially integrated education. Both cities have school assignment plans known as managed or open choice. Children are assigned to schools based on a variety of factors, one of which is the applicant's race.

The plan that Jefferson County adopted for Louisville has a goal of having black enrollment in every school be no less than 15 and no more than 50 percent. Seattle assigns students to its 10 high schools based on a number of factors, including an "integration tiebreaker." This tiebreaker, which is applied to students of all races, requires that an applicant's race be taken into account when a school departs by more than 15 percent from the district's overall racial breakdown.

Parents in both districts sued, alleging that the consideration of race is unconstitutional. In each case, the court of appeals upheld the assignment plans. In the Seattle case, Judge Alex Kozinski, a Reagan appointee who is highly respected by legal conservatives, wrote that because the district's plan does not advantage or disadvantage any particular racial group — its pro-integration formula applies equally to all — it "carries none of the baggage the Supreme Court has found objectionable" in other cases involving race-based actions.

The Louisville and Seattle plans are precisely the kind of benign race-based policies that the court has long held to be constitutional. Promoting diversity in education is a compelling state interest under the equal protection clause, and these districts are using carefully considered, narrowly tailored plans to make their schools more diverse.

It is startling to see the Justice Department, which was such a strong advocate for integration in the civil rights era, urging the court to strike down the plans. Its position is at odds with so much the Bush administration claims to believe. The federal government is asking federal courts to use the Constitution to overturn educational decisions made by localities. Conservative activists should be crying "judicial activism," but they do not seem to mind this activism with an anti-integration agenda.

If these plans are struck down, many other cities' plans will most likely also have to be dismantled. In Brown, a unanimous court declared education critical for a child to "succeed in life" and held that equal protection does not permit it to be provided on a segregated basis. It would be tragic if the court changed directions now and began using equal protection to re-segregate the schools.

A Different Race Case (WP)

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

WHEN THE Supreme Court hears oral arguments today about race-based school placements in Seattle and Louisville, the justices may be tempted to see the cases as the latest showdown over affirmative action. One side casts the matter as a simple issue of governmental race-consciousness; the other talks of diversity. Yet the programs at issue are not classic racial preferences. They deserve to be considered -- and upheld -- for what they are.

A society committed to equal protection under law necessarily finds it uncomfortable whenever government considers a person's race in deciding how to treat him or her -- even if the goal is laudable. But these programs use race in a fashion quite different from those that have inspired the court's skepticism in the past. While the Louisville and Seattle programs differ, neither gives members of any particular race a boost at the expense of any other. Rather, the programs respond to residential segregation patterns by giving minority students preference in preponderantly white schools and white students preference in preponderantly minority schools.

In Seattle, for example, students can generally go to whatever high school they want, subject to available space; race is used as one of several tiebreakers for those more popular schools that become overenrolled. Some of these schools are predominantly white, some predominantly nonwhite. To be sure, such a program has victims -- people who get turned away from the schools of their choice because of their race.

But as Judge Alex Kozinski, a conservative member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, wrote in an insightful concurring opinion on the Seattle plan, this type of race consciousness is different from affirmative action, or government-sponsored segregation. It "is not meant to oppress minorities, nor does it have that effect. . . . There is no attempt to give members of particular races political power based on skin color. There is no competition between the races, and no race is given a preference over another."

The irony, in fact, is that the Louisville plan essentially continues a desegregation program the city adopted under court order as a remedy for past segregation. How can it be that the doctrine of equal protection now forbids the very steps it once required? The question here boils down to whether local school boards should be blocked from any race consciousness in taking even the most modest steps to ensure that children growing up in a multiethnic society go to school with people who don't look like them. For a variety of reasons, Americans still tend to segregate themselves residentially, which would prevent many schoolchildren from attending racially diverse schools absent some intervention to encourage it. It makes no sense to construe the Constitution as prohibiting such actions.

Taser Use Again In Dispute (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

An officer's shocking of an NFL player spotlights how black people are more likely to be stunned by Houston police.

HOUSTON — Fred Weary, a pro football player for the Houston Texans, was driving his maroon Chevy Impala SS last month when he was pulled over by police after failing to signal that he was changing lanes.

What happened next is in dispute. Police say Weary was "verbally combative" and did not put his hands on his car when ordered. The 305-pound offensive lineman says he did what the officers told him. But one thing is clear: Like many black men in this city, Weary was zapped with a stun gun and cuffed as he lay motionless on the ground.

The highly publicized case has brought attention to some stark statistics about police use of Tasers in the nation's fourth-largest city: Nearly two-thirds of those shocked with the high-voltage weapons over the last two years were black.

And the resulting outcry from black community activists and a City Council member has led Mayor Bill White to call for an independent review of Taser use by the Houston Police Department.

"The mayor took a positive first step, but what will he do when the information comes back and clearly shows that race is a direct factor in who gets Tasered?" said Quanell X, a community activist and leader of the New Black Panther Nation. "We already know that African Americans are Tasered more often than whites."

Quanell X saw blatant racism in the split-second decision by an officer to use a Taser on Weary during his Nov. 14 traffic stop: "This was a small white woman who was intimidated by a big black man and panicked," he said.

At a town hall meeting set for today, Quanell X said, he plans to highlight cases of people shocked by stun guns — including one in which a black man who was having an epileptic seizure was Tasered for failing to comply with an officer's orders.

Shortly after the Weary incident, a UCLA student of Iranian descent was repeatedly shocked by campus police after refusing to exit a student library. The two events have revived a national debate about proper use of Tasers, promoted as a tool law enforcement officers can use to subdue unruly people without injuring them.

Houston police officers are permitted to use Tasers any time they feel physically threatened by a suspect. Every such use is then reviewed by top department brass. Since the city began using the weapons in December 2004, no one has been seriously injured by an electrical jolt, department spokesman John Cannon said. "This is the most scrutinized weapon in the Houston Police Department."

Though African Americans make up about 23% of Houston's population, Cannon said, they account for about half of the arrests in the city. Therefore, he said, the fact that 620 of the 982 suspects Tasered since 2004 were black was not statistically out of line. He added that "a handful" of officers had been reprimanded for using the weapons without proper cause.

In an opinion piece in the Houston Chronicle on Saturday, Police Chief Harold L. Hurtt defended his department's Taser policies, saying that using stun guns instead of handguns has saved lives.

Even before Weary's arrest, Houston Councilwoman Ada Edwards had called for a review of the department's Taser policies and a study on the medical consequences of being shocked with stun guns. City Controller Annise D. Parker had planned to audit the stun gun program to analyze officer training and use of the weapons compared with other cities.

Critics in Houston have said that the Tasers are used too often — particularly against black suspects — and that those who were shocked often did not pose a serious threat.

A judge has dismissed charges that Weary, 29, resisted arrest, finding that he did not use force against the officers when he was pulled over about 1 p.m. for failing to use his turn signal and not having a front license plate. Prosecutors have not ruled out filing other charges after re-examining police radio calls and other evidence.

Weary, who expressed anger and frustration after his arrest, has maintained that he did nothing to provoke the officers. His lawyer, Charley Davidson, did not return requests for comment.

Sharpton Wants Inquiry Into Police Shooting Policies (AP)

By Errin Haines, The Associated Press

AP, December 3, 2006

ATLANTA (AP) — Al Sharpton called for a congressional probe of police shooting policies as he joined local activists Sunday outside the home of an elderly woman killed by narcotics police officers who burst into her home.

The civil rights leader said the death of Kathryn Johnston — along with the death of 23-year-old groom-to-be Sean Bell, who was shot by police on his wedding day outside a Queens strip club — is an example of "a new sense of police recklessness" sweeping the country.

"Something stinks in this case," he said. "In fact, it smelled so bad that I smelled it in New York."

Sharpton called for the incoming Congress to address the issue.

"There seems to be a new spirit in law enforcement that they can become the judge, jury and executioner of the law on the scene," Sharpton said.

"Police apprehend suspects; they don't kill them," Sharpton said. "This cannot be tolerated in a civilized society."

Johnston — described as 92 by her family but 88 by the medical examiner — lived in fear in the crime-ridden Vine City neighborhood of northwest Atlanta.

On the night of Nov. 21, a group of plainclothes officers burst in, searching for drugs. They had obtained a "no-knock" warrant, saying an informant bought drugs at the house.

Johnston opened fire with a pistol, wounding three officers before she was shot to death.

The informant later denied buying drugs at Johnston's home and said police told him to lie about the incident, Police Chief Richard Pennington said. Pennington said the informant is in protective custody and is a key part of the FBI-led investigation into the shootout.

In the New York case, Bell and his friends were leaving his bachelor party on Nov. 25 when a group of undercover police fired 50 shots at their car. Police have said that Bell's vehicle hit one officer and an unmarked police car, and that officers apparently thought one of Bell's companions was about to get to a gun.

Fatal Shootings By Police: Hard To Investigate, Even Harder To Prosecute (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

With Sean Bell now eulogized and buried, the emotions surrounding his death are swirling around the investigation into whether police officers committed a crime when they fired 50 bullets into Mr. Bell's car.

Although every investigation is different, cases like that of Mr. Bell, an unarmed black man who was killed on his wedding day, have come to follow a similar rhythm and pattern. And experts and those involved in the investigation say that through the history of those cases, they have learned that it is very difficult to convince a grand jury or a trial jury that police officers, who are empowered to defend the public with deadly force if necessary, went too far. In many cases of police shootings, with tensions high, the facts and legal fine points are difficult to isolate from a much larger context.

DOJ_NMG_0101708

"What makes these cases so hard are issues that go well beyond the incident itself," a high-ranking official in the office of Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, said last week, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

"It's the racial tension that still exists in the city," the official continued. "It's the mistrust in the minority community. It's cops that are faced with danger every day and have to react in seconds. It's safe to say, if they're wrong, somebody dies" — whether a civilian or an officer.

Everyone involved knows the stakes. While the district attorney's office investigates, civil rights activists and lawyers for the victims and the police officers are struggling to shape public opinion and find witnesses who buttress their points of view.

At a news conference yesterday at the scene of the shooting, some of those people called for an independent prosecutor, saying that a district attorney should not be investigating a police department he regularly deals with.

"They work with the cops on a daily basis, and they have a conflict of interest," said Norman Siegel, a civil rights lawyer, at the news conference yesterday. He described the shooting as "an enormous minefield."

But Mr. Brown said in a statement yesterday that calls for a special prosecutor "are neither helpful nor productive — nor are they in any respect justified." He said earlier that his investigation would be "independent of that being conducted by the Police Department."

One official involved in the investigation said that Mr. Brown had asked his chief of homicide to prepare a list of what was needed to move forward, and had passed it on to police. The list contained about 30 items, like autopsy and toxicology reports; 911 and radio transmission tapes; hospital reports for both the civilians and the police officers involved in the shooting; ballistics reports; the criminal histories, if any, of witnesses; and photos or videos taken by civilians or the police. Mr. Brown has said several times that the investigation is in its earliest stages and it remains unclear what the inquiry and testimony before the grand jury will show. But the investigation will focus sharply on what occurred in the minutes leading up to the shooting, and in those frenzied seconds when the officers fired 50 bullets at a car, killing Mr. Bell, the groom, and wounding two friends as they left the Club Kalua, a strip club in Jamaica, nine days ago.

The recent history in such cases is mixed.

In the case of Amadou Diallo, fired on 41 times by the police as he stood in his Bronx vestibule in 1999, four officers were tried on criminal charges, including second-degree murder and manslaughter, and acquitted. In the case of Patrick M. Dorismond, killed in Manhattan in March 2000 during a scuffle with an undercover narcotics detective who said he thought the man was a drug dealer, a grand jury declined to indict.

But a year ago, a State Supreme Court justice convicted Bryan Conroy, an undercover officer, of criminally negligent homicide in the death of Ousmane Zongo, shot during a raid in a Chelsea warehouse.

"When you listen to people in the community talk about a case like this, it doesn't take long before the conversation goes well beyond the incident in question," said the official in the Queens district attorney's office. "It goes to other incidents in the past. It goes quite frankly to the general interaction between cops and people in the community."

Michael Hardy, who along with Sanford A. Rubenstein is representing the shot men's families, said they had not ruled out seeking a federal civil rights investigation, but he said the evidence of racial bias was not clear-cut. Of the officers who fired on Mr. Bell's car, two are black, one is black and Hispanic, and two are white.

The police pursuing the inquiry are playing a complex role. On the one hand, they profess impartiality; on the other hand, they are put in the position of investigating their colleagues' own conduct while showing that they take a stand against excessive violence.

The investigators will knock on doors at different times of the day and different days of the week to try to find everyone who may have seen or heard something early that Saturday, one official involved in the investigation said. "Ideally, you want to know as much as you can know before you talk to the key witnesses," another official said.

But to a large degree, investigators for Mr. Brown will be working parallel with the Police Department, which is conducting an internal investigation and may have already knocked on the same doors.

One of the issues the district attorney is considering, the official in Mr. Brown's office said, is at what point a mistake by police officers becomes a criminal act. The answer, prosecutors say, is more complicated than a layman might expect, because state law gives police somewhat more latitude in using deadly force than it gives civilians.

Mr. Bell, 23, and the two wounded men — Joseph Guzman, 31, shot at least 11 times, and Trent Benefield, 23, hit three times — were not armed, and no gun was found. But moments before the shooting started, an undercover detective outside the strip club heard one man in Mr. Bell's party say, "Yo, get my gun," according to a person briefed on the detective's account.

The detective said he positioned himself in front of the car, identified himself as an officer — a point lawyers for the victims dispute — and ordered the men to show their hands. After Mr. Bell clipped the officer with his car and rammed into a minivan where other officers were waiting, the detective began to shoot, said the person briefed on his account.

Police officials have acknowledged that the conduct of the undercover detective — for example, in taking action rather than relying on backup, and in firing at a moving car — was unusual.

"This is a real question," one official involved in the inquiry said. "But it doesn't mean that what the undercover did was bad."

This official said that some of the five officers who fired shots probably faced greater potential criminal liability than others. Although the number of shots fired has provoked outrage, 50 shots can be squeezed off in a matter of seconds, making the number of bullets fired less important than what started the shooting.

"There is nothing in the law that says you can use deadly force but only fire a certain number of shots," that official said. "The number of bullets is certainly startling to the general public, but the key question is why was the first shot fired by each of them.

"You can't view this as monolithic," the official said. "It's five individuals who made five individual decisions.

"The most important thing is the first shot," he said, "not that the others aren't important. But the most important is the first shot."

The perception of the officer firing the first shot — whether he felt his life was in danger — will weigh more heavily than what Mr. Bell and his companions inside the car saw or heard, lawyers said. "It's a twofold test," Kyle B. Watters, a criminal defense lawyer, said. "First you look at the subjective part: What does the officer believe from what he sees? Then you put against that, what would a reasonable person believe?"

Investigators will also look at the tactical plan for the unit on the night of the shooting, the official in the district attorney's office said.

When the grand jury gets the case, another question is if the officers will testify, and if so, what they will say.

Philip E. Karasyk, the lawyer representing the undercover detective who fired the first shots, and whose name has not been publicly disclosed, said that he intended to have his client speak voluntarily to the prosecutors, and testify without immunity to the grand jury because he wanted the panel members to hear the man's story from his own mouth.

"I want people to understand exactly what he was experiencing and why he did what he did," Mr. Karasyk said. "There is no better way to know what was going in someone's mind than to have them get up there and tell you. Then they can judge his credibility. I want him to put the grand jurors in his shoes and to recreate what he was experiencing at the time, because, unless you've been there, you have no idea what it's like."

Stephen L. Worth, the lawyer for Michael Carey, a white backup officer who fired three times, said that his client had not yet decided whether to testify before the grand jury. "We're keeping our options open," Mr. Worth said. "The truth is the truth, and it's really a matter of when it will come out. It may be at the grand jury. It may be talking to investigators."

Presumed Guilty (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

The death of Sean Bell at the hands of undercover police officers, who also wounded his two companions in their 50-shot barrage in Queens nine days ago, brought to mind a case from a few years back in which undercover cops, acting on bogus information, attacked an innocent group of young people in a car in Manhattan.

The cops in the Manhattan case assumed that the people in the car were lowlifes. They were all Ivy League graduates, and one is currently clerking for U.S. Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens.

The incident occurred about 11:30 p.m. on Jan. 10, 2000. Two men and two women who were running their own startup Internet company, MagicBeanStalk.com, were parked outside a subway station on East 14th Street, near Union Square. Without any warning, a plainclothes officer leaped out of a yellow cab with his gun drawn and rushed the car with the four young people in it.

Thinking he was being carjacked, the driver put the vehicle in reverse and tried to get away. He was blocked by an unmarked police car that had pulled up behind him. He ended up hitting both the unmarked car and the cab (which was also a police vehicle) in his unsuccessful effort to flee.

The driver, Jason Rowley, who was 25 at the time, had no idea that the man with the gun was a cop. "I thought he was going to shoot me," he said in an interview last week. "I was trying to get out of there."

The passenger in the front seat, Sheldon Gilbert, said, "We thought we were going to die, plain and simple."

The first cop was joined by two others, also in plain clothes. The officers apparently were enraged by Mr. Rowley's effort to get away. One smashed the window on the driver's side of the car and dragged Mr. Rowley through it, ripping his thumb in the process. Mr. Gilbert said his door was yanked open and he was punched in the face and then dragged from the car. The two men were then beaten.

The two women, Lauren Sudeall and Marie Claire Lim, were in the back seat, completely terrified. They were taken from the car at gunpoint and handcuffed. All four occupants were arrested.

It turned out that the cops were acting on a mistaken computer report that Mr. Rowley's car was stolen. As frightening as the incident was, the four people in the car were lucky that none of the cops opened fire. "I spent that night in jail," said Mr. Rowley, "and a lot of the officers told me that if this had been elsewhere — for example, if this has been in the Bronx or Harlem — I'd have been dead."

As the case was processed, the police learned that the car indeed belonged to Mr. Rowley, that all four occupants had recently graduated from college (Mr. Rowley from Brown and the others from Yale), that Ms. Sudeall was carrying an acceptance letter from Harvard Law School, and that they had all been coming home from a long day's work at their company. None of that protected them from being treated by the police like trash.

Mr. Rowley and Mr. Gilbert are black. Ms. Sudeall is of mixed parentage, black and white, and Ms. Lim is from the Philippines. The officers who rushed their car were white.

Jonathan Abady, a lawyer who represented the four in a subsequent lawsuit (which the city settled), believes that the race of the victims in that case and in the Sean Bell case — in which some of the cops were black — was a major factor in the way the police behaved.

"Our case was a classic example of disproportionate force being used against entirely innocent civilians," he said. "It was an example of egregiously overaggressive police conduct that I think ultimately is based on stereotypes and perceptions. This case and the shooting of Sean Bell are examples of a very ignominious history of the police taking certain liberties, essentially in communities of color. It's hard to believe that they would have fired 50 shots into a vehicle on Park Avenue and 57th Street in Manhattan."

The four people who were in the car in the Manhattan incident have since done extremely well. Ms. Sudeall, for example, graduated from law school and is now a clerk for Justice Stevens. Mr. Gilbert has established a new Internet venture based on a program he invented that predicts people's buying patterns online. It's very creepy to think how easily one or more of the four could have been killed in their encounter with the police.

As Ms. Sudeall said yesterday, "It seems like it's inviting disaster to be not in uniform, not showing identification and attacking people who may or may not have done anything wrong."

As Md. Court Weighs Same-Sex Marriage, Plaintiffs Hear Echoes Of Previous Fight (WP)

By Mary Otto

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Those days in Alabama are seared into Charles Blackburn's memories: the bombings, a friend's death by bludgeoning, the marches and prayers for deliverance.

He went to Huntsville in 1964 with a wife and a small daughter, a new minister bent on helping to turn back centuries of injustice. A sheriff locked him in a foul jail cell for trying to register black voters. Vandals smashed the windows of his church when he joined marchers in Selma. In the years since, the prophecies of the civil rights movement have continued to unfold.

And with them has Blackburn's journey of self-acceptance. Over time, he would leave the ministry and his marriage, and come to terms with the fact that he is gay.

Blackburn has resumed his march for civil rights, this time beside his partner of 28 years, Glen Dehn, and 17 other gay and lesbian plaintiffs in a lawsuit asking Maryland to legalize same-sex marriage. "It is self-affirming to be part of this civil rights continuum," said Blackburn, 73.

Today, the case goes before Maryland's highest court, where lawyers will debate whether a 33-year-old law defining marriage as between a man and a woman violates constitutional protections against discrimination. The court is not expected to rule immediately.

In January, a Baltimore Circuit Court judge ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, finding that the state's definition of marriage was discriminatory and could not withstand a constitutional challenge.

"When tradition is the guise under which prejudice or animosity hides, it is not a legitimate state interest," wrote Judge M. Brooke Murdock in a 20-page opinion.

The state appealed Murdock's decision and will argue at today's hearing that the law meets constitutional muster and that questions concerning the definition of marriage would be better handled by the state legislature.

Del. Donald H. Dwyer Jr. (R-Anne Arundel) said he is planning to resubmit a constitutional amendment for voter approval that would effectively ban same-sex marriage.

"If the state of Maryland legalizes same-sex marriage," he said, "there will be nothing to prevent it from being taught in the public schools as a normal sexual lifestyle."

DOJ_NMG_0101711

Historically, the federal government has allowed states to define marriage. For years, Maryland banned interracial marriage. In 1973, it defined marriage as the union of one man and one woman. Currently, only Massachusetts recognizes same-sex marriage, but several states and the District allow domestic partnerships or civil unions that offer some of the rights of marriage.

Meanwhile, many other states, including Virginia, have passed laws banning same-sex marriage.

In Maryland, Blackburn, Dehn and the other plaintiffs who have applied for and been denied marriage licenses throughout the state say they are not asking for the creation of a new right, just the chance to share in one that has been fundamental for heterosexuals.

Blackburn compares this suit for real marriage -- as opposed to some form of civil union -- as akin to breaking down segregation in the nation's schools.

"The schools could not be separate without being inherently unequal," said the veteran civil rights campaigner, sitting in the home he and Dehn have carefully restored in Baltimore's Bolton Hill neighborhood.

He acknowledged that some people become angry when gay men and lesbians liken their struggle for equality to that of blacks. Blackburn was listening to a radio talk show on gay rights recently when a caller complained about such comparisons.

"I'm black every day of my life. They can hide," the caller said.

"But why should 'they' have to?" Blackburn asked in response. "We're not saying we've suffered as long, or as much. But we have rights that need to be defended."

The way Blackburn sees it, a person compelled to live in a closet of secrecy also suffers the effects of segregation. "The closet is a very fearful place, a very lonely place. You are living a lie," he says. "It eats you up inside."

In addition to the intangible benefits, marriage also confers such rights as spousal immigration benefits, hospital visitation privileges and the right to inherit property. Among the plaintiffs is a lesbian couple forced to live separately because of immigration law. After another plaintiff lost his longtime partner to suicide, he also lost the home they had shared. Others in the suit have been denied the ability to extend insurance coverage to their partners and children.

More than 15,000 same-sex couples live in Maryland, and between a quarter and a third of them are raising children, according to the Baltimore-based Advocates for Children and Youth.

As they have grown older together, Blackburn and Dehn have gotten specialized help in estate planning. But they are still haunted by concerns about issues such as medical decision making or being separated in a nursing home.

"We have heard of this happening to two old guys at the very end," Blackburn said.

Attorneys for the state are not speaking about their case until after today's oral arguments. But in briefs filed in November, they laid out their case.

"No appellate court in the country has declared a right to same-sex marriage to be fundamental," the state argues, pointing to recent decisions in New Jersey and California that emphasize the importance of state legislatures in helping to resolve the matter.

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled in October that the state constitution guarantees same-sex couples the same rights as opposite-sex couples. However, a four-justice majority of the court left it to the state legislature to decide whether same-sex unions should be known as marriage or given some other name.

Also in October, a California appeals court ruled the state's ban on such marriages did not violate the state constitution and pointed to the state's domestic partnership law to counter claims of discrimination.

"The legislative forum is the most appropriate to address the issue of same-sex marriage and extension of benefit to same-sex families," attorneys for the state of Maryland argue in their brief.

Dwyer, an outspoken critic of same-sex marriage, agrees.

"The legislature in Maryland must deal with this issue," he said. Last year he unsuccessfully pushed the "Marriage Protection Act," which would amend the state constitution to prohibit same-sex marriages and civil unions. He plans to take up the cause in the session that begins next month.

In 2001, Maryland passed a law banning discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. And in 2005, the legislature created a life partnership for medical decision making and authorized an exemption from recordation and transfer taxes for domestic partners. Both bills were vetoed by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) as undermining "the sanctity of traditional marriage."

That's why, said David Rocah, an ACLU lawyer for the plaintiffs, "You resort to the courts."

Religious Liberty Group Takes Up 'Marriage' Case (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101712

A national religious-freedom group has chosen the same-sex "marriage" case to be argued today in Maryland's highest court to file its first legal argument.

The Beckett Fund, a nonprofit legal group supporting religious freedoms, argues that legalized same-sex "marriage" could result in civil suits against churches that refuse to marry same-sex couples or refuse to hire homosexual employees.

"It's such a controversial issue that we weren't going to move until we were certain the threats were real and pervasive," said Roger T. Severino, a lawyer with the District-based group. "And now we are confident they are."

The group also says the government might strip such churches of their tax-exempt status and of their power to license marriages.

The case before the Maryland Court of Appeals comes from a lower court ruling in January, in which a judge decided a 1973 statute defining marriage as between a man and woman violated the state constitution. The ruling by Baltimore Circuit Judge M. Brooke Murdock was stayed until the appeals court could hear the case. The appeals court ruling is expected in the coming weeks.

The Becket Fund -- which has defended Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus, Jews and Protestant Christians in the United States and abroad -- filed one of nearly two dozen "friend of the court" -- or amicus curiae -- briefs in the closely watched case.

The court may consider arguments presented in such briefs, but is not required to do so.

An attorney for the 19 plaintiffs, who filed their lawsuit in 2004, called Mr. Severino's claim a "false alarm bell."

"There are sometimes tensions between religious liberty and nondiscrimination mandates," said Kenneth Y. Choe, an attorney for the plaintiffs and the American Civil Liberties Union's lesbian and gay rights project. "Regardless of what happens in this lawsuit, that tension already exists, and there exists a legal framework for how to resolve it."

Mr. Severino disagrees, saying the existing definition of marriage as between one man and one woman pervades the law of the land.

"The issue is so fundamental it's almost hard to see the intricate web of connections that marriage has with religious liberty and the thousands of government regulations that affect religious institutions," Mr. Severino said.

Churches or pastors also could be penalized for teaching sacred texts that state homosexuality is a sin, the Becket brief states.

Dan Furmansky, executive director of the Equality Maryland lobbying group, said churches would not be sued or prosecuted for refusing to "marry" homosexuals.

"We're not talking about forcing clergy to recognize marriages they don't want to," he said. "Of course there is a vast body of clergy that won't provide weddings for same-sex couples, and that's fine."

The Becket brief cites a Colorado woman's 2002 suit against the Episcopal Church that fired her on scriptural grounds for practicing homosexuality. The suit was unsuccessful, but was offered as proof that churches that take action based on their holy texts will face lawsuits.

"It will be ultimately up to the courts as to whether or not they will respect the First Amendment and protect religious liberty when it comes in conflict with gay rights," Mr. Severino said.

"But recent precedents don't give us a high level of comfort."

The Becket Fund also pointed to a Swedish pastor who was imprisoned for one month after he preached that homosexuality is sinful, though the country's highest court overturned his conviction.

One year ago, the Becket Fund held a conference in which scholars for and against same-sex "marriage" concluded that legalizing the practice would put it on a "collision course" with religious liberties.

Chai R. Feldblum, a law professor at Georgetown University who called herself "part of an inner group of public intellectual movement leaders committed to advancing [homosexual] equality in this country," took part and wrote a paper for the conference.

"We are in a zero-sum game," she wrote. "A gain for one side necessarily entails a corresponding loss for the other side."

Voters in 27 states, including seven in the most recent election, have voted to define marriage in their state constitutions as between a man and a woman only. In November, Arizona became the first state in which residents voted against a ban on same-sex "marriage."

In July, five state courts and one federal court issued rulings that upheld traditional marriage laws similar to those in Maryland.

To date, the only state to legalize same-sex "marriage" is Massachusetts by court fiat. After Maryland, pending right-to-"marry" lawsuits remain in California, Connecticut and Iowa.

The Becket Fund is filing briefs in all of the remaining cases.

What's Wrong With My Voting Machine? (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0101713

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

To the long list of recent Election Day horrors from butterfly ballots to six-hour lines, add "vote flipping."

In Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey and other states last month, there were reports — some confirmed by election officials — that when voters touched the screen for one candidate, the machine registered it for another. One Florida Congressional race, in which the Republican won by fewer than 400 votes, is in the courts because paperless electronic voting machines may have failed to register as many as 18,000 votes.

This year's election had voters across the country once again asking why voting machines are so lousy. Their technology is similar to A.T.M. technology, but when was the last time your A.T.M. flipped a $200 withdrawal into a $200 deposit?

Voting machines, unlike home electronics, are not sold in a competitive consumer market, which is ruthlessly unforgiving of low quality. The officials who buy them generally do not know much about technology. They listen to sales pitches from vendors who relentlessly push the most expensive models. Sometimes, well-connected lobbyists apply pressure. The process is rife with conflicts of interest, from free meals to future jobs with the manufacturers.

Since quality is not the deciding factor, it's not surprising there isn't a lot of it.

Voters who complain about their own machines don't often get a chance to compare them with other options. But New York's boards of elections are replacing the old lever machines, and I recently went to demonstrations the city held to allow the public to try out the five finalists.

There are many important things about a voting machine you can't tell from a quick inspection. But what was clear was almost all disturbing. Here are the ratings:

Avante Touch-Screen (no stars)

This is one of two A.T.M.-like touch-screen machines in the running. Even if they were reliable, touch-screens would not be practical for populous areas. Configured to hold New York's ridiculously large ballot, this five-foot-wide, 280-pound machine is so expensive, at about $8,000, that there might be only one per polling place, and lines could extend for hours. One machine I sampled cut off parts of words. And the bottom half of the name of one of the political parties was missing. A bigger problem is that this machine appears to run afoul of a New York law requiring that all voting machine computer code be given to the state. It runs on Windows, and Microsoft keeps its code secret.

Sequoia Touch-Screen (no stars)

Like the Avante, this machine should be ruled out simply because it is a touch-screen. But there is a lot more to dislike. The paper records produced by a voting machine should be secured in a lockbox. On this one, they fall into a small bag that could easily be snatched. Not that a thief would need to bother. The bag has a zipper on the bottom. Like Avante's, this touch-screen runs on Windows, which probably means it cannot satisfy New York's code-sharing law.

Sequoia Optical Scan (no stars)

With optical scans, many voters can fill out paper ballots at the same time. They are then fed into an optical scan reader, which goes very quickly. Unfortunately, this machine has other problems. Instead of blackening an oval next to their choice, voters connect a broken arrow. I have filled in thousands of ovals, but I had never before connected a broken arrow. As we saw with the butterfly ballot in 2000, the voting machine is not a good place to ask voters to acquire new skills. New York law requires that candidates of the same party be listed in a single column, to make it easier to vote by party. This machine scatters candidates of the same party all over the ballot.

Diebold Optical Scan ?

When I fed my ballot into this machine, it jammed twice. The sales representative expressed shock, but this is a frequently heard complaint. Even a balky optical scan is better than a touch-screen, but how hard is it to make one that doesn't jam?

Diebold has been the most infamous name in elections since its chief executive wrote that he was committed to helping deliver Ohio to President Bush, in an election in which his machines were counting the votes. The company has a long list of misdeeds, including installing unapproved and uncertified software in California.

ES&S Optical Scan ?½

This seemed like the best of the five machines on display, but that wasn't saying much. ES&S machines were used in Florida's 13th Congressional District, where they are still looking for the 18,000 votes that may have gone missing.

New York's official testing agencies notified election officials last week that none of these five machines fully meet the state's standards. New York has been the slowest state to adopt new voting machines, and the fact that the manufacturers were displaying products that still did not comply with state law says a lot about the basic level of competence in the industry.

No one in New York has much patience for more delay. But if it comes down to waiting longer or sticking voters with illegal or unreliable machines that will undermine democracy for years to come, officials should wait, and insist on better machines. New Yorkers, and all Americans, deserve better choices than the voting machine industry is offering.

ANTITRUST:

US Air, Delta Launch PR Battle (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, December 4, 2006

Delta Air Lines' creditors and a bankruptcy judge will decide whether US Airways buys Delta, but that isn't stopping both airlines from battling for public opinion.

Both airlines have hired big names in the financial public relations business to help shape the views of Wall Street analysts, airline employees and airline customers as well as the creditors and judges. US Airways hired New York communications firm Joele Frank, Wilkinson Brimmer Katcher. Delta is using Kekst and Co., a large New York financial PR firm with longstanding ties to the airline.

In a surprise announcement Nov. 15, US Airways publicly offered Delta's bankruptcy creditors $8 billion in stock and cash for Delta, which is in Chapter 11. Delta's management has rebuffed the offer.

The unveiling was well-orchestrated. That morning, US Airways' PR team, along with a team from Joele Frank, placed predawn phone calls to dozens of reporters and Wall Street analysts to alert them to an 8:15 a.m. conference call with CEO Doug Parker.

A new electronic newsletter, For the Record, now spins every small development in the pending deal in the most favorable light to US Airways.

"They do aggressive financial PR, and they are very good at it," US Airways Senior Vice President Elise Eberwein said of the Joele Frank firm. Frank could not be reached.

Meanwhile, Delta bought a full-page advertisement opposing the merger in its hometown newspaper, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. And at the urging of its own employees, Delta ordered and distributed 50,000 red "Keep Delta My Delta" lapel buttons. US Airways has scheduled meetings with influential newspaper editorial boards.

Experts on the PR industry say it's common in hostile takeovers for the pursuer and pursued to hire specialized PR firms. PR Week reporter Hamilton Nolan says the firms know their audiences, and the stakes.

"They ask: 'What's the message to the creditors, to the media, to analysts, to customers, to shareholders?' All those groups get targeted messages."

Not all PR is for public consumption, however. Right after last month's announcement, Delta placed countless private phone calls to its unsecured creditors to argue that a merger would be risky and that Delta is better off alone.

The takeover fight between Delta and US Airways won't be over anytime soon. Delta hopes to show creditors its business plan as a stand-alone airline later this month.

Michael Freitag, the Kekst partner overseeing the Delta account, says financial PR is a long-term project. Delta's efforts to win support from all its crucial constituents "is a marathon, not a sprint."

Steering A New Course Through The Skies (MINNST)

By Liz Fedor, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 4, 2006

Airline mergers could face tough scrutiny in Congress as U.S. Rep. James Oberstar takes over a key House committee.

U.S. Rep. James Oberstar intends to take a hard look at potential airline mergers in the coming months because he knows that fusing two carriers together often causes pain for employees and hurts some consumers.

The Minnesota Democrat already is scrutinizing the proposed US Airways-Delta merger.

Next month, Oberstar will assume the chairmanship of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, where he will be well-positioned to raise concerns in the event that a wave of consolidation sweeps the airline industry next year, as some observers predict.

While airlines don't need congressional approval to merge, Oberstar's post gives him the ability to spotlight antitrust issues that the Justice Department is legally obliged to examine.

"People are saying there is overcapacity" and that some seats should be removed from the market, Oberstar said. But he sees carriers flying with many full planes and argues "there is a lack of substantial competition" on many routes.

Oberstar, who was reelected to a 17th House term last month, gave his assessment of the state of the airline industry and talked about his oversight role during an interview last week with the Star Tribune.

The only member of the Minnesota delegation who was serving in Congress when the airline industry was deregulated in 1978, he sees that move as a success.

DOJ_NMG_0101715

"There's no question about the success of deregulation," Oberstar said. "It has created seamless travel, more nonstops, more destinations, more opportunities." By taking the government out of the pricing business, consumers are saving about $6.5 billion a year on fares, he argued.

"So when mergers and acquisitions and leveraged buyouts are considered," Oberstar said, "my first thought is: Is the result going to be undoing the consumer benefits of deregulation?"

The latest round of merger speculation began Nov. 15, when US Airways CEO Doug Parker made a hostile move to acquire bankrupt Delta Air Lines. On Thursday, US Airways executives had their first meeting with Delta's creditors committee in an attempt to win their support for the deal.

"US Airways has hardly digested the merger with America West," Oberstar said, referring to the lingering labor and operational issues from the combination of those two carriers in the fall of 2005.

US Airways and Delta now compete on about 155 domestic routes, and Oberstar said he has directed his staff to examine the impact of a merger on those routes.

"What does this do in markets where the two carriers are now competing? Who are the other competitors in those markets? Will some cities lose out? Will travelers [end up] paying higher fares? Those are the questions that I think have to be evaluated before you can make a judgment on whether this proposed merger would be in the overall best public interest," Oberstar said.

Eagan-based Northwest Airlines also is considered a merger candidate, with Continental and American considered as potential partners -- or Delta, if the deal with US Airways doesn't happen.

After current Northwest board chairman Gary Wilson and businessman Al Checchi led a leveraged buyout of Northwest in 1989, Oberstar said they spent a lot of time and money examining possible mergers. Ultimately, he said, Northwest chose instead to pursue code-sharing agreements with carriers such as Continental. Those alliances allow passengers to travel on two airlines for a single trip, but gain the ticketing and baggage-handling convenience of flying on one.

Northwest's last merger was 20 years ago when it combined with Republic Airlines, and Oberstar said he saw a "clash of cultures," which is typical of any merger.

In the days after the merger, Oberstar said, "I'd stop and ask station managers how things were going, and they'd whisper, 'I am a Republic guy and Northwest is a long-haul [airline]. We are a short-haul [airline]. They don't understand how to do things.' "

Oberstar did not say which airline he believes might emerge as the most likely merger partner for Northwest, but he did indicate that he sees the Eagan-based company facing stiffer competition to expand U.S. flights to China. Specifically, he doesn't believe that the U.S. Department of Transportation will grant Northwest authority for a hotly contested new route to China.

There is a four-way competition for the China route, and Northwest has proposed that it be between Detroit and Shanghai. Oberstar categorized Northwest and Continental as "second-tier players" in the competition.

"From the standpoint of competition, it might be a better decision by DOT to award service to American [Dallas to Beijing], provided their service will challenge United," Oberstar said. By mid-December, he intends to make a recommendation to the department, and he said that he will likely suggest the route go to American or United.

Oberstar said he has talked often this year with Northwest and Mesaba Airlines employees as they've faced big concessions, which he said have "left very deep resentment." Now, he said, it is "incumbent upon management at Northwest and Mesaba" to sit down with their employees "and win their trust."

Edgars Consolidated Stores Ltd. of South Africa is in talks with Blackstone Group, Bain Capital and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. on a potential $3 billion deal that would be the largest private-equity buyout in that country, according to people familiar with the situation.

The emergence of the largest U.S. private-equity firms as possible buyers of one of South Africa's biggest retail groups illustrates how the booming sector is scouring further afield to deploy the billions in cash raised in recent years.

Edgars Consolidated Stores, known as Edcon, said in October that it was approached by private-equity firms interested in acquiring the fashion chain, which has more than 900 stores in South Africa, Botswana, Namibia, Swaziland and Lesotho. Founded in 1929, the Johannesburg company has more than 20,000 employees and a market value of about 19 billion rand ($2.6 billion).

DOJ_NMG_0101716

Some of the U.S. firms working on a potential acquisition may make a combined bid, but final decisions haven't been made, the people close to the matter said. The company has asked for firm proposals to be made in January, they said.

Edcon couldn't be reached for comment, nor could representatives from the private-equity firms.

Edcon would be the latest in a string of potential private-equity takeovers in South Africa. Financial-service provider Alexander Forbes Ltd. received a bid by a group of investors led by Actis Capital LLP, and grocery chain Shoprite Holdings Ltd. has drawn potential private-equity bids.

After raising record sums from public pension plans, university endowments, insurance companies and wealthy individuals, private-equity firms have been pursuing ever-larger deals in the U.S. and Europe. But as the amount of money they manage swells, they are looking to new economies in Asia and Africa to acquire large businesses.

In addition to the South African targets, the world's largest private-equity firms have been attempting big deals in Australia and are venturing into China and elsewhere. Private-equity firms are partnerships that use investors' money and large amounts of borrowed money to buy companies, improve them and sell them again, typically in about three years.

Earlier this year, Edcon competed in an auction to purchase the Myer department-store chain in Australia from Coles Myer Ltd. but lost to Texas Pacific Group and one of its affiliates.

Bush Mulls Resumed Energy Drilling Off Alaska (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — President Bush is considering whether to lift the 17-year-old moratorium on energy drilling in the waters off southwestern Alaska, a White House spokeswoman said Sunday, which would allow oil and gas companies to try to tap into more than five trillion cubic feet of natural gas that lies beneath rich fishing grounds.

The push to market oil and gas leases in these waters, which oil and gas companies favor, is part of a larger national effort to expand domestic supplies of fossil fuel by opening up areas of the outer continental shelf, long off-limits to energy development.

Last summer the Interior Department recommended reopening several areas of the outer continental shelf, including the southern part of Bristol Bay, which lies just north of where the Aleutian Islands meet the Alaskan mainland, to energy exploration. The report said that 14 oil and gas companies had supported the idea. The department has estimated that such a move could create up to 11,500 jobs, part of what it describes as “net benefits” of $7.7 billion.

In a letter to President Bush on Friday, a coalition of environmental groups, including the Wilderness Society, the Sierra Club and the Natural Resources Defense Counsel, citing the impact of the Exxon Valdez oil spill, called the bay “an economically critical salmon fishery,” adding that “it provides essential habitat for the endangered northern right whale.”

The executive director of Greenpeace, John Passacantando, said Sunday that the Bering Sea was “the most intact marine ecosystem in United States waters” and that Bristol Bay was “among the most important parts of the Bering Sea.”

Asked about the potential impact of an outer continental shelf leasing program confined to the southern waters of the bay, Mr. Passacantando said: “The energy industry ultimately gives you things that look like the Exxon Valdez. It was because of the threat of this kind of spill that that leases were initially rescinded.”

He was referring to a handful of oil leases that were granted in the southern part of Bristol Bay in 1988, then bought back by the federal government after the Exxon Valdez supertanker, with a captain who had been drinking, ran aground on Bligh Reef in March 1989. The tanker ruptured and spilled 11 million gallons of crude oil into the sound.

The Alaska Economic Development Commission has supported opening the area to expand economic diversification, and has concluded that the impact on marine life can be “fully mitigated,” the Interior Department reported.

When Congress, acting at the urging of Alaska’s senior senator, Ted Stevens, a Republican, rescinded its protections for Bristol Bay in 2003, the area remained protected by earlier presidential decisions, first by President George Bush in 1991 and then, in 1998, by President Bill Clinton, who put the area off-limits to energy leasing until 2012.

There has been widespread speculation among environmental groups and fishing industry representatives that President Bush would end the moratorium during the lame-duck session of Congress, allowing the Interior Department to proceed with its plans to market oil and gas leases in the southern section of the bay, along the north coast of the Aleutian Islands.

The Associated Press reported over the weekend that the administration was considering ending the moratorium, a report that was confirmed by a White House spokeswoman, Emily Lawrimore. She would not comment on the merits of the debate but said the president was considering whether to end the leasing moratorium.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, said in a statement Sunday that "executive withdrawal on oil and gas leasing in Alaska's Bristol Bay, one of our nation's most sensitive fisheries, combined with House Republicans scheduling a vote next week to expand offshore drilling off Florida's coast, only underscores that G.O.P. stands for Gas and Oil Party."

Mr. Markey added, "The administration should be leading efforts to increase fuel economy standards, which would dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil."

An Important First Step (WT)

By Newt Gingrich

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

In the remaining days of its lame-duck session, the House should adopt Sen. Pete Domenici and Sen. Mary Landrieu's narrowly drawn bill to expand Gulf Coast oil and gas production. If adopted, it would give the Gulf states a greater share of oil revenues to rebuild and restore the vanishing coastline. The Domenici-Landrieu bill is a good first step toward a process in which other states could apply for permission to develop new offshore oil and gas reserves in exchange for a share of the revenues.

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita decimated the Gulf Coast, and after federally built flood-control systems failed, flood waters ravaged the city of New Orleans and the surrounding region. But the levees were not the only system that failed. Mismanagement and neglect over the last half century have contributed to the serious erosion of the coastal wetlands, the first line of defense against such devastating hurricanes. The wetlands and barrier islands act as a natural sponge to soak up storm surges but are disappearing at the rate of 25 square miles a year. Hurricanes Rita and Katrina are estimated to have lapped up an additional 217 square miles with 1,900 square miles already lost. The effects of this ecological disaster cost us thousands of lives and hundreds of billions of dollars, too high a price to ever be paid again.

Meanwhile, it has become abundantly clear that America's dependence on foreign oil is dangerous. We must seek out new energy sources in the near and long term. Our offshore petroleum reserves hold great promise for the near term as we pursue longer-term solutions in alternative renewable technologies.

Congress must act to provide the infrastructure necessary to prevent a Katrina-scale disaster from ever reoccurring along the Gulf Coast while providing for our growing energy needs.

The Domenici-Landrieu Bill -- "The Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act" (S. 3711) -- has the endorsement of both the Democratic and Republican Senate Leadership but is being held up in the House. House Republicans are pushing for a much stronger bill that would open the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to drilling but has no chance of passing the Senate.

The Senate bill expands current offshore drilling by 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico and shares the revenues from that new production with the four states (Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama) that the drilling would affect. The federal government would still get 50 percent of the royalties accrued from the new production while 37.5 percent of money will go directly to the four coastal states for restoration of the disappearing wetlands, and infrastructure projects aimed at flood control and hurricane protection. The remaining 12.5 percent would go toward the joint state and federal Land and Water Conservation Fund projects to benefit all 50 states.

The Domenici-Landrieu bill also gives the coastal states a fairer deal on offshore drilling. Under current law, revenues from land-based drilling -- even on federal land -- are split evenly between the states and federal government to compensate the states for the use of state infrastructure that contributes to oil production. These revenue-sharing provisions currently exclude offshore drilling and allocate zero revenue to the states. Revenue sharing under the Domenici-Landrieu bill would not cut into current federal revenues as the revenue-sharing provisions apply only to new production.

The fairness embodied in this bill should be expanded beyond just the Gulf Coast states. Congress should open up the revenue sharing option to all states without removing the blanket federal moratorium on new offshore development. With the prospect of new revenue streams as a powerful incentive, states could then apply to Congress for permission to drill offshore. This reasonable compromise would still give Congress the final say over any offshore expansion while opening the door to future offshore production.

Instead of holding out for an impossible bill, the House Republicans would be wise to see the Senate bill as an important first step toward energy self-sufficiency through expanded offshore oil and gas production, disaster prevention and ecological restoration. Completing this in the next few weeks is an important step in the right direction.

White House Opens Up Energy Agenda (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101718

WASHINGTON -- Facing increased political pressure on environmental policy at home and abroad, the Bush administration is signaling new interest in promoting alternative energies and curbing greenhouse gases.

As part of President Bush's energy agenda for the rest of his term, administration officials may push U.S. auto makers to make more vehicles that can run on ethanol and other alternative fuels. To boost availability, they are also considering a call to cut tariffs on imported ethanol.

White House aides are also suggesting new openness to global-warming solutions, including the broad emissions limits they have resisted so far. The ultimate aim is to begin piecing together a framework to replace the Kyoto accord after it expires in 2012.

"Would we support a one-size-fits-all, economy-wide mandate? Presently it's not feasible or necessary," White House environmental adviser James Connaughton said in an interview. "But it's not off the table" post-2012, he added. While Mr. Bush's presidency ends in early 2009, he can influence negotiations under way for the next global climate-change treaty.

Environmental issues have gained urgency since Democrats won control of both the House and Senate in last month's elections. While many congressional Republicans shared Mr. Bush's skepticism toward environmental regulations, Congress's new Democratic leaders are more likely to push for action, particularly on climate change.

After the election, George Banks, a senior aide to Mr. Connaughton, sent an email to a top aide of Sen. Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, congratulating Ms. Boxer on the election, which elevated her to chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee. Mr. Banks added that he would like to meet to discuss climate change. Ms. Boxer called the overture an encouraging sign, after years of White House indifference.

Foreign leaders also are stepping up calls for Mr. Bush to move on the issue. Germany is trying to restart international talks on climate change in its role as host of the 2007 annual summer summit of the Group of Eight industrial powers. The White House has indicated a willingness to explore the idea, according to German officials. The U.S. response has been a "major step forward," says the German official in charge, Bernd Pfaffenbach. "We are going to explore whether it's possible to find a post-2012 formulation," he added.

Meanwhile, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has taken an active interest in energy and environmental policy, having been an advocate for curbing carbon emissions in his previous job as Goldman Sachs Group Inc.'s chief executive.

While Mr. Paulson hasn't spoken publicly about the issue since taking office in July, he is part of a group of administration officials looking at ways to reduce dependence on foreign oil and stimulate the market in the U.S. for alternative energy. The group is expected to present ideas to Mr. Bush in the next few weeks. Among the options: lifting tariffs on imported ethanol and providing more subsidies for those who make and sell alternative fuel.

Mr. Paulson also is intent on bringing China into future climate-change solutions, and plans to make greenhouse gases a focus of his talks with Chinese leaders when visiting Beijing this month.

Many American skeptics of global treaties on the environment have said they are meaningless unless China and India can be persuaded to join the next round.

On the domestic front, the administration has been pressing U.S. auto makers to ramp up production of so-called flex-fuel vehicles that can run on either gasoline or alternative fuels such as ethanol or biodiesel. The CEOs of the Big Three manufacturers -- General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group -- pledged after a recent meeting with Mr. Bush to make 50% of their new vehicles capable of running on alternative fuel by 2012. But they said they want assurances of adequate "incentives" for production of flex-fuel vehicles as well as for production and distribution of renewable fuels.

At the same time, the administration is pursuing a strategy of encouraging technological innovation -- instead of regulation and mandated caps -- to reduce overall carbon-dioxide emissions. Last week, administration officials announced the awarding of $1 billion in tax credits to nine companies to develop cleaner coal-burning power plants around the U.S.

But Mr. Connaughton, in the interview, suggested that the administration is weighing other strategies, possibly including tougher mandates, for after 2012, when the Kyoto accord expires. The Bush administration rejected the 1997 Kyoto accord in 2001, viewing its limits on carbon-dioxide emissions as a recipe for economic disaster.

Now, Mr. Connaughton said, even carbon mandates aren't out of the question. "Everyone is looking at what's achievable beyond 2012," he added, and the U.S. must "calibrate its policy to the science" on global warming.

Any new U.S. framework is unlikely to "replicate the mistakes of Kyoto," Mr. Connaughton said. But "as for the shape of what the future looks like, there are lots of ideas swirling around." Critics say the Kyoto accord was too ambitious in seeking to hold carbon-dioxide emissions below 1990 levels before technology was available, and also because it excluded rapidly developing economies such as China and India.

Some Democrats remain skeptical of the administration's interest in climate change and say they don't expect major progress on things like fuel efficiency or greenhouse-gas emissions.

"Recently, the administration has begun to change its rhetoric on global warning and climate change, but given their history it's easy to suspect that only their rhetoric is changing," said Rep. Henry Waxman, a Democrat from California and incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee.

Greener, Cleaner ... And Competitive? (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

The last time renewable-energy entrepreneurs were this gung-ho, in the early 1980s, subsidies - not sales - buoyed their business plans. This time may be different. For example:

· So many utility customers signed up for the "GreenChoice" program in Austin, Texas, that the city organized a raffle to decide who would get the last 1,400 slots. The reason: The program's wind-powered electricity was actually cheaper to generate than traditional power.

· Midwestern ethanol plants this summer were producing renewable fuel at a cost of $1.27 a gallon or less, making it competitive with gasoline even without tax subsidies, notes Vernon Eidman, a University of Minnesota professor of agricultural economics.

· A recent study by the RAND Corp. shows the nation's economy would be likely to benefit, rather than be slowed, if the nation achieved the goal of supplying 25 percent of its energy needs from renewable sources by 2025.

While most renewable fuels can't yet compete with their traditional counterparts, their costs of production are falling steadily. If the trend continues, America's energy mix by 2025 could be far greener and cleaner - without damaging the economy - than most analysts could have antici-pated a few years ago.

That development would not only reduce the nation's dependence on oil, it would mean a substantial start on capping its greenhouse-gas emissions, which most scientists link to global warming. And such a move, if the RAND analysis proves correct, would come at little or no cost to the economy.

"At this point, the lines haven't crossed yet where renewables are cheaper than coal power," says Jonathan Naimon, managing director of Light Green Advisors, an institutional money manager focused on environmental investing. "But we do see a lot of opportunity as this process of renewable power getting steadily cheaper continues.... There have been reports over the years saying the long-term costs of renewables are cheaper than fossil simply because you don't pay for fuel." New findings, new hope for renewables

The RAND Corp. report - issued in November - estimated that if the cost to produce renewable energy continued to fall at its current rate, renewables could provide 25 percent of the nation's power by 2025 at no additional cost to the economy and perhaps even save money.

If current trends continue, for example, renewable energy will be 20 percent less expensive to produce in 20 years. But the study, which examined 1,500 scenarios, goes further. If renewable costs fell at a faster rate, the nation could save $30 billion in energy costs by 2025, the report found. Even if renewable-energy costs grew slightly and oil prices fell further than expected, any negative economic drag on the economy would be slight, the study concluded.

Beyond the economics, such a shift would have a big impact on US emissions of greenhouse gases, eliminating 1 billion tons of carbon emissions - about one-seventh of total US emissions - by 2025. The US "can achieve significant reductions in greenhouse-gas emissions without significant effects on energy expenditures," the study found.

Such studies are part of a growing body of research that indicates the cost of renewables may not be an economic drag after all.

"There is an emerging consensus that we need to enter a rapid transition to clean energy technology," Reid Detchon, executive director of the Energy Future Coalition, a nonprofit energy advocacy group that requested the RAND study. "For years there has been this myth of an expensive and painful transition. This report helps knock that down."

President Bush rejected the Kyoto climate accords because of projected high costs to the economy from capping carbon emissions and tapping alternative energy. Some US studies a few years ago estimated Kyoto's potential cost at $1 trillion to $2.5 trillion by 2010. Building consensus in the business world

Business is also warming to renewables.

"We've reached the same conclusion as this study and so have the capital markets," says energy expert Amory Lovins, who cites $63 billion in global investment in renewables this year. "Anybody who's paying attention to the cost performance of renewables will find many that compete quite nicely now."

For example, renewable power can play a key role in stabilizing energy prices.

DOJ_NMG_0101720

Having substantial wind power in a portfolio moderates rates during price swings in natural gas and coal, says Shimon Awerbuch, a British energy economist at the University of Sussex who has studied the moderating impact of wind power on electric rates.

Others agree. "No matter which way costs go as the shift to renewable energy occurs, we're not talking about a gigantic change in the energy bill for the country," says Michael Toman, director of environment, energy, and economic development program at RAND. "There's no reason to look at it as if the economy is going to grind to a screeching halt."

Inquiry Turns To Humans On Pollutant, Hormone Tie (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Growing evidence that chemicals in the environment can interfere with animals' hormone systems -- including the discovery that male Potomac River fish are growing eggs -- has focused the attention of environmentalists and scientists on a new question: Are humans also at risk?

A decade ago, the very idea that pollutants could interfere with a body's chemical messages was near the fringes of science. But now, it is an urgent topic for lawmakers and researchers around the world, and especially in the Washington area.

In recent years, researchers have linked some common chemicals to troubling changes in laboratory rodents and wild animals, including reproductive defects, immune-system alterations and obesity.

For now, no connections to human ailments have been proved. But some studies have provided hints that people might be affected by crossed hormones, and activists wonder if this kind of pollution could contribute to diabetes, birth defects and infertility.

"There's a lot of concern that a lot of chemicals to which we are exposed routinely, and without our knowledge, are interfering with the way hormones work," said R. Thomas Zoeller, a professor of biology at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

The Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments is planning to host a public forum about hormone-disrupting pollution this spring. U.S. Reps. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) have said they plan to press the Environmental Protection Agency about its failure to develop a program to test chemicals for hormonelike effects, as ordered by Congress in 1996.

The idea that natural hormone messages can be tampered with is not new; for decades, women using birth-control pills have been counting on a man-made chemical to do just that.

But the current concern is much wider: Some fear that modern chemistry might have unwittingly created other compounds with hormonelike effects and that they might have spread widely around the globe.

In the past few years, scientists working with animals have found potential problems with several pollutants, among them rocket-fuel components, pesticides and additives to soap. Among the most heavily researched:

Â· Phthalates, a family of additives used to make vinyl plastic flexible and prevent perfume from evaporating, have been linked to lower sperm counts and other sexual problems in male rats, as well as to heightened allergic reactions in the animals. Chemical industry officials have said that these tests used unrealistically high doses and that the results are not likely to translate to humans.

Â· Bisphenol A, used as a building block for hard plastic goods like bottles and as a resin to line food cans, has been connected in some experiments to abnormal sexual development in male lab rodents, as well as a predilection for obesity. Officials from the chemical and pesticide industries have vigorously criticized these results, saying that other studies have shown the chemical to be harmless.

Â· Treated sewage, which carries human estrogen and birth-control pill components excreted in waste, has been linked to "feminized" male fish in waters around the world. In the St. Lawrence River in Canada, a recent study found that a third of male minnows had female characteristics. Another example might be the Potomac, though the cause of its problems has not been officially pinpointed. The EPA and sewage-plant officials have said they are working on ways to better clean the wastewater.

The study of endocrine disruptors began in the late 1980s and early 1990s, with scientists struggling to add up such oddities as male birds with female organs in the Great Lakes and sexual defects in Florida alligators.

They eventually found that some chemicals were turning on hormone switches in the body's endocrine system that trigger biological processes. Others blocked the switches so natural hormones couldn't get through.

That revelation meant that a pollutant could be harmful even if it wasn't poisonous and didn't cause cancer. Even small doses could cause major damage, if they came at a key time when hormones were guiding pregnancy or early development.

DOJ_NMG_0101721

"We have to ask different questions," said John Peterson Myers, an activist and former scientist based in Charlottesville. He joined with scientist Theo Colborn and writer Dianne Dumanoski to write a book laying out their concerns, 1996's "Our Stolen Future."

Today, despite the wealth of studies in animals, the implications for human health are unclear. One of the most dramatic studies examined the sons of mothers whose bodies contained phthalates. It found no major birth defects but did show that the higher the phthalate level, the greater chance that the boys' bodies would show subtle signs of being "undermasculinized," according to researcher Shanna Swan, director of the Center for Reproductive Epidemiology at the University of Rochester.

Still, that falls well short of a smoking gun: Humans are not laboratory rats, so scientists say it is exceedingly hard to craft a study that shows a particular chemical caused a particular problem, and not genetics, diet or some other factor.

"They're nowhere near cause-and-effect," L. Earl Gray Jr., a senior research biologist at the EPA, said of human studies. "We're showing correlations and associations" between pollutants and human health effects, he said, but no indisputable sign that one causes the other.

Officials from the chemical and pesticide industries have vigorously defended their products, saying they see no reason for concern about products in the environment interfering with human hormones.

Some scientists have also pointed out that human diets have always included some estrogen-like compounds: They occur naturally in wine and soy-based products, for example.

Stephen H. Safe, a professor of veterinary physiology and pharmacology at Texas A&M University, said that overall, despite our poor diets, "what does the data say about our health in this country? We're living longer . . . You know, where are these endocrine threats?"

Still, concerns that human health might be in danger have led to recent bans on certain phthalates in young children's toys imposed by the European Union and the City of San Francisco.

Activists in the United States have attacked the EPA for what they believe is a delayed response to the problem. The agency has defended itself by saying that it has spent millions on other research programs looking at ways to identify and limit endocrine disruptors and that it hopes to begin the long-delayed chemical testing program next year.

Some activists fear that damage is already being done. They caution avoiding plastic baby bottles, which could contain bisphenol A, and reducing consumption of animal fat, where some environmental pollutants can concentrate.

"I feel terrible because we haven't moved on this faster," said Colborn, the activist who has served as an unofficial leader among endocrine-disruptor researchers. "This is a transgenerational problem that is undermining the integrity of humans."

But Paul Foster, an official who evaluates risks to human reproduction at the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, said it was hard to give useful advice at this point because the chemicals being investigated are so ubiquitous.

"There's very little that they can do," said Foster, whose agency is part of the National Institutes of Health. "That's why you can't be too alarmist about it, because you can't stop people living."

Global Warming Gag Order (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

Washington has no shortage of bullies, but even we can't quite believe an October 27 letter that Senators Jay Rockefeller and Olympia Snowe sent to Exxon Mobil CEO Rex Tillerson. Its message: Start toeing the Senators' line on climate change, or else.

We reprint chunks of the letter here1 and the full text on OpinionJournal.com2, so readers can see for themselves. But its essential point is that the two Senators believe global warming is a fact, and therefore all debate about the issue must stop and Exxon Mobil should "end its dangerous support of the [global warming] 'deniers'." Not only that, the company "should repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history." And in extra penance for being "one of the world's largest carbon emitters," Exxon should spend that money on "global remediation efforts."

The Senators aren't dumb enough to risk an ethics inquiry by threatening specific consequences if Mr. Tillerson declines this offer he can't refuse. But in case the CEO doesn't understand his company's jeopardy, they add that "Exxon Mobil and its partners in denial have manufactured controversy, sown doubt, and impeded progress with strategies all-too reminiscent of those used by the tobacco industry for so many years." (Our emphasis.) The Senators also graciously copied the Exxon board on their missive.

This is amazing stuff. On the one hand, the Senators say that everyone agrees on the facts and consequences of climate change. But at the same time they are so afraid of debate that they want Exxon to stop financing a doughty band of dissenters who can barely get their name in the paper. We respect the folks at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, but we didn't know until reading the Rockefeller-Snowe letter that they ran U.S. climate policy and led the mainstream media around by the nose, too. Congratulations.

Let's compare the balance of forces: on one side, CEI; on the other, the Pew Charitable Trusts, the Sierra Club, Environmental Defense, the U.N. and EU, Hollywood, Al Gore, and every politically correct journalist in the country. We'll grant that's a fair intellectual fight. But if the Senators are so afraid that a handful of policy wonks at a single small think-tank are in danger of winning this debate, they must not have much confidence in the merits of their own case.

The letter is so over-the-top that we also wonder if Mr. Rockefeller in particular has even read it. (He and Ms. Snowe didn't return our call.) The Senator hails from coal-producing West Virginia, where people know something about carbon emissions. Come to think of it, Mr. Rockefeller owes his own vast wealth to something other then non-carbon energy. But perhaps it's easier to be carbon free when your fortune comes from a trust fund.

The letter is of a piece with what has become a campaign of intimidation against any global warming dissent. Not only is everyone supposed to concede that the planet has been warming -- as it has -- but we are all supposed to salute and agree that human beings are the definitive cause, that the magnitude of the warming will be disastrous and its effects catastrophic, that such problems as AIDS and poverty are less urgent, and that economic planners must therefore impose vast new regulatory burdens on everyone around the world. Exxon is being targeted in this letter and other ways because it is one of the few companies that still thinks some debate on these questions is valuable.

Every dogma has its day, and we've lived long enough to see more than one "consensus" blown apart within a few years of "everyone knowing" it was true. In recent decades environmentalists have been wrong about almost every other apocalyptic claim they've made: global famine, overpopulation, natural resource exhaustion, the evils of pesticides, global cooling, and so on. Perhaps it's useful to have a few folks outside the "consensus" asking questions before we commit several trillion dollars to any problem.

Imagine if this letter had been sent by someone in the Bush Administration trying to enforce the opposite conclusion? The left would be howling about "censorship." That's exactly what did happen earlier this year after James Hansen, the NASA scientist and global warming evangelist, complained that a lowly 24-year-old press aide had tried to limit his media access. The entire episode was preposterous because Mr. Hansen is one of the most publicized scientists in the world, but the press aide was nonetheless sacked.

The Senators' letter is far more serious because they have enormous power to punish Exxon if it doesn't kowtow to them. A windfall profits tax is in the air, and we've seen what happens to other companies that dare to resist Congressional intimidation. It's to Exxon's credit that, in its response to the Senators, the company said that it will continue to fund free market research groups because "there is value in the debate" that helps promote "optimal public policy decisions." Too bad that's not what the Senators care about.

The 'Obfuscation Agenda' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

The following are excerpts from an Oct. 27 letter to Rex W. Tillerson, chairman and CEO of Exxon Mobil, from Sens. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia and Olympia Snowe of Maine. A related editorial appears nearby:

We are convinced that Exxon Mobil's longstanding support of a small cadre of global climate change skeptics, and those skeptics' access to and influence on government policymakers, have made it increasingly difficult for the United States to demonstrate the moral clarity it needs across all facets of its diplomacy. Obviously, other factors complicate our foreign policy. However, we are persuaded that the climate change denial strategy carried out by and for Exxon Mobil has helped foster the perception that the United States is insensitive to a matter of great urgency for all of mankind, and has thus damaged the stature of our nation internationally…

We fervently hope that reports that Exxon Mobil intends to end its funding of the climate change denial campaign of the Competitive Enterprise Institute (CEI) are true. Similarly, we have seen press reports that your British subsidiary has told the Royal Society, Great Britain's foremost scientific academy, that Exxon Mobil will stop funding other organizations with similar purposes. However, a casual review of available literature, as performed by personnel for the Royal Society reveals that Exxon Mobil is or has been the primary funding source for the "skepticism" of not only CEI, but for dozens of other overlapping and interlocking front groups sharing the same obfuscation agenda…

Large corporations in related industries have joined Exxon Mobil to provide significant and consistent financial support of this pseudo-scientific, non-peer reviewed echo chamber. The goal has not been to prevail in the scientific debate, but to obscure it. This climate change denial confederacy has exerted an influence out of all proportion to its size or relative scientific credibility. Through relentless pressure on the media to present the issue "objectively," and by challenging the consensus on climate change science by misstating both the nature of what "consensus" means and what this particular consensus is, Exxon Mobil and its allies have confused the public and given cover to a few senior elected and appointed government officials whose positions and opinions enable them to damage U.S. credibility abroad…

A study to be released in November by an American scientific group will expose Exxon Mobil as the primary funder of no fewer than 29 climate change denial front groups in 2004 alone. Besides a shared goal, these groups often featured common staffs and board members. The study will estimate that Exxon Mobil has spent more than $19 million since the late 1990s on a strategy of "information laundering," or enabling a small number of professional skeptics working through scientific-sounding organizations to funnel their viewpoints through non-peer-reviewed websites such as Tech Central Station. The Internet has provided Exxon Mobil the means to wreak its havoc on U.S. credibility, while avoiding the rigors of refereed journals…

We would recommend that Exxon Mobil publicly acknowledge both the reality of climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it. Second, Exxon Mobil should repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history. Finally, we believe that there would be a benefit to the United States if one of the world's largest carbon emitters headquartered here devoted at least some of the money it has invested in climate change denial pseudo-science to global remediation efforts.

When Is A Fish Like A Carrot? (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

The answer is: When it is a farmed fish.

The Department of Agriculture routinely distinguishes between organic carrots and the regular kind when it decides whether to grant an "organic" label. But it has gotten into trouble recently over how to decide whether a fish — especially a fish like salmon — is organic or not. The fishing industry is eager to call wild salmon "organic," as a way of denoting quality to consumers.

But there's a problem. Carrots are either grown organically — without conventional pesticides — or they're not. A wild carrot, to most people, is barely a carrot, but the flower called Queen Anne's lace.

A wild salmon is a glorious thing, and every bit as delectable as its cousins raised in fish farms that are, or are not, organic. But to call a wild salmon organic is to demean it, since it comes from a place where the word has no meaning. That is a little like calling the ocean "natural." The trouble is, there is no U.S.D.A. "wild" label, nor should there be, for that would represent some final surrender to ourselves.

There are really two answers to what is, after all, a problem of terminology. The first is consumer education. There are few shoppers out there who know as much as they need to know about the fish they buy, how the fish are harvested or what effect industrial fishing is having on the oceans. The other answer is to continue to be strict and judicious with the U.S.D.A. "organic" label, and use it as a tool to help distinguish between fish farming that is done responsibly and fish farming that is not.

Too often, consumers assume that fish farms are inherently "organic," perhaps merely because they are aquatic. Nothing could be further from the truth. They can be as organic as the finest pasture-raised organic pig farm or as inorganic as a hog confinement operation. Let's use the word "organic" as a way to distinguish between them, all the while hoping that there remain wild salmon out in the oceans, beyond any of our categorizing.

Deadly Meth Marching Toward New England: DEA Battles Midwest Scourge Before It Hits (BOSH)

Boston Herald, December 1, 2006

The Hub is winning the war on crystal methamphetamine thanks to lessons learned from battles waged in the meth-gripped West and Midwest, a top federal drug official said yesterday, but she warned that the addictive drug is on a destructive march toward the East Coast.

"We've been fortunate in New England," June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, said on the first National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

"We were told methamphetamine abuse was spreading eastward. We learned from the West Coast and the Midwest. The main thing is to keep the key ingredients out of the hands of the people who manufacture meth," she said.

Last year, federal agents uncovered 16 clandestine meth labs in the six New England states, including five in the Bay State. This year, 17 labs have been found in New England, including three in Massachusetts, a DEA spokesman said.

Those numbers pale compared to lab discoveries in other parts of the country that face a more devastating struggle with meth addiction.

The Combat Methamphetamine Act of 2005 has tremendously curbed the production of home-grown meth now that common cold medications containing the ingredients ephedrine, pseudoephedrine and phenylpropanolamine must be kept behind pharmacy counters, Stansbury said.

Those active ingredients are extracted from the cold medicines, combined with chemicals like iodine and anhydrous ammonia, and cooked over high heat to make meth. As of Sept. 30, consumers are now limited to buying no more than nine grams of cold remedies like Sudafed every 30 days, and must show picture identification and sign a log book when doing so.

"It's so important that people aren't able to go in and buy this in bulk," Stansbury said.

Conniving drug dealers have also been known to sell crystal meth to buyers while claiming that they are giving them cocaine or ecstasy in hopes of hooking them on another fix, Stansbury said."Greedy drug traffickers try to make a market," Stansbury said. "It's buyer beware. You never know what you are getting."

DEA Discusses Meth Problems At JALC (SO)

By Andrea Hahn

The Southern, December 2, 2006

CARTERVILLE - Just a couple of years ago, questions about methamphetamine were basic - what is it? where does it come from? What are the symptoms of use?

Roger Ehler, a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent, answered much more specific questions Thursday when he came to address a criminal justice class at John A. Logan College on Thursday. It was National Meth Awareness Day, and many of the students were already quite aware.

The types of questions reflected this more sophisticated knowledge of the drug. Students asked about long-term effects on the environment from meth lab dumps, about the potential for health problems created by meth labs inside rental or lodging properties, about new problems that could arise from the importing of a more pure form of the drug.

Meth has become enough of a household name that Saturday Night Live mocked "the meth lifestyle" during a recent episode. Ehler used the skit to demonstrate some of the problems associated with meth addiction.

"Obviously that was exaggerated - but then, it wasn't very exaggerated," he said.

The skit covered a host of meth-related symptoms and problems - days of sleeplessness, obsession with the drug, the rotting teeth associated with "meth mouth," the sores associated with "crank bugs" imagined to be crawling under the skin, household meth labs with questionable meth cooks, paranoia, hallucinations, compulsive behavior, extreme irritability and weight loss and risky sexual behavior.

The bit of comedy, Ehler said, was to take the edge off before showing a more serious film featuring meth addicts talking about the same elements from SNL but without the satire.

Ehler followed up by discussing current trends in meth use in Southern Illinois. The good news is small-batch meth labs are declining in the wake of legislation limiting the availability of pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient in meth production.

The bad news is imported meth, a more pure form known as ice or Mexican dope, is slowly on the rise.

Ehler said much is still unknown about meth use, even though law enforcement has been battling it for several years in this region. Consequently, he was unable to give definite answers to questions about relative availability of ice versus locally made "dirty meth," or whether the more pure, imported meth was more addictive or more likely to lead to drug overdoses.

He did have some encouraging new information, however. Education seems to be working - numbers of new users are declining, especially among younger people, he said.

And there is new hope for meth addict recovery. One of the most serious physical problems that results from long-term meth use is the inability of the brain to create dopamine, the chemical that makes a person feel pleasure. Not only is the need for longer rehabilitation to resist meth addiction now better understood, Ehler said there is also new evidence indicating the body's production of dopamine can be restored after one or two years of abstinence from meth.

"Even if you don't use the drug or don't know anyone who does, you can be impacted by meth," Ehler said. "We're looking at an epidemic."

The Meth Menace (NYDN)

By Austin Fenner And Tina Moore, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, December 3, 2006

Methamphetamine - once considered the drug of choice in the backwoods - is moving up in society.

Experts say methods for "cooking" the drug have become less noxious over the past decade, making meth labs a friendlier fit for apartment buildings like the one on Manhattan's East Side, where federal agents announced a bust last week.

"Back in the day, cooking meth was a very smelly process," said Steve Robertson, special agent and spokesman for the DEA. "That's why meth labs would go into rural areas. You would have them out in little shacks out on farms or ranches."

DOJ_NMG_0101725

Agents from his agency announced Thursday - National Meth Awareness Day - that they had busted a clandestine meth lab at a high-rise on E. 39th St. They also announced nine other meth lab busts in the city and on Long Island.

The local meth labs highlight a change in the face of methamphetamine use - long a rural drug consumed most often by lower-income men and women.

"There's no question that there has been an increase of meth use in the city," said Dr. Petros Levounis, who runs the Addiction Institute of New York. "The transformation from Sudafed to meth is extremely, extremely easy."

The busts announced last week added another twist to the meth dilemma: Two of the men arrested, both professionals, were making the drug for personal consumption.

Meth labs - even rural mom and pop labs - are usually run to turn a profit.

Michael Knib, an information technology vice president for Citigroup, told agents he started producing the drug because he lost his sources when he moved to the city from Seattle, investigators said.

Mehmetcan Dosemeci, a 28-year-old doctoral student in history and Fullbright Scholar at Columbia University, told agents that he was making the drug in his Manhattan Ave. flat to stay awake. He researched cooking meth on the Internet.

The production of meth puts the people making the drug and those around them in danger. Meth labs - where vaporous chemicals are hard to detect - are known to explode.

"It's unsettling," said a neighbor in the Manhattan Ave. building where Dosemeci lived. He did not want to be named in this story. "He was taking a risk with other people's lives."

A retired 69-year-old clerk, who also did not want to provide his name, was dumbfounded.
